

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

B 1,014,364

GENERAL LIBRARY
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN.

THE Hagerman Collection

OF BOOKS RELATING TO HISTORY AND POLITICAL SCIENCE

BOUGHT WITH MONEY PLACED BY JAMES J. HAGERMAN OF CLASS OF '61

IN THE HANDS OF Professor Charles Kendall Adams

IN THE YEAR

1883.

J

301

.H2

HANSARD'S
PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

THIRD SERIES:

COMMENCING WITH THE ACCESSION OF

WILLIAM IV.

34° & 35° VICTORIÆ, 1871.

VOL. CCVII.

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM

THE FOURTEENTH DAY OF JUNE 1871,

TO

THE NINETEENTH DAY OF JULY 1871.

Fourth Volume of the Session.

LONDON:

PUBLISHED BY CORNELIUS BUCK,

AT THE OFFICE FOR "HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,"

23, PATERNOSTER ROW. [E.C.]

1871.

LONDON : CORNELIUS BUCK, 23, PATERNOSTER ROW. E.C.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

TO

VOLUME CCVII.

THIRD SERIES.

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 14.

Page

Endowed Schools Act (1869) Amendment Bill [Bill 55]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Sir John Lubbock) 2
 Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months,"—(Mr. Pease):—After debate, Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question:"—The House divided; Ayes 64, Noes 222; Majority 158:—Words added:—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to:—Bill put off for six months.

Medical Act (1858) Amendment Bill [Bill 72]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Dr. Lush) .. 33
 After debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn:—Bill withdrawn.

METROPOLIS WATER (No. 2) BILL—

Select Committee nominated:—List of the Committee .. 45

Glasgow Boundary Bill—Ordered (The Lord Advocate, Mr. Adam) ... 45

Sasines Register (Scotland) Bill—Ordered (The Lord Advocate, Mr. Adam) ... 45

LORDS, THURSDAY, JUNE 15.

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, Amendment Bill

Presented (The Lord Cairns) 46
 After short debate, Bill read 1^a (No. 185.)

Union of Benefices Bill (No. 155)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Lord Bishop of Exeter) 48
 An Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this day six months,")—(The Earl of Powis).
 After debate, on Question? Resolved in the Negative; and Bill to be read 2^a this day six months.

THE APPELLATE JURISDICTION OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL—Observations, Lord Westbury; Reply, The Lord Chancellor:—Debate thereon .. 53

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, THURSDAY, JUNE 15.

FRANCE — DURATION OF COMMERCIAL TREATY — Question, Mr. Whit Answer, Viscount Enfield ..
NEW PRISON NEAR ROCHESTER—Question, Mr. Goldsmid; Answer, Mr.
Bruce ..
METROPOLIS — HAMILTON PLACE — Question, Mr. Chaplin; Answer, Mr.
Ayrton ..
ARMY — PROMOTION AND RETIREMENT—ANNUAL EXPENDITURE—Question, Lord
Garlies; Answer, Mr. Cardwell ..
CHARITY COMMISSIONERS BILL — Question, Mr. Collins; Answer, Mr.
Bruce ..
RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY—Question, Colonel C. H. Lindsay; Answer, Mr.
Cardwell ..
ARMY — PROMOTION AND RETIREMENT—Question, Colonel Stuart Knox; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT—Question, Mr. Holms; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster
..
METROPOLIS — SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM — Question, Mr. Cavendish Bentinck; Answer, Mr. Ayrton
..
WAR OFFICE—INCOME TAX COMMISSIONERS—Question, Mr. Mellor; Answer, Mr. Gladstone
..
CUSTOMS CLERKS' HOLIDAYS — Question, Captain Grosvenor; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer
..
INDIA—EAST INDIA ADMINISTRATION—Personal Explanation, Mr. Grant Duff; Reply, Mr. Fawcett ..

Army Regulation Bill [Bill 39]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 13th June] ..
--	--

PART II.—Army Enlistment.

Clause 6 (Rules as to enlistment) postponed ..
---	--

PART III.—Auxiliary Forces.

Clause 7 (Jurisdiction of lieutenants of counties in respect of auxiliary forces re-vested in Her Majesty) agreed to ..
Clause 8 (Number of auxiliary forces) agreed to ..
Clause 9 (Enlistment in Militia under ordinary circumstances to be voluntary) struck out ..
Clause 10 (Training of Militia) agreed to ..
Clauses 11 to 14, inclusive, negatived .
Clause 15 (Application of Mutiny Act to volunteers when in training) agreed to ..

PART IV.—SUPPLEMENTAL PROVISIONS. As to Sale of Commissions.

Clause 16 (Appointment of Commissioners to compensate officers) agreed to ..
Clause 17 (Appointment of clerks by Commissioners) agreed to ..
Clause 18 (Powers and duties of Commissioners) agreed to ..
Clause 19 (Decision of Commissioners to be conclusive) agreed to ..

Supplemental Provisions as to the Ballot.

Clauses 20 to 24, inclusive, negatived .
---	--

Rules by Secretary of State.

Clause 25 negatived .
Clause 26 agreed to .

PART V.—MISCELLANEOUS AND DEFINITIONS.

Power of Government to take Railroads on Emergency.

Clause 27 (Power of Government on occasion of emergency to take possession of railroads) agreed to ..
--	--

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 15.]

Army Regulation Bill—continued.

Barracks and Land.

- Clause 28 (Power of county or municipal boroughs to build barracks) negatived
 Clauses 29 to 31 negatived.
 Clause 32 (Power of Militia and volunteer corps to acquire land for any necessary purposes) agreed to

Penalties and Saving Clauses.

- Clauses 33 and 34 negatived.
 Clause 35 (Saving of general Acts) agreed to Definitions.

- Clause 36 (Interpretation of certain terms in the Act) agreed to. ..
 New Clause (Order as to billeting and quartering of Militia) agreed to New Clause (Militia liable to serve in parts of Europe) withdrawn ..
 New Clause (Power to Commissioners to commute) withdrawn ..
 New Clause (Compensation to clerks of general meetings) withdrawn
 New Clause (Officers to lodge security in aid of retirement) withdrawn ..
 Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

Prayer Book (Tables of Lessons) (re-committed) Bill (Lords) [Bill 181]—

- Bill considered in Committee
 After some time spent therein, Bill reported, with an Amendment; as amended, to be considered To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUSINESS—

- Moved*, “That this House do now adjourn,”—(Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) ..
 After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Metropolitan Building Act (1855) Amendment Bill—Ordered (Mr. Alderman Lawrence, Sir David Salomons); presented, and read the first time [Bill 200] ...

Chain Cables and Anchors Bill—Considered in Committee:—Resolution agreed to, and reported:—Bill ordered (Mr. Chichester Fortescue, Mr. Arthur Peel); presented, and read the first time [Bill 201]

LORDS, FRIDAY, JUNE 16.

FRANCE—THE COMMUNIST INSURRECTION—ENGLISH PRISONERS AT SATORY—Observations, Earl Granville

HER MAJESTY’S SHIP “CAPTAIN”—Observations, The Earl of Lauderdale; Reply, The Earl of Camperdown:—Debate thereon

FOUR COURTS MARSHALSEA PRISON (DUBLIN)—IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT—MOTION FOR A RETURN—

- Moved*, “For a Return of the cost of maintaining the Four Courts Marshalsea Prison in Dublin, specifying the salaries of each official, the cost of allowances to pauper debtors, and all other expenses, and stating from what funds such expenditure is defrayed,”—(The Marquess of Clanricarde)

Motion agreed to.

Lunacy Regulation Amendment Bill (No. 171)—

- Moved*, “That the Bill be now read 2^a,”—(The Lord Chancellor) ..
 Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 16.]

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, Amendment Bill (No. 185)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Lord Cairns) ..
After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and com- mitted to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Justices of the Peace Qualification Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Earl of Albemarle); read 1^a (No. 188)

Petroleum Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Earl of Morley); read 1^a (No. 189) ...

COMMONS, FRIDAY, JUNE 16.

IRELAND—MOUNTJOY GOVERNMENT PRISON—Question, Mr. Callan; Answer,
The Marquess of Hartington

ARMY—LEICESTERSHIRE MILITIA—Question, Mr. Pell; Answer, Mr. Cardwell

EDUCATION—POWERS OF SCHOOL BOARDS—Question, Mr. Bulkeley Hughes;
Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster

EDUCATION—ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSIONERS—Questions, Mr. Gathorne
Hardy, Mr. Beresford Hope; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster ..

PARLIAMENT—ORDER—NOTICES—OBSERVATIONS, Mr. Cavendish Bentinck ..

Moved, "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Collins.)
After debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £9,817, to complete the sum for the Fishery Board, Scotland.—After debate, Vote agreed to

(2.) £23,800, to complete the sum for the General Register Office and Census, Scotland.

(3.) £4,503, to complete the sum for the Board of Lunacy, Scotland.

(4.) £13,286, to complete the sum for the Board of Supervision for Relief of the Poor, Scotland.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £4,731, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1872, for the Salaries of the Officers and Attendants of the Household of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and other Expenses" Moved, "That the Item of £1,562 6s. 2d., for Queen's Plates, be omitted from the proposed Vote,"—(Mr. Rylands.)—After debate, Question put:—The Committee divided;

Ayes 75, Noes 133; Majority 58.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(6.) £20,935, to complete the sum for the Offices of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

(7.) £300, to complete the sum for the Expenses of the Boundary Survey, Ireland.

(8.) £1,793, to complete the sum for the Charitable Donations and Bequests Office, Ireland.

(9.) £27,168, to complete the sum for the General Register Office and Census, Ireland.

(10.) £77,211, to complete the sum for the Poor Law Commission, Ireland.

(11.) £3,514, to complete the sum for the Public Record Office, &c., Ireland.

(12.) £19,822, to complete the sum for the Office of Public Works, Ireland.

(13.) £33,810, to complete the sum for Law Charges and Department of Solicitor to the Treasury.

(14.) £157,173, to complete the sum for Criminal Prosecutions, Sheriffs' Expenses, &c.—
After debate, Vote agreed to (15.) £133,202, to complete the sum for the Court of Chancery.—After debate, Vote agreed to

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next; Committee to sit again this day.

And it being now five minutes to Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 16.]

Page

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read ; Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair :"—

LOTTERY ACTS—RESOLUTION—Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the provisions of the Lottery Acts ought to be impartially enforced by Her Majesty's Government against illegal Lotteries, irrespective of their objects, in all parts of the United Kingdom,"—(Mr. Charley.)—instead thereof ... 171

After debate, Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—The House divided ; Ayes 60, Noes 33 ; Majority 27.

Main Question proposed.

REVENUES, &c. OF GIBRALTAR—Observation, Sir David Wedderburn ; Reply, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen :—Short debate thereon .. 179

THE LICENSING BILL—Observations, Sir Lawrence Palk ; Reply, Mr. Bruce :—Debate thereon .. 185

REPRESENTATION OF IRELAND—Observations, Sir Colman O'Loughlen ; Reply, The Marquess of Hartington .. 195

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," by leave, withdrawn :—Committee deferred till Monday next.

CONVENTUAL AND MONASTIC INSTITUTIONS—

Moved, "That Mr. Thomas Chambers be discharged from further attendance on the Select Committee on Conventual and Monastic Institutions,"—(Mr. Newdegate) ... 196

After short debate, Question put, and negatived.

Municipal Corporations (Borough Funds) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Leeman, Mr. Muddell, Mr. Goldney, Mr. Candlish) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 203] ... 196

THAMES EMBANKMENT—

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire whether, having regard to the various rights and interests involved, it is expedient that the land reclaimed from the Thames, and lying between Whitehall Gardens and Whitehall Place should, in whole or in part, be appropriated for the advantage of the inhabitants of the Metropolis, and, in such case, in what manner such appropriation should be effected,"—(Mr. Gladstone) ... 196

And, on July 3, Committee nominated :—List of the Committee ... 197

NEW MINT BUILDING SITE BILL—

Select Committee nominated :—List of the Committee .. 197

Ordered, That all Petitions presented during the present Session against the Bill be referred to the Committee ; and such of the Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel or agents, be heard upon their Petitions, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bill against the said Petitions,—(Mr. Ayrton.)

Public Schools Act (1868) Amendment Bill—Ordered (Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. William Henry Forster) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 204] ... 197

LORDS, MONDAY, JUNE 19.

DECLARATION OF PARIS, 1856—SEIZURE OF ENEMY'S GOODS ON THE HIGH SEAS—PETITIONS—Observations, The Earl of Denbigh ; Reply, Earl Cowper :—Debate thereon .. 197

Petitions read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

House of Lords Appellate Jurisdiction Bill (No. 147)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2,"—(The Lord Westbury) .. 208

After debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2^d accordingly.

VACCINATION—MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE—

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the present state of the law as regards Vaccination, with reference to the causes which operate in preventing the carrying out an efficient system of Vaccination,"—(The Lord Buckhurst) ... 216

After short debate, Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, MONDAY, JUNE 19.

	Page
SUNDAY TRADING—THE ACT 29 CHARLES II., c. 7—Questions, Mr. P. A. Taylor, Mr. Baines, Mr. Dimsdale; Answers, Mr. Bruce ..	219
CHINA—COOLIE EMIGRATION—CASE OF THE COOLIE KWOK-A-SING—Question, Sir James Lawrence; Answer, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen ..	220
CHINA—FRENCH AND PORTUGUESE LEGISLATION ON COOLIE EMIGRATION—Question, Sir James Lawrence; Answer, Viscount Enfield ..	222
ARMY—NON-PURCHASE CORPS—Question, Major Arbuthnot; Answer, Mr. Cardwell ..	222
ARMY—ROYAL MILITARY ACADEMY, WOOLWICH—Question, Major Cartwright; Answer, Mr. Cardwell ..	223
SCOTLAND—QUEEN'S PLATES—Question, Sir Graham Montgomery; Answer, Mr. Gladstone:—Notice of Motion (Mr. Robertson) ..	223
CONVENTUAL AND MONASTIC INSTITUTIONS—Question, Mr. Newdegate; Answer, Mr. T. Chambers ..	224
IRELAND—ROBBERY OF MILITIA ARMS AT MALLOW—Question, Colonel Stuart Knox; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington ..	224

Army Regulation Bill [Bill 39]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 15th June.]
New Clause (Recruit to be twenty years of age) negatived ..	225
New Clause (Terms of enlistment) withdrawn ..	265
New Clause (Militia places for arms, &c. not to be provided by justices of the peace) negatived ..	274
Bill reported ; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday .

Criminal Law Amendment (Violence, Threats, &c.) Bill—

Lords Amendments considered ..	282
Amendments, as far as the Amendment in page 2, line 11, read a second time, and agreed to .
Page 2, line 11, leave out "with two or more persons," the next Amendment, read a second time.
Moved , "That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendment," put, and agreed to .
Consequential Amendment proposed,
To insert after the word "House," in page 2, line 12, the words "where such person resides, or the approach to such house, or if with one or more other persons he watch or beset the place where such person works or carries on business, or the approach to such place, or follow such person in a disorderly manner, in or through any street or road,"—(Mr. Secretary Bruce .)
Question put, "That those words be there inserted:—"The House divided ;
Ayes 97, Noes 147; Majority 50.
Subsequent Amendments agreed to .

LORDS, TUESDAY, JUNE 20.

Locomotives Bill (No. 130)—

Moved , "That the Bill be now read 2 ^a ,"—(The Earl of Dunmore) ..	289
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 ^a accordingly, and referred to a Select Committee.
And, on June 22, Committee nominated :—List of the Committee ..	291

Burial Grounds Bill (No. 181)—

Moved , "That the Bill be now read 2 ^a ,"—(The Earl Beauchamp) ..	291
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 ^a accordingly, and referred to a Select Committee.
And, on June 27, Committee nominated :—List of the Committee ..	296

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 20.]

Charters (Colleges) Bill (No. 73)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^a,"—(The Lord Privy Seal) ..
After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 3^a accordingly with the Amendments, and passed, and sent to the Commons.

Lunacy Regulation Amendment Bill (No. 171)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^a,"—(The Lord Chancellor) ..
After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 3^a accordingly, and passed, and sent to the Commons.

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, Amendment Bill (Nos. 185, 193)

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^a,"—(The Lord Cairns) ..
After short debate, further debate on the said Motion adjourned to Friday next.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS—MOTION FOR A RETURN—

Moved, That there be laid before this House, Copy of the List of Endowed Schools which it is proposed to include in the Scheme of the Endowed School Commissioners to be submitted during the present year.—(The Lord Buckhurst)

After short debate, Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON—Questions, Lord Cairns; Answers, Earl Granville, Earl De Grey and Ripon

COMMONS, TUESDAY, JUNE 20.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF MRS. DEXTER—Question, Mr. E. Turnor; Answer, Mr. Bruce

DEPARTMENT OF WOODS AND FORESTS—Question, Mr. Vernon Harcourt; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer

UNITED STATES—COTTON CLAIMS—Question, Mr. Holt; Answer, Viscount Enfield

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:"—

ARMY REGULATION BILL—CLERKS OF LIEUTENANCY—RESOLUTION—
Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words
"it is not expedient that the Clerks of the General Meetings, or of the Lieutenancy of any county, riding, or place in the United Kingdom, should be deprived of their emoluments without compensation,"—(Lord George Hamilton),—instead thereof ...

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—considered in Committee ..
(In the Committee.)

- (1.) £1,148,387, Post Office Packet Service; no part of which sum is to be applicable or applied in or towards making any payment in respect of any period subsequent to the 20th day of June, 1863, to Mr. Joseph George Churchward, or to any person claiming through or under him by virtue of a certain Contract bearing date the 26th day of April 1859, made between the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Admiralty (for and on behalf of Her Majesty) of the first part, and the said Joseph George Churchward of the second part, or in or towards the satisfaction of any claim whatsoever of the said Joseph George Churchward, by virtue of that Contract, so far as relates to any period subsequent to the 20th day of June, 1863.
- (2.) £350,000, to complete the sum for the Post Office Telegraph Service.
- (3.) £979,888, Revenue Departments (Customs).
- (4.) £1,625,625, Inland Revenue Department.—After short debate, Vote agreed to ...

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 20.]

F

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Committee—continued.

- (5.) £2,470,855, Post Office.—After short debate, Vote agreed to ...
- (6.) £45,788, to complete the sum for the Superior Courts of Common Law in England.
- (7.) £48,777, to complete the sum for the London Court of Bankruptcy.
- (8.) £315,706, to complete the sum for the County Courts.
- (9.) £69,477, to complete the sum for the Courts of Probate and Divorce and Matrimonial Causes in England.
- (10.) £10,160, to complete the sum for the High Court of Admiralty.
- (11.) £3,960, to complete the sum for the office of Land Registry.—After short debate, Vote agreed to ...
- (12.) £15,228, to complete the sum for the Police Courts, London and Sheerness.
- (13.) £154,470, to complete the sum for the Metropolitan Police.—After short debate, Vote agreed to ...
- (14.) £295,500, to complete the sum for Police Counties and Boroughs (England and Wales), and in Scotland.
- (15.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £361,382, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, of the Superintendence of Convict Establishments, and for the Maintenance of Convicts in England and the Colonies" ...
- Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £346,382, &c.,"—(Mr. Hermon.)—After debate, Question put, and agreed to.
- (16.) £251,980, to complete the sum for the maintenance of Prisoners, Juvenile Offenders, and Criminal Lunatics.
- (17.) £25,410, to complete the sum for Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum.—After short debate, Vote agreed to ...
- (18.) £15,750, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Legal Charges in England.—After short debate, Vote agreed to ...
- (19.) £55,675, to complete the sum for Criminal Proceedings in Scotland.
- (20.) £42,767, to complete the sum for Courts of Law and Justice in Scotland.—After short debate, Vote agreed to ...
- (21.) £22,740, to complete the sum for General Register House, Edinburgh.—After short debate, Vote agreed to ...
- (22.) £18,987, to complete the sum for Prisons in Scotland, &c.
- (23.) £59,403, to complete the sum for Criminal Prosecutions, &c., Ireland.
- (24.) £33,903, to complete the sum for the Court of Chancery, Ireland.
- (25.) £22,377, to complete the sum for the Superior Courts of Common Law in Ireland.
- (26.) £6,470, to complete the sum for the Court of Bankruptcy and Insolvency in Ireland.
- (27.) £9,721, to complete the sum for the Landed Estates Court, Ireland.
- (28.) £8,526, to complete the sum for the Court of Probate in Ireland.
- (29.) £1,540, to complete the sum for the Admiralty Court Registry, Ireland.
- (30.) £11,508, to complete the sum for the Office for Registration of Deeds in Ireland.
- (31.) £2,316, to complete the sum for the Office for Registration of Judgments in Ireland.
- (32.) £73,673, to complete the sum for the Dublin Metropolitan Police.
- (33.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £693,260, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for the Constabulary Force in Ireland" ...
- Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £682,818, &c.,"—(Mr. Joshua Fielden :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
- Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (34.) £35,400, to complete the sum for Government Prisons, &c., Ireland.
- (35.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £39,323, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for the Maintenance of Prisoners in County and Borough Gaols, and for the Expenses of Reformatories and Industrial Schools in Ireland" ...
- Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £29,323, &c.,"—(Mr. Vance :)—After short debate, Question put, and negatived.
- Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (36.) £4,200, to complete the sum for Dundrum Criminal Lunatic Asylum, Ireland.
- (37.) £1,880, to complete the sum for the Four Courts Marshalsea, Dublin.
- (38.) £6,670, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Legal Expenses, Ireland.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again To-morrow.
And at Seven of the clock the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 20.]

Page

NEW FOREST—RESOLUTION—

Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, pending legislation on the New Forest, no felling of ornamental timber and no fresh inclosures should be permitted in the New Forest; and that no timber whatever should be cut, except for the purposes of thinning the young plantations, executing necessary repairs in the Forest, and satisfying the fuel rights of the Commoners,"—(Mr. Fawcett) 32

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words "also that Denny Wood should be restored to its former condition as open forest land,"—(Sir Charles Dilke.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added:"—After debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn:—Main Question put, and agreed to.

ARMY SERVICE ABROAD—LIMITATION OF AGE—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that measures be taken to prevent as far as practicable Soldiers enlisted in any Regiment of Cavalry or Infantry of the Line, being called upon to serve Her Majesty out of the United Kingdom, who shall not have attained the age of twenty years,"—(Mr. W. M. Torrens) 34

Motion agreed to.

Charities, &c. Exemption Bill [Bill 23]—

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [10th May], "That the Bill be now read a second time;" and which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months,"—(Mr. Hardcastle):—Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question:"—Debate resumed 34

After short debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 68, Noes 116; Majority 48:—Words added:—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to:—Second Reading put off for six months.

HARROW SCHOOL—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question proposed [13th June],

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to disallow the Statute now lying upon the Table of the House, by which membership of the Church of England is, for the first time, imposed as a qualification for appointment to the governing body of Harrow School,"—(Mr. Trevelyan.)

Question again proposed:—Debate resumed 3

After further debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 99, Noes 71; Majority 28.

Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland) Amendment Bill—Ordered (Mr. Serjeant Sherlock, Mr. Bryan) 3

Public Libraries (Scotland) Act (1867) Amendment Bill—Ordered (Mr. Armitstead, Sir John Ogilvy, Mr. Kinnaird); presented, and read the first time [Bill 209] ... 3

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 21.

Sale of Liquor on Sunday Bill [Bill 48]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Rylands) 3

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months,"—(Mr. Joshua Fielden.)

After debate, Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question:"—The House divided; Ayes 147, Noes 119; Majority 28:—Main Question put, and agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

SUPPLY—REPORT—Resolutions [June 20] reported 3

After short debate, Resolutions agreed to.

DEAN FOREST AND HUNDRED OF ST. BRIAVELS BILL—

Select Committee nominated:—List of the Committee 3

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

LORDS, THURSDAY, JUNE 22.		Page
Ecclesiastical Courts Bill (No. 84)—
Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read	..	386
Moved , "That the said Order be discharged,"—(The Earl of Shaftesbury :)
—After debate, Motion agreed to ; Order discharged accordingly; and Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn .
Ecclesiastical Procedure and Registry Bill (No. 85)—
Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read, and discharged , and Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn .
Tramways (Ireland) Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Lord Cairns) ; read 1 st (No. 203) ...		395

COMMONS, THURSDAY, JUNE 22.
HERRING BRAND IN SCOTLAND —Question, Mr. Ellice; Answer, Mr. Gladstone	395
ARMY—ROYAL ACADEMY AT WOOLWICH—SONS OF MILITIA OFFICERS—
Question, Mr. Corry; Answer, Mr. Cardwell	..	396
ARMY—ADJUTANTS IN THE RESERVE FORCES —Question, Earl Percy;
Answer, Mr. Cardwell	..	397
EPPING FOREST—INCLOSURE AT WANSTEAD FLATS —Question, Mr. Holms;
Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	..	397
UNITED STATES—TREATY OF WASHINGTON —Question, Sir Charles Adderley;
Answer, Mr. Gladstone	..	398
METROPOLIS—NEW STREET FROM TOTTENHAM COURT ROAD TO CHARING
CROSS—Question, Mr. Raikes; Answer, Sir William Tite	..	398
THE HEIRS OF WILLIAM PENN —Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, The
Chancellor of the Exchequer	..	400
ARMY—THE RESERVE FORCES—ADJUTANTS' COMMISSIONS —Question, Mr.
Holms; Answer, Mr. Cardwell	..	401
Elections (Parliamentary and Municipal) (re-committed) Bill
[Bill 103]—
Order for Committee read	..	401
Moved , "That it be an Instruction to the Committee, that they have power to provide for the redistribution of the seats now vacant through the disfranchisement of the Boroughs of Beverley, Bridgwater, Cashel, and Sligo,"—(Mr. James Lowther .)
After short debate, Question put:—The House divided ; Ayes 145, Noes 254; Majority 109.
Moved , "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:"—
Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Cross),
—instead thereof	..	410
Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After further long debate, Debate adjourned till Monday next.

LORDS, FRIDAY, JUNE 23.
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, Amendment Bill (Nos. 185, 193)—
Order of the Day for resuming the adjourned debate, on the Motion for the Third Reading, read:—Debate resumed accordingly	..	490
After short debate, on Question? "That the Bill be read 3 rd ;" Resolved in the Affirmative ; Bill read 3 rd accordingly.
Proviso moved —
"Nothing in this Act contained shall be deemed to affect the rights of tenants on estates conveyed prior to the passing of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, under the provisions of the Acts twelfth and thirteenth Victoria, chapter seventy-seven, and twenty-first and twenty-second Victoria, chapter seventy-two,"—(Lord Greville .)
After short debate, Amendment withdrawn :—Bill passed , and sent to the Commons.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 23.]

THE ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSION—DR. MORGAN'S CHARITY, BRIDGE-WATER—Petition presented (The Earl of Carnarvon)
After debate, Petition ordered to lie on the Table.

Prevention of Crime Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Lord Chancellor); read 1st (No. 207)

COMMONS, FRIDAY, JUNE 23.

SUNDAY OBSERVANCE ACT—Question, Mr. Mitchell Henry; Answer, Mr. Bruce

THE QUEEN AND THE POPE—Questions, Mr. Whalley, Mr. Newdegate; Answers, Mr. Gladstone

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:"—

LORDS' DAY OBSERVANCE—Observations, Mr. Brady, Mr. Speaker

METROPOLIS—THE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT—CONSTITUTION HILL—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to direct that carriage traffic may have free access to the Houses of Parliament by way of Constitution Hill,"—(Mr. Haviland-Burke),—instead thereof

After short debate, Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—The House divided; Ayes 89, Noes 61; Majority 28.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—considered in Committee—
(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £30,072, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for the Maintenance and Repair of the Royal Palaces"

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £550, for Contributions in lieu of Rates, be omitted from the proposed Vote,"—(Mr. Candlish).—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed:—Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £728, for Hampton Court Stud House and Paddocks, be omitted from the proposed Vote,"—(Mr. Aytoun).—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) £76,124, to complete the sum for Royal Parks
After debate, Moved, "That the Vote be reduced by the sum of £448,"—(Mr. Ellice). Motion withdrawn.

After further debate, Vote agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £99,017, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for the Maintenance and Repair of Public Buildings and Monuments; for providing the necessary supply of Water; for Rents of Houses hired for the temporary accommodation of Public Departments, and Charges attendant thereon"

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £97,017, &c.,"—(Mr. Hermon).—After short debate, Amendment negatived.

On the original proposition being put:—After further short debate, Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) £10,500, to complete the sum for Furniture in Public Departments.
Resolutions to be reported.

(5.) £60,650, to complete the sum for Acquisition of Lands (New Palace at Westminster).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £23,078, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for the Buildings of the Houses of Parliament"

After short debate, Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next; Committee also report Progress; to sit again this day.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 23.]

It being now Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”—

EUPHRATES VALLEY RAILWAY—MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE—

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words
“a Select Committee be appointed to examine and report upon the whole subject of Railway communication between the Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf,”—(Sir George Jenkinson.)—instead thereof

After short debate, Question, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question,” put, and negatived.

Question proposed,

“That the words ‘a Select Committee be appointed to examine and report upon the whole subject of Railway communication between the Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf’ be added, instead thereof.”

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, by inserting, after the word “Mediterranean,” the words “the Black Sea,”—(Mr.
Grant Duff.)

After further debate, Question, “That those words be there inserted,” put, and agreed to.

Question put,

“That the words ‘a Select Committee be appointed to examine and report upon the whole subject of Railway communication between the Mediterranean, the Black Sea, and the Persian Gulf,’ be added to the word ‘That’ in the Original Question.”

The House divided; Ayes 86, Noes 10; Majority 76.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, “to examine and report upon the whole subject of Railway communication between the Mediterranean, the Black Sea, and the Persian Gulf,” —(Sir George Jenkinson.)

And, on July 4, Committee nominated:—List of the Committee ..

SUPPLY—Resolved, That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”—

ARMY—ROYAL ARTILLERY—RESOLUTION—Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that a complete and searching inquiry be at once instituted into the state of the Regular Artillery Forces of Her Majesty’s Army, both as regards organization and efficiency, by means of a Royal Commission or such other court of inquiry as Her Majesty’s Government may see fit to appoint,”— (Major Arbuthnot.)—instead thereof

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—After short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”—

THE POPE’S JUBILEE—Observations, Mr. Whalley ..
[House counted out.]

LORDS, MONDAY, JUNE 26.

Earl de Grey and Earl of Ripon, K.G., having been created Marquess of Ripon was (in the usual manner) introduced.

Owens College Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Lord President); read 1st (No. 211) ...

Judicial Committee of Privy Council Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Lord Chancellor); read 1st (No. 212)

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, MONDAY, JUNE 26.		Page
ABOLITION OF THE HERRING BRAND—GOVERNMENT OF THE NETHERLANDS— Question, Mr. Macfie; Answer, Viscount Enfield	556
IRELAND—NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS—LABOURERS' HOUSES—Questions, Sir Frederick W. Heygate; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington ..	556
ARMY—THE HOUSEHOLD REGIMENTS—Question, Lord Garlies; Answer, Mr. Cardwell	557
RECEIVER GENERAL OF INLAND REVENUE—Question, Sir Charles W. Dilke; Answer, Mr. Gladstone	558
EDUCATION—INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS—Question, Mr. J. G. Talbot; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster	558
THE REVISED STATUTES—Question, Mr. Tomline; Answer, Mr. Gladstone ..	559
ARMY—MILITIA OFFICERS—Question, Mr. J. S. Henry; Answer, Mr. Cardwell	560
Elections (Parliamentary and Municipal) (re-committed) Bill [Bill 103]—
Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [22nd June], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair;" and which Amendment was, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Cross),—instead thereof	560
After long debate, Debate further adjourned till Thursday next.
Promissory Oaths Bill (Lords) [Bill 169]—
Order for Committee read:— Moved , "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair"	637
Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be committed to a Select Committee,"—(Mr. Newdegate),—instead thereof.
Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After short debate, Amendment, by leave, with- drawn .
Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to :—Bill considered in Committee, and reported , without Amend- ment; to be read the third time upon Thursday.
Tramways Provisional Orders Confirmation (re-committed) Bill [Bill 197]—
Bill considered in Committee	639
After short time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.
Sale of Liquor on Sunday Bill [Bill 48]—
Order for Committee read:— Moved , "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair"	641
Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson),—instead thereof.
Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"— Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"— (Mr. Monk):—Motion, by leave, withdrawn .
Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question":—Question put:—The House divided ; Ayes 51, Noes 69; Majority 18:—Words added :—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to :—Bill put off for three months.
Sea Coast Fisheries (Ireland) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Downing, The Marquess of Hamilton, Viscount St. Lawrence, Colonel Vandeleur); presented, and read the first time [Bill 216]		641

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

LORDS, TUESDAY, JUNE 27.

INDIA—PRESIDENCY OF FORT WILLIAM—Petition presented ..
Moved, "That the said Petition be printed,"—(The Lord Lyveden :)—
 After debate, Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.
 ARMY REGULATION BILL—Question, The Duke of Richmond; Answer, Earl Granville

COMMONS, TUESDAY, JUNE 27.

METROPOLIS—DRINKING TROUGH IN PICCADILLY—Question, Captain Archdall; Answer, Mr. Bruce

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

- (1.) Question again proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £23,078, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for the Buildings of the Houses of Parliament."—After long debate, Question put, and agreed to ...
- (2.) £60,500, to complete the sum for the New Offices in Downing Street. ...
- (3.) £1,150, to complete the sum for the Chapter House, Westminster. ...
- (4.) £11,083, to complete the sum for Sheriff Court Houses, Scotland.—After short debate, Vote agreed to ...
- (5.) £20,500, to complete the sum for the National Gallery Enlargement.—After short debate, Vote agreed to ...
- (6.) £15,500, to complete the sum for Glasgow University Buildings. ...
- (7.) £9,000, to complete the sum for the Industrial Museum, Edinburgh. ...
- (8.) £30,500, to complete the sum for Burlington House. ...
- (9.) £123,995, to complete the sum for the Post Office and Inland Revenue Buildings. ...
- (10.) £3,970, to complete the sum for the British Museum Buildings. ...
- (11.) £36,460, to complete the sum for County Courts, Buildings. ...
- (12.) £42,547, to complete the sum for the Science and Art Department Buildings.—After short debate, Vote agreed to ...
- (13.) £97,200, to complete the sum for Surveys of the United Kingdom, &c. ...
- (14.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £52,476, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for constructing certain Harbours, &c. under the Board of Trade" ...
- Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £21,483, for Alderney Harbour, be omitted from the proposed Vote,"—(Mr. Bentinck.)—After short debate, Question put, and agreed to.
- Original Question, as amended, proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £30,993, &c." ...
- Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £1,815, for the Works Department, be omitted from the proposed Vote,"—(Mr. Hermon.)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn :—Original Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.
- (15.) £450, to complete the sum for Portland Harbour. ...
- (16.) £7,500, to complete the sum for the Fire Brigade (Metropolis). ...
- (17.) £27,223, to complete the sum for Rates on Government Property.—After short debate, Vote agreed to ...
- (18.) £122,465, to complete the sum for Public Buildings (Ireland). ...
- (19.) £3,976, to complete the sum for the Ulster Canal. ...
- (20.) £13,810, to complete the sum for Lighthouses Abroad. ...
- (21.) £800, to complete the sum for the Embassy Houses, Paris and Madrid.—After short debate, Vote agreed to ...
- (22.) £36,215, to complete the sum for British Consulate and Embassy Houses, Constantinople, China, Japan, and Tehran.—After short debate, Vote agreed to ...
- Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £257,972, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for Superannuation and Retired Allowances to Persons formerly employed in the Public Service."—Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
- (23.) £34,910, to complete the sum for the Merchant Seamen's Fund. ...
- (24.) £27,200, to complete the sum for Relief of Distressed Seamen Abroad. ...
- (25.) £14,533, to complete the sum for Hospitals in Ireland. ...
- (26.) £4,863, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Charitable Allowances (Great Britain). ...
- (27.) £4,735, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Charitable Allowances (Ireland). ...

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 27.]

Page

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Committee—continued.

- (28.) £10,942, to complete the sum for Temporary Commissions.
- (29.) £85,147, to complete the sum for Payments under Treaties of Reciprocity.
- (30.) £850, to complete the sum for Flax Cultivation in Ireland.
- (31.) £3,245, to complete the sum for certain Miscellaneous Expenses.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

It being now Seven of the clock, the House suspended its sitting.

The House resumed its sitting at Nine of the clock.

PRIVATE BILL LEGISLATION—MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE—

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the present system of legislation as regards Local and Personal Bills, and to consider whether means may not be devised for the improvement of such legislation,"—(Mr. Pim) ...

686

After short debate,

[House counted out.]

LORDS, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 28.

Their Lordships met;—and having gone through the Business on the Paper, without debate—

[House adjourned.]

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 28.

Registration of Deeds, Wills, &c. (Middlesex) Bill [Bill 36]—

Order for Committee read ..

696

Moved, "That the Order for going into Committee on this Bill be discharged,"—(Mr. G. B. Gregory.)

After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Order discharged:—Bill withdrawn.

Railway Companies Bill [Bill 5]—

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [15th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time;" and which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months,"

—(Mr. Leaman):—Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question:"—Debate resumed ..

698

After short debate, Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn:—Bill withdrawn.

Parish Churches Bill [Bill 53]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. West) ..

700

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months,"—(Mr. Cawley):—Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

After short debate, Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn:—Bill withdrawn.

Burials Bill [Bill 7]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 7th June] ..

717

After short time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

Royal Parks Bill—Ordered (Mr. Ayrton, Mr. Baxter); presented, and read the first time [Bill 217] ...

723

LORDS, THURSDAY, JUNE 29.

Judicial Committee of Privy Council Bill (No. 212)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d,"—(The Lord Chancellor) ..

724

After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 29.]

Page

UNITED STATES—TREATY OF WASHINGTON—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty conveying the deep regret felt by this House at Her Majesty's having been advised to sign a Treaty with the United States which is unbecoming the honour and dignity of this country,"—(The Lord Oranmore and Browne) ... 729
After short debate, on Question? Resolved in the Negative.

Union of Benefices Acts Amendment Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Lord Bishop of Winchester); read 1st (No. 219) ... 741

COMMONS, THURSDAY, JUNE 29.

ELECTIONS (PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL) BILL—ILLITERATE ELECTORS
—Question, Mr. Dixon; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster .. 742
EDUCATION—NATIONAL SCHOOLS—BUILDING GRANTS—Question, Mr. Sartoris;
Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster .. 742
ARMY—CADETS AT SANDHURST—Question, Colonel North; Answer, Mr.
Cardwell .. 743
IRELAND—MASTER FITZGIBBON—Question, Mr. W. H. Gregory; Answer,
Dr. Ball .. 743
ARMY—COLONEL PROBYN—Question, Sir John Pakington; Answer, Mr.
Cardwell .. 744
ARMY—HOUSEHOLD REGIMENTS—Question, Lord Garlies; Answer, Mr.
Cardwell .. 745
UNITED STATES—TREATY OF WASHINGTON—Questions, Mr. Anderson;
Answers, Viscount Enfield, Mr. Gladstone .. 745

Elections (Parliamentary and Municipal) (re-committed) Bill [Bill 103]—

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [22nd June], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair;"
and which Amendment was, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Cross),—instead thereof.
Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—Debate resumed .. 746 After long debate, Moved, "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr.
Fielden):—Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 218, Noes 340; Majority 122.
Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned," —(Mr. Knight):—Question put, and negatived.
Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—The House divided; Ayes 324, Noes 231; Majority 93.
Division List, Ayes and Noes .. 858
Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to:—Bill considered in Committee.
Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Tuesday next, at Two of the clock.

LORDS, FRIDAY, JUNE 30.

EMANUEL HOSPITAL—PETITION PRESENTED—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—

A Petition of the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of the City of London against the proposed scheme of the Endowed Schools Commissioners, presented by the Duke of Richmond, read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 30.]

Page

EMANUEL HOSPITAL—PETITION PRESENTED—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—continued.

Moved , that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, representing that the proposed scheme of the Endowed Schools Commissioners for the management of Emanuel Hospital in the parish of Saint Margaret in the city of Westminster will have the effect of diverting a large portion of the endowments of the said hospital from the education of the poor to which they were assigned in the charter of foundation, and of withdrawing the government thereof from the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of the city of London against whose management no charge has been established; and praying that Her Majesty will withhold Her assent from the said scheme,—(The Marquess of Salisbury)	862
After long debate, on Question? their Lordships divided ; Contents 64, Not-Contents 56; Majority 8:— Resolved in the Affirmative .
Division List, Contents and Not-Contents	891
Ordered, That the said Address be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

SAINT MARGARET'S HOSPITAL AND THE GREY COAT HOSPITAL—

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will withhold Her assent from the schemes of the Endowed Schools Commissioners relating to Saint Margaret's Hospital and the Grey Coat Hospital,—(The Marquess of Salisbury)	892
After short debate, Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(The Lord Cairns :)—After short interruption, Motion withdrawn .
After further short debate, on Question, Whether to agree to the said Address? Resolved in the Affirmative .
Ordered, That the said Address be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

COMMONS, FRIDAY, JUNE 30.

POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT—PAY OF POSTMASTERS, &c.—Question, Lord George Hamilton; Answer, Mr. Monsell	902
ARMY—ROYAL ARTILLERY—GOOD CONDUCT MEDALS—Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor; Answer, Captain Vivian	903

Army Regulation Bill [Bill 39]—

Moved , "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration"	904
Amendment proposed,
To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is inexpedient to consider the Bill, as amended, until the whole of the scheme of the Government for the first appointment, promotion, and retirement of Officers, together with an estimate of its probable or possible ultimate cost, have been laid upon the Table,"—(Lord Elcho),—instead thereof.
After short debate, Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to .
Main Question, "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration," put, and agreed to :—Bill considered	921
New Clauses moved, and negatived ; new Clauses added .
Bill to be read the third time upon Monday next.
It being now Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:"—

ABYSSINIAN WAR—PRIZE—THE ABANA'S CROWN AND CHALICE—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon Monday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of an humble Address to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to direct that the Abyssinian Abanas Crown and Chalice captured at Magdala by the force under General Lord Napier of Magdala, shall be purchased for the Nation, and to assure Her Majesty that this House will make good the expense of the same,"—(Colonel North),—instead thereof	939
--	-----

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 30.]

Page

SUPPLY—ABYSSINIAN WAR—PRIZE—continued.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—After short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to issue instructions for the negotiation of such a Treaty with the Sultan of Zanzibar, as will relieve Her Majesty's Government from existing arrangements, by which they are made parties to the Slave Trade; and that She will use all lawful means to procure the entire suppression of the Slave Traffic and all export of Slaves from the East Coast of Africa,"—(Mr. Gilpin),—instead thereof 952

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—After short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

And, on July 6, Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the whole question of the Slave Trade on the East Coast of Africa, into the increased and increasing amount of that traffic, the particulars of existing Treaties and Agreements with the Sultan of Zanzibar upon the subject, and the possibility of putting an end entirely to the traffic in slaves by sea,"—(Mr. Gilpin :)—List of the Committee 957

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," by leave, withdrawn :—Committee deferred till Monday next.

Prayer Book (Tables of Lessons) Bill (Lords) [Bill 181]—

Bill, as amended, considered 957

After short debate, Bill read the third time, and passed, with Amendments.

Election Commissioners Expenses Bill—Ordered (Mr. Winterbotham, Mr. Secretary Bruce); presented, and read the first time [Bill 220] 961

LORDS, MONDAY, JULY 3.

TICHBORNE v. LUSHINGTON—Petition presented (The Earl of Derby) .. 961
After short debate, Petition read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

EMANUEL HOSPITAL—SAINT MARGARET'S HOSPITAL AND THE GREY COAT HOSPITAL—Her Majesty's Answers to the Addresses of Friday last reported 962

ADMIRALTY ADMINISTRATION—Question, The Duke of Somerset; Answer, The Earl of Camperdown :—Short debate thereon 963

ARMY (RECRUITING, &c.)—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copies of instructions issued on the subject of recruiting during the last three years, showing the changes in the age, standard, height, and the mode of taking the chest measurement :

Copies of instructions to medical officers regarding the examination of recruits and manner of testing their vision :

Extracts from the last monthly returns of regiments of infantry, showing the ages of the non-commissioned officers and men in each regiment or battalion, and their length of service :

Copies of correspondence with the commanding officers of regiments or battalions relating to the disadvantages of the youth of soldiers enlisted during the last three years : And also,

Returns showing the numbers of recruits who were passed into the service, and of men discharged therefrom, during each of the months from 1st April 1870 to 31st March 1871, —(The Lord Strathnairn) 976

After debate, Motion agreed to.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, MONDAY, JULY 3.		Page
TICHBORNE V. LUSHINGTON—Question, Mr. Osborne; Answer, Mr. Bruce ..		995
NAVY—ARMAMENT OF IRON-CLADS—CAPTAIN SCOTT'S GUN-CARRIAGES— Questions, Mr. J. D. Lewis; Answers, Mr. Goschen ..		997
SECRET SERVICE MONEY—Question, Mr. Rylands; Answer, Viscount Enfield ..		999
EDUCATION—NATIONAL SCHOOLS—Question, Mr. Welby; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster ..		999
SPURIOUS TEA—Question, Mr. G. B. Gregory; Answer, Mr. Chichester Fortescue ..		1000
INDIAN ENGINEERING COLLEGE, COOPER'S HILL—Questions, Mr. Fawcett; Answers, Mr. Grant Duff ..		1000
METROPOLIS—ST. JAMES'S PARK—Question, Lord Ernest Bruce; Answer, Mr. Ayrton ..		1001
NAVY—H.M.S. "AGINCOURT"—Questions, Sir James Elphinstone, Sir John Hay; Answers, Mr. Goschen ..		1002
Army Regulation Bill [Bill 39]—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read the third time,"—(Mr. Cardwell) ..		1002
Amendment proposed,
To leave out from the word "Bill" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "having been narrowed to an object which will entail on the Country an ascertained expenditure of several millions, besides a large permanent charge of which no estimate has been submitted, this House is unwilling thus to add to the pressure of existing tax- ation by entering on a course of unknown expenditure; and, declining to commit itself by premature action, awaits from Her Majesty's Government a mature and compre- hensive scheme of Army Reform calculated to place the military system of the Country on a sound and economical basis,"—(Mr. Graves),—instead thereof ..		1003
Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After long debate, Question put:—The House divided ; Ayes 289, Noes 231; Majority 58.
Main Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read the third time, and passed . Division List, Ayes and Noes ..		1073
Lunatics (Ireland) Bill— Ordered (Sir Dominic Corrigan, Mr. McClure, Mr. Plunket); presented , and read the first time [Bill 222] ..		1077
Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Bill—Resolution agreed to , and reported :— Bill ordered (Mr. Chichester Fortescue, Mr. Arthur Peel); presented , and read the first time [Bill 221] ..		1077
LORDS, TUESDAY, JULY 4.
Army Regulation Bill—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read 1 ^a ,"—(The Lord Northbrook) ..		1077
After debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 1 ^a , and to be printed . (No. 237.)
Justices of the Peace Qualification Bill (No. 188)—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read 2 ^a ,"—(The Earl of Albemarle) ..		1080
After short debate, Motion and Bill (by Leave of the House) withdrawn .
Prevention of Crime Bill (No. 207)—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read 2 ^a ,"—(The Earl of Morley) ..		1082
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 ^a accordingly, and com- mitted to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.
Judicial Committee of Privy Council Bill (Nos. 212-233)—
Amendments reported (according to Order) ..		1090
After short debate, further Debate adjourned to Thursday next.
Factories and Workshops Act Amendment Bill [H.L.]— Presented (The Earl of Morley); read 1 ^a (No. 239) ..		1096

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, JULY 4.		Page
NAVY—H.M.S. "AGINCOURT"—Questions, Lord Robert Montagu, Sir John Hay; Answers, Mr. Goschen		1096
Elections (Parliamentary and Municipal) (re-committed) Bill [Bill 103]—
Bill considered in Committee [Progress 29th June]		1097
Moved , "That the Preamble be postponed."
Moved , "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair,"—(Mr. Joshua Fielden .)
After long debate, It being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair, to report Progress:—Committee to sit again this day .
EAST INDIA (NAWAB NAZIM)—MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE—
Moved , "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into all Treaties and Agreements entered into between the East India Company, or any person on their behalf, with the Nawab Nazim of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, or his predecessors, and to ascertain whether such Treaties and Agreements have been faithfully observed by the said Company and by the Indian Government, and to what claims, if any, the present Nawab Nazim and his family may be entitled under and by virtue of such Treaties and Agreements,"—(Mr. Haviland-Burke)		1139
After debate, Question put:—The House divided ; Ayes 64, Noes 122; Majority 58.
University Tests (Dublin)—
Resolved , That this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee to consider the abolition of Tests and the alteration of the constitution of the Governing Body in Trinity College and the University, Dublin,—(Mr. Fawcett)		1163
Moved , "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."
After short debate, Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Brady):—Question put:—The House divided ; Ayes 14; Noes 102; Majority 88.
Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to :—Matter considered in Committee.
Resolved , That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to abolish Tests and to alter the constitution of the Governing Body in Trinity College and the University, Dublin.
Resolution reported:—Bill ordered (Mr. Fawcett, Mr. Plunket, Dr. Lyon Playfair, Viscount Crichton); presented , and read the first time [Bill 226.]
Glebe Loan (Ireland) Act (1870) Amendment Bill—Ordered (The Marquess of Harrington, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Mr. Baxter); presented , and read the first time [Bill 225]		1165
Epping Forest Bill—Ordered (Mr. Ayrton, Mr. William Henry Gladstone); presented , and read the first time [Bill 224]		1165
Salmon Fisheries (Ireland) (No. 2) Bill— Presented , and read the first time [Bill 227]		1165

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, JULY 5.

Church Rates Abolition (Scotland) Bill [Bill 52]—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. M'Laren)		1166
After debate, Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months,"—(Mr. Gordon)		1183
After further short debate, Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question:—"The House divided ; Ayes 121, Noes 76; Majority 45:—Main Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for this day two months.
Registration of Partnerships Bill [Bill 86]—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Norwood)		1185
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for this day two months.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 5.]

Page

Tithe Rentcharges (Ireland) Bill [Bill 132]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Heron) .. 1194
After short debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Bagwell):—Motion agreed to:—Debate adjourned till Wednesday next.

Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment (No. 2) Bill—Ordered (Sir Thomas Bazley, Viscount Sandon, Mr. Dixon, Mr. Carter); presented, and read the first time [Bill 228] ... 1196

Public Libraries Act (1855) Amendment Bill—Ordered (Mr. J. G. Talbot, Mr. George Gregory, Mr. Lyttelton); presented, and read the first time [Bill 239] ... 1196

LORDS, THURSDAY, JULY 6.

Union of Benefices Acts Amendment Bill (No. 219)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Bishop of Winchester) .. 1197
Bill read 2^a (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

Burial Grounds Bill (Nos. 181-231)—

House in Committee (according to Order) .. 1197
Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Monday next.

Prayer Book (Tables of Lessons) Bill—

Commons' Amendments considered (according to Order) .. 1201 Moved, "That their Lordships do agree to the Commons' Amendments,"—(The Lord Chancellor):—After short debate, Motion agreed to.

Judicial Committee of Privy Council Bill (Nos. 212-233)—

Adjourned debate on Amendment moved on Report [July 4] resumed (according to Order) .. 1203
Amendments made:—Standing Orders Nos. 37 and 38 considered (according to Order) and dispensed with; Bill read 3^a; an Amendment made; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons; Bill to be printed, as amended (No. 246.)

Statute Law Revision Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Lord Chancellor); read 1^a (No. 242) 1215

COMMONS, THURSDAY, JULY 6.

THE DIPLOMATIC SERVICE—Question, Mr. Baillie Cochrane; Answer, Viscount Enfield .. 1215

MINISTER AT STUTGART—Question, Mr. Rylands; Answer, Viscount Enfield .. 1216

ARMY—REVIEW AT BUSHEY PARK—Question, Major Arbuthnot; Answer, Sir Henry Storks .. 1216

THE ORDER OF THE BATH—Question, Lord Richard Grosvenor; Answer, Mr. Goschen .. 1217

IRELAND—MAGISTRATES OF DUNGANNON—Question, Lord Claud Hamilton; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington .. 1218

CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—Question, Sir Herbert Croft; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer .. 1219

HOLIDAYS OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYES—Question, Sir John Lubbock; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer .. 1220

TURKEY—CASE OF MR. JOSEPH WILLIAMS—Question, Lord George Hamilton; Answer, Viscount Enfield .. 1220

SUNDAY OBSERVANCE ACT—Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor; Answer, Mr. Bruce .. 1221

ARMY—FIELD ARTILLERY—Question, Colonel Gilpin; Answer, Sir Henry Storks .. 1222

EPPING FOREST ENCLOSURES—Question, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson; Answer, Mr. Bruce .. 1223

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 6.]

I

BLACKWATER BRIDGE—Question, Mr. Hunt; Answer, Mr. Gladstone ..	11
TICHBORNE v. LUSHINGTON — Question, Mr. A. Seymour; Answer, Mr. Bruce ..	12
DIPLOMATIC CHANGES—Observations, Mr. Gladstone ..	12
Elections (Parliamentary and Municipal) (re-committed) Bill [Bill 103]—
Bill considered in Committee [Progress 4th July] ..	122
Moved, “That the Chairman do now leave the Chair,”—(Mr. Newdegate :) —After long debate, Question put:—The Committee divided ; Ayes 63, Noes 154; Majority 91.
Clause 1 (Short title) ..	125
Clause 2 (Regulations as to election and nomination of members) ..	125
After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.
Local Government Board Bill—Ordered (Mr. Stansfeld, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. William Edward Forster); presented, and read the first time [Bill 230] ...	1277
MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (BOROUGH FUNDS) BILL—Select Committee nominated:—List of the Committee ..	1277

LORDS, FRIDAY, JULY 7.

PUBLIC SCHOOL COMMISSIONERS SCHEME—HARROW SCHOOL—Question, The Duke of Abercorn; Answer, Viscount Halifax :—Short debate thereon	1277
ISLE OF ALDERNEY—FORTIFICATIONS—MOTION FOR A RETURN—
Moved, “That there be laid before this House, Return of expenditure incurred since the year 1850 on the Fortifications in the Isle of Alderney,”—(The Duke of Somerset) ..	1282
After short debate, Motion agreed to .
RAILWAYS (IRELAND)—MOTION FOR RETURNS—
Moved that there be laid before this House, Return of the various corporations, boards, and other public bodies in Ireland, including meetings of counties and towns convened by lawful authority, which have expressed to the Irish Government or to the Treasury their desire for an alteration of the present system of management of the Railways of that country since the first of January 1866 : Also, Copy of a Memorial on the same subject, signed by many Peers and Members of the House of Commons, and presented to the Treasury,—(The Marquess of Clanricarde) ...	1286
After short debate, on Question ? Resolved in the Negative .

COMMONS, FRIDAY, JULY 7.

ARMY—ROYAL WARRANT FOR PAY, &c.—Question, Colonel North; Answer, Captain Vivian ..	1288
POOR LAW REMOVAL—Question, Mr. G. Bentinck; Answer, Mr. Stansfeld ..	1288
COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE—Questions, Mr. Norwood, Mr. Hermon, Lord John Manners; Answers, Mr. Gladstone ..	1289
Elections (Parliamentary and Municipal) (re-committed) Bill [Bill 103]—
Bill considered in Committee [Progress 6th July] ..	1290
Clause 2 (Regulations as to election and nomination of members.)
After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.
ARMY (SERVICE ABROAD) — Her Majesty's Answer to Address [20th June], reported ..	1314
HARROW SCHOOL — Her Majesty's Answer to Address [20th June], reported ..	1314

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 7.]

Page

It being now Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read ; Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair :"—

ARMY—COMPULSORY SERVICE—

Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, to place the country in a state of permanent security, it is necessary to establish our military system on the basis of recognizing the obligation of all citizens to defend their Country, and of fitting them by training for the discharge of their duty,"—(Mr. O'Reilly) ... 1315
[House counted out.]

LORDS, MONDAY, JULY 10.

ARMY REGULATION BILL—Notice (The Duke of Richmond) .. 1315

IRELAND—MEATH AND WESTMEATH ELECTIONS—STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES —Observations, Question, Lord Dunsany ; Reply, Lord Dufferin :—
Short debate thereon .. 1316

WAR OFFICE—REWARDS TO INVENTORS—ADDRESS FOR PAPERS—

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for,
1. The documents submitted to the Committee that decided on Captain Scott's claims, and the subsequent correspondence thereon :
2. Correspondence between Mr. Lynall Thomas and the War Office, from 29th March 1871 to the present time :
3. Correspondence relative to Major Palliser's claims to certain inventions adopted into all the heavy wrought-iron guns of the service known as the "Woolwich guns," and also to the system upon which all the heavy projectiles in the service are studded,—(The Earl of Denbigh) ... 1321
After short debate, Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

Ecclesiastical Titles Act Repeal Bill (No. 184)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Lord Chancellor) .. 1332
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

Factories and Workshops Act Amendment Bill (No. 239)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Earl of Morley) .. 1334
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

Pedlars Certificates Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Earl of Morley) ; read 1^a (No. 252) 1335

COMMONS, MONDAY, JULY 10.

REGISTRARS OF DEEDS FOR MIDDLESEX—Question, Mr. Cubitt ; Answer, The Attorney General .. 1336

ARMY—MILITIA DRILL—Question, Major Walker ; Answer, Mr. Cardwell 1337

ARMY—DIRECT COMMISSIONS—Question, Major Gavin ; Answer, Mr. Cardwell .. 1337

ARMY—DISCHARGE OF BAD CHARACTERS—Question, Mr. Stapleton ; Answer, Mr. Gladstone .. 1337

METROPOLIS—ST. STEPHEN'S CRYPT—Questions, Mr. W. Lowther ; Answers, Mr. Ayrton .. 1338

IRELAND—PARTY TUNES—Question, Mr. Wingfield Verner ; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington .. 1339

BETTING ADVERTISEMENTS—Question, Mr. Anderson ; Answer, Mr. Bruce 1339

METROPOLITAN POLICE—POLICE CONSTABLE JOHN M'CONNELL—Question, Mr. Eykyn ; Answer, Mr. Bruce .. 1340

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 10.]

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) BILL—Question, Mr. Campbell; Answer, Mr. Gladstone

IRELAND—A ROYAL RESIDENCE IN IRELAND—Question, Mr. Stacpoole; Answer, Mr. Gladstone

EPPING FOREST—DISTURBANCES AT WANSTEAD FLATS—Question, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson; Answer, Mr. Bruce

POST OFFICE—POSTAL COMMUNICATION WITH THE UNITED STATES—Question, Sir Thomas Bazley; Answer, Mr. Gladstone

ARMY—ARMY AND MILITIA RECRUITING—Question, Mr. M. T. Bass; Answer, Mr. Cardwell

PARLIAMENT—KNIGHTS OF SHIRES—DISQUALIFICATION OF “MEN OF THE LAW”—Questions, Observations, Mr. Tomline; Reply, Mr. Speaker

Moved, “That this House do now adjourn,”—(Mr. Tomline :)—After short debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 13, Noes 236; Majority 223.

Elections (Parliamentary and Municipal) (re-committed) Bill
[Bill 103]

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 7th July] 1

Clause 2 (Regulations as to election and nomination of members.)

Clause 3 (Regulations as to polling) 1

After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Metropolitan Tramways Provisional Orders Suspension Bill—Ordered (Mr. Chichester Fortescue, Mr. Arthur Peel); presented, and read the first time [Bill 236] 1

East India (Bishops' Leave of Absence) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Grant Duff, Mr. Adam); presented, and read the first time [Bill 237] 1

Intoxicating Liquors Licences Suspension Bill—Ordered (Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. Winterbotham); presented, and read the first time [Bill 234] 1

Sunday Observation Act Amendment Bill—Ordered (Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. Winterbotham); presented, and read the first time [Bill 235] 1

Customs and Inland Revenue Bill—Acts read; considered in Committee; Resolution agreed to, and reported:—Bill ordered (Mr. Baxter, Mr. William Henry Gladstone); presented, and read the first time [Bill 238] 1

LORDS, TUESDAY, JULY 11.

Public Libraries (Scotland) Act (1867) Amendment Bill
(No. 241)—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2^a,”—(The Earl of Airlie) 1

After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Ecclesiastical Titles Act Repeal Bill (No. 184)—

House in Committee (according to Order) 1

After short time spent therein, Bill reported, without Amendment, and to be read 3^a on Thursday next.

CHILDREN'S EMPLOYMENT COMMISSION—BRICKFIELDS—THE FACTORY ACTS—
MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to take into Her consideration the state of the children in the brickfields as reported by the Commissioners in 1864, with a view to their being brought under the protection of the Factory Acts,—(The Earl of Shaftesbury) 1

After debate, Motion agreed to.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
[July 11.]
RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE DARDANELLES—Question, Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe; Answer, Earl Granville	1412

ROYAL SCHOOL OF MINES—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that a letter addressed by Sir Roderick Murchison to the Privy Council, enclosing a letter from the officers of the Royal School of Mines relative to the proposed transference of that institution to South Kensington, may be laid before this House,—(The Marquess of Salisbury)	1412
After short debate, Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn .

COMMONS, TUESDAY, JULY 11.

ARMY—CAMPAIGN MANŒUVRES IN THE AUTUMN—Question, Sir Harry Verney; Answer, Sir Henry Storks	1414
CHAIN CABLES AND ANCHORS—Question, Mr. Grieve; Answer, Mr. Chichester Fortescue	1415
IMPORTATION OF CATTLE—Question, Mr. Samuda; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster	1416

Elections (Parliamentary and Municipal) (re-committed) Bill [Bill 103]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 10th July]	1417
Clause 3 (Regulations as to polling.)
After long time spent therein, It being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to report Progress.

It being now Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

NAVY—ADMIRALTY ADMINISTRATION—RESOLUTIONS—

Moved , "That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the Board of Admiralty be discontinued; and that the offices of Controller and Superintendent of Her Majesty's Dockyards be held by persons who have special knowledge of the duties they have to discharge, and that their tenure of office be not limited to a term of years,"—(Mr. Seely)	1445
After debate, Question put:—The House divided ; Ayes 30, Noes 110; Majority 80.

LEGAL EDUCATION—RESOLUTIONS—

Moved , "That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that a General School of Law should be established in the Metropolis, in the government of which the different branches of the legal profession in England may be suitably represented; and that, after the establishment thereof, no person should be admitted to practise in any branch of the legal profession, either at or below the Bar, or as an attorney or solicitor in England, without a certificate of proficiency in the study of Law, granted after proper examinations by such General School of Law,"—(Sir Roundell Palmer)	1482
Moved , "That the debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Jessel) Debate adjourned till To-morrow .

ROYAL PARKS AND GARDENS BILL—

Select Committee nominated :—List of the Committee	1501
---	------

Treasurers of Rates Bill [Bill 120]—

Order for Committee read:— Moved , "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair"	1501
[House counted out.]

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, JULY 12.

Habitual Drunkards Bill [Bill 38]—

Moved , "That the Bill be now read the second time,"—(Mr. Donald Dalrymple)	1501
---	------

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 12.]

1

Habitual Drunkards Bill—continued.

After debate, Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day three months,”—(Colonel Barttelot) .. 15
Question proposed, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question :”
—After further debate, Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn :
—Bill withdrawn.

Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment Bill [Bill 67]—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Mr. Dixon) .. 151
Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day three months,”—(Mr. Collins.)
After debate, Question, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question,” put, and negatived :—Words added :—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to :—Bill put off for three months.

Local and Personal Acts (Ireland) Bill [Bill 26]—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Mr. Heron) .. 1539
After short debate, Moved, “That the debate be now adjourned,”—(Mr. Bouverie :)—Motion agreed to :—Debate adjourned till Wednesday, 9th August.

Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act (1869) Amendment Bill—Ordered (Mr. Henderson, Mr. Crawford, Mr. Eustace Smith, Mr. Bowring) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 241] 1543

Irish Church Act (1869) Amendment Bill—Ordered (Mr. Heron, Mr. Bagwell) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 244] 1543

Maynooth College Bill—Ordered (The Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 243] 1543

LORDS, THURSDAY, JULY 13.

Army Regulation Bill (No. 237)—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2^a,”—(The Lord Northbrook) .. 1544
Amendment moved, to leave out from (“That”) to the end of the motion for the purpose of inserting the following words :

(“This House is unwilling to assent to a second reading of this Bill until it has laid before it, either by Her Majesty’s Government or through the medium of an inquiry and report of a Royal Commission, a complete and comprehensive scheme for the first appointment, promotion, and retirement of officers ; for the amalgamation of the Regular and Auxiliary Land Forces ; and for securing the other changes necessary to place the military system of the country on a sound and efficient basis,”)—(The Duke of Richmond) 1566

After long debate, on the Motion of the Duke of CAMBRIDGE, the further debate adjourned till To-morrow.

Charitable Donations and Bequests (Ireland) Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Lord O’Hagan) ; read 1^a (No. 258) 1621

COMMONS, THURSDAY, JULY 13.

PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS—Question, Mr. A. Russell ; Answer, Mr. Baxter 1621

OFFICE OF JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL—Question, Lord Eustace Cecil ; Answer, Mr. Gladstone 1622

ARMY—CAMPAIGN MANŒUVRES IN THE AUTUMN—Question, Mr. F. Stanley ; Answer, Mr. Cardwell 1622

VISIT OF THE IMPERIAL CROWN PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF GERMANY—Question, Mr. Monk ; Answer, Mr. Gladstone 1623

THE CIVIL LIST—SELECT COMMITTEE, 1837-8—HER MAJESTY’S HOUSEHOLD—Question, Mr. Dixon ; Answer, Mr. Gladstone 1624

NAVY—MR. CUNNINGHAM’S INVENTIONS—Question, Lord Henry Scott ; Answer, Mr. Goschen 1626

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 13.]	Page
ARMY — REVIEW IN BUSHY PARK — Questions, Major Arbuthnot, Lord Elcho; Answers, Sir Henry Storks ..	1627
POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPH SYSTEM—Question, Mr. Whatman; Answer, Mr. Monsell ..	1629
ARMY—COMPETITIVE EXAMINATIONS FOR WOOLWICH—Question, Mr. Heygate; Answer, Mr. Cardwell ..	1630
PROTESTANT CEMETERY AT FLORENCE—Question, Mr. Kinnaird; Answer, Viscount Enfield ..	1631
SOUTH AFRICAN DIAMOND FIELDS—Question, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answer, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen ..	1631
IRISH BUSINESS — Question, Sir Frederick W. Heygate; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington ..	1632
INHABITED HOUSE DUTY—Question, Mr. Mundella; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1633
GIBRALTAR—ALIENS—Question, Sir John Gray; Answer, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen ..	1633
ARMY AND NAVY ESTIMATES—Question, Observations, Mr. G. Bentinck; Reply, Mr. Gladstone ..	1634
Moved , "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Bentinck:)—After debate, Question put, and negatived .
Elections (Parliamentary and Municipal) (re-committed) Bill [Bill 103]—
Bill considered in Committee [Progress 11th July] ..	1646
Clause 3 (Regulations as to polling).
After some time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.
New Mint Building Site (re-committed) Bill [Bill 223]—
Bill considered in Committee ..	1675
Moved , "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair,"—(Mr. Charley:)—
After short debate, Question put:—The Committee divided ; Ayes 118, Noes 95; Majority 23. [No Report.]
Turnpike Acts Continuance, &c. Bill—Ordered (Mr. Winterbotham, Mr. Secretary Bruce); presented, and read the first time [Bill 247] ...	1678
Endowed Hospitals (Scotland) Bill—Ordered (The Lord Advocate, Mr. Adam); presented, and read the first time [Bill 248] ...	1678

LORDS, FRIDAY, JULY 14.

Army Regulation Bill (No. 237)—
Debate on the Amendment on the Motion for the Second Reading [July 13] resumed ..	1679
After long debate, on the Motion of The Lord ABINGER, the further debate on the said Motion adjourned to Monday next.

COMMONS, FRIDAY, JULY 14.

NAVY—SUPERINTENDENTS OF DOCKYARDS—Question, Mr. Seely; Answer, Mr. Goschen ..	1744
Elections (Parliamentary and Municipal) (re-committed) Bill [Bill 103]—
Bill considered in Committee [Progress 13th July] ..	1744
Clause 3 (Regulations as to polling.)
After some time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.
It being now Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.
The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 14.]

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”—

IRELAND—RAILWAYS—MOTION FOR A PAPER—Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “there be laid before this House, a Copy of the Memorial, signed by seventy-eight Peers and ninety Irish Members of Parliament in 1869, in favour of the recommendations of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the condition of the Irish Railways in 1868, together with Copy of the Memorials and Resolutions praying for the reform of the Irish Railway system adopted at public meetings throughout Ireland, presented to the present Government since their accession to office,”—(Mr. William Ormsby Gore,)—instead thereof ... 1

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—After debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,” put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That a sum, not exceeding £268,122, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for Public Education under the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland” ... 178

After short debate, Moved, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,”—(Mr. Bentinck:)—Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 44, Noes 68; Majority 24.

Original Question again proposed:—Moved, “That the Chairman do now leave the Chair,”—(Mr. Raikes:)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 63, Noes 26; Majority 37:—Resolution to be reported.

The Clerk at the Table informed the House, That Mr. Speaker was unable to return to the Chair during the present sitting of the House.

Whereupon, Mr. Dodson, the Chairman of Ways and Means, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next; Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

Feudal and Burgage Tenure (Scotland) Bill—Ordered (The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. Adam); presented, and read the first time [Bill 251] ... 1792

HABITUAL DRUNKARDS—

Select Committee appointed, “to consider the best means of dealing with Habitual Drunkards,”—(Mr. Donald Dalrymple) ... 1792

LORDS, MONDAY, JULY 17.

CHILDREN’S EMPLOYMENT COMMISSION—Her Majesty’s Answer to the Address of Tuesday last reported .. 1792

Army Regulation Bill (No. 237)—

Debate on the Amendment on the Motion for the Second Reading [July 13] resumed .. 1792

After long debate, on Question, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Motion? their Lordships divided; Contents 130; Not-Contents 155: Majority 25:—Resolved in the Negative.

Then Motion, as amended, agreed to.

Division List, Contents and Not-Contents .. 1868

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, MONDAY, JULY 17.		Page
IRELAND—ASSISTANT BARRISTERS—Question, Sir Frederick W. Heygate;
Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland	..	1871
PARLIAMENT—HOUSE OF COMMONS POST OFFICE—Question, Mr. Assheton
Cross; Answer, Mr. Monsell	..	1871
ARMY RECRUITING—Question, Colonel Sykes; Answer, Captain Vivian	..	1871
UNIVERSITY REFORM—Questions, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, Mr. Spencer
Walpole, Mr. Beresford Hope; Answers, Mr. Gladstone	..	1872
RAILWAYS—THE ROPE SYSTEM—Question, Mr. Eastwick; Answer, Mr.
Chichester Fortescue	..	1874
VACCINATION CONTRACTS—Question, Mr. Heygate; Answer, Mr. Stansfeld	..	1875
PARLIAMENT—KNIGHTS OF SHIRES—DISQUALIFICATION OF "MEN OF THE LAW"—Question, Mr. G. B. Gregory; Answer, The Attorney	..	1875
General	..	1877
CUSTOM HOUSE CLERKS—Question, Mr. Pim; Answer, Mr. Baxter	..	1877
REV. D. SMYTH—SIEGE OF PARIS—Question, Mr. Cadogan; Answer,
Viscount Enfield	..	1878
THE LATE CONSUL AT RESHT—Question, Sir John Hay; Answer, Viscount
Enfield	..	1879
ARMY—THE JOBSON FUSE—Question, Mr. Lea; Answer, Sir Henry Storks	..	1879
NAVY—CHAIN CABLES—Question, Mr. Cawley; Answer, Mr. Goschen	..	1880
PARLIAMENT—RULES AND PRACTICE OF HOUSE—POWER OF THE CLERKS AT THE TABLE TO ALTER NOTICES—Question, Mr. Tomline; Answer, Mr.
Speaker	..	1880
Moved , "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Tomline .)
After short debate, Motion negatived .
IRELAND—ROYAL MILITARY SCHOOL, DUBLIN—Question, Sir John Gray;
Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	..	1885
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES COMMISSION—Question, Mr. Baines; Answer, Mr.
Bruce	..	1886
PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—Observations, Mr. Disraeli	..	1887
Statement of Mr. GLADSTONE:—Motion pro forma , "That the Order of the Day for the re-committal of the Debtors (Ireland) Bill be discharged:"
—Debate thereon	..	1887
Debtors (Ireland) Bill [Bill 171]—
Moved , "That the Order of the Day for the re-committal of the Debtors (Ireland) Bill be discharged,"—(Mr. Gladstone)	..	1887
After short debate, Bill withdrawn .
Elections (Parliamentary and Municipal) (re-committed) Bill
[Bill 103]—
Bill considered in Committee [Progress 14th July]	..	1903
Clause 3 (Regulations as to polling.)
After some time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow , at Two of the clock.
SUPPLY—REPORT—Resolution [July 14] reported	..	1918
"That a sum, not exceeding £268,122, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for Public Education under the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland."
After short debate, Resolution agreed to .
Sunday Observance Prosecutions Bill [Bill 235]—
Order for Second Reading read	..	1923
After short debate, Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday .
Public Lands and Commons Bill—Ordered (Sir Charles Dilke, Mr. Taylor, Mr.
Morrison); presented , and read the first time [Bill 252]	...	1924 Small Debts, &c. (Ireland) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, The
Marquess of Hartington); presented , and read the first time [Bill 253]	...	1924

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

LORDS, TUESDAY, JULY 18.

Page

Private Chapels Bill (No. 96)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Lord Lyttelton) .. 1924
After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Charitable Donations and Bequests (Ireland) Bill (No. 258)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Lord O'Hagan) .. 1928
After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Statute Law Revision Bill (No. 242)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Lord Chancellor) .. 1929
Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

Prevention of Crime Bill (No. 248)—

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) (according to Order) .. 1930
Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Thursday next; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 266.)

COMMONS, TUESDAY, JULY 18.

ARMY—OVER-REGULATION PRICES—Notice, Sir George Grey .. 1934

POST OFFICE — POSTAL CARDS — Question, Mr. Dickinson; Answer, Mr. Monsell .. 1934

ARMY—CLAIMS OF INVENTORS — Question, Mr. O'Reilly; Answer, Mr. Cardwell .. 1935

POST OFFICE—REMUNERATION OF POSTMASTERS FOR TELEGRAPH DUTY—
Question, Mr. Grieve; Answer, Mr. Monsell .. 1935

Elections (Parliamentary and Municipal) (re-committed) Bill [Bill 103]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 17th July] .. 1936
Clause 3 (Regulations as to polling).

After some time spent therein, It being now ten minutes to Seven of the clock, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

[House counted out.]

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, JULY 19.

Registration of Parliamentary Voters Bill [Bill 19]—

Order for Committee read .. 1951
Moved, "That the Order for going into Committee be discharged,"—
(Mr. H. R. Brand.)

Motion agreed to:—Order discharged:—Bill withdrawn.

Registration of Voters (No. 2) Bill [Bill 22]—

Bill considered in Committee .. 1952
After some time spent therein, Bill reported; to be printed, as amended [Bill 256]; re-committed for Tuesday next.

APPENDIX.

LORDS.

MONDAY, JUNE 26.

Earl De Grey and Earl of Ripon, K.G., having been created Marquess of Ripon—
Was (in the usual manner) introduced.

SAT FIRST.

FRIDAY, JUNE 23.

The Lord Howard de Walden, after the Death of his Father.

MONDAY, JULY 10.

The Earl of Aylesford, after the Death of his Father.

REPRESENTATIVE PEER FOR IRELAND (Writ and Return.)

TUESDAY, JULY 11.

The Lord Ventry.

COMMONS.

NEW WRIT ISSUED.

MONDAY, JULY 3.

For County Monaghan, v. Charles Powell Leslie, esquire, deceased.

NEW MEMBERS SWORN.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 14.

Stafford County (Western Division)—Francis Monckton, esquire.

THURSDAY, JULY 6.

Westmeath—Patrick James Smyth, esquire.

HANSARD'S
PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES, IN THE
THIRD SESSION OF THE TWENTIETH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, APPOINTED TO MEET 10 DECEMBER, 1868, AND THENCE CONTINUED TILL 9 FEBRUARY, 1871, IN THE THIRTY-FOURTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

FOURTH VOLUME OF THE SESSION.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 14th June, 1871.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—Francis Monckton, esquire, for Stafford County (Western Division).

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Glasgow Boundary*; Sasines Register (Scotland)*.

Second Reading—Endowed Schools Act (1869) Amendment [55], put off; Landrights and Deeds (Scotland)* [84]; Primitive Wesleyan Methodist Society of Ireland Regulation* [143].

Select Committee—Metropolis Water (No. 2)* [166], nominated.

Report—Tramways Provisional Orders Confirmation* [130-197].

Third Reading—Ecclesiastical Titles Act Repeal* [164], and passed.

Withdrawn—Medical Act (1858) Amendment [72]; Medical Act (1858) Amendment (No. 2)* [73].

VOL. COVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACT (1869) AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 55.]

(Sir John Lubbock, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, Mr. Thomas Hughes, Mr. Rathbone.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK rose to move that the Bill be now read a second time. He said that the main object of the measure was to repeal the religious restrictions contained in the Endowed Schools Act, 1869. That Act was passed partly on account of the very great abuses which had crept into the management of endowed schools, but mainly because it was felt that the whole system needed revision, and especially that many of the smaller foundations might advantageously be combined together; that where several schools co-exist in one town, at present acting independently of each other, it was desirable that they should in some cases be united, in others be adapted to different educational grades, and occupy a definite position in relation to one another. Many schools, however, were excluded from the provisions of the Act, with the effect, in the opinion of many, of considerably curtailing the benefits intended to be given by it. In the first place, the Commissioners could only deal with any endowments originally given to charitable uses more than 50 years before the passing of the Act. Those who introduced that Bill accepted the 50 years as a reasonable period, but they saw no magic in the year 1869, and they proposed to make the 50 years a running period, authorizing the Commissioners to deal with any endowed school which had been in existence 50 years. If the limit was right in 1869, it must be right in 1871. If the Endowed Schools Act had passed this year, the limit would have been 1871 instead of 1869. He now passed to their second proposal. Clause 14 of the Endowed Schools Act, which they proposed to repeal, excluded from the operation of the Act all Quaker schools, all Moravian schools, all cathedral schools, and all schools forming part of the foundation of any college in Oxford or Cambridge. As regarded the Quaker or Moravian schools, it was only fair to say that they heard no complaints of them; but they objected on principle that certain schools should be excepted, not because they were good, but because they belonged to Quakers or Moravians. Whether, however, those schools, or any of them, should on other grounds be excluded was a question not of principle but of detail, and could best be discussed in Committee. He passed on, therefore, to the next and most important provision of the Bill. The House would remember that, by Clause 17 of the Endowed Schools Act, it was provided that the religious opinions of any person, or his attendance or non-attendance at any particular form of religious worship, shall not in any way affect his qualification for being one of the Governing Body of any endowment. But Clause 19 excluded from the operation of that clause all cathedral schools, and—

B

“All educational endowments the scholars educated by which are required by the express terms of the original instrument of foundation, or statutes or regulations made by the founder under his authority, in his lifetime, or with years after his death (which terms have been served down to the commencement of this to learn or be instructed according to the trines or formularies of any particular Church, sect, or denomination.”

Now, it was extremely difficult to ascertain whether a given school came within that clause or not. He was not on point speaking without personal experience. Last Session an Address presented to Her Majesty requested Her Majesty to refer back the statute of certain public schools to the Public School Commissioners, in order that the Commissioners might apply that clause in framing the new statutes for the schools. To that Her Majesty graciously consented, and, as one of the Commissioners, it became therefore his duty to consider that matter. To take, for instance, the case of Harrow, which has been before the House on the previous evening, it seemed to him that it was most difficult to decide whether it was covered by the clause or not. Nor was that by any means an exceptional case. He was informed that there were some scores of cases now before the Endowed Schools Commission, as regards which two perfectly reasonable men might come to opposite conclusions; in many of which, therefore, undoubtedly law suits would arise, the expenses of which would doubtless be paid out of the endowment. But, further, to bring a school within the clause, the terms laid down by the founder must have been observed down to the present time. That was surely a most inequitable provision. While restraining the deliberate and well-considered action of Commissioners, carefully selected for their wisdom, their character, and their acquaintance with the position and functions of endowed schools, it not only absolved, but justified and adopted changes which had crept in through the negligence, the incompetence, or the mala fides of accidental trustees; it perpetuated the changes made through ignorance, neglect, or accident, while forbidding any alteration which was well-considered and adopted after mature deliberation. But where the operation of the clause was clear, it in many cases led to very great inconvenience. For instance, Bristol had about 20 endowments, with an income, in round numbers, of £17,000 a-year. It would manifestly be very advantageous to bring these schools under one management; that would result in greater economy, greater harmony, and probably better management; but it was prevented by Clause 19. At Leicester, again, there was a very similar state of things. He would not weary the House with other examples, but rested this portion of his case on the opinions of three Gentlemen pre-eminently qualified above all others to speak on that point—namely, Lord Lyttelton, Mr. Hobhouse, and Canon Robinson, the Endowed Schools Commissioners, whom he had consulted, and who had favoured him with their views on the subject. Thus it would be seen that all three Commissioners, not speaking, indeed, officially, but expressing their individual opinions, characterized the clause as arbitrary, inconsistent, and inconvenient; two of them wished to see it repealed, and the third, while approving the theoretical principle on which it was based, was unable to defend it on account of the great inconvenience it involved. They had it, then, on the highest authority, that the effect of Clauses 14 and 19 was to exclude a large proportion of endowments from the operation of the Act, and to that extent to leave matters as they were before the Endowed Schools Act was passed. What, then, was that condition? The Endowed Schools Act was passed because a thorough change was imperatively required. At one school, which had an income of £300 a-year, and where the children were clothed as well as taught, the trustees paid the master £30 a-year, the mistress £15, and distributed £78 a-year among the parents for allowing the children to come to school. Huntingdon School, with a comfortable boarding-house, an ample detached schoolroom, a good cricket-ground, and three masters, had only 16 pupils; and even as regards them, we are told that their knowledge of all but elementary subjects appeared to be worthless. At Normanton School, the Assistant Commissioner found 11 children following their own devices, while the master was reading Bell's Life. At Bosworth, with a net income of £792 a-year, there were three boarders only. At Thame, with an endowment of £300 a-year and two masters, there was only one scholar. The late master of Whitgift's Hospital at Croydon held the post for 30 odd years, and never had a pupil the whole time. The School Inquiry Commissioners reported other cases, which, however, he would not occupy the time of the House by quoting. It was, moreover, evident that the law could do little to remedy that state of things. Berkhamstead School, for instance, was in Chancery for 125 years, during which there were three decrees, five Masters' reports, and 14 orders in Chancery. At Kirkleatham, again, there was no school for 50 years; the lady of the manor occupied the building and paid the income of £50 a-year to her steward. At last the Court of Chancery interfered and approved a scheme, but no one communicated it to the trustees, and for 10 years nothing was done, until the state of things was brought to light by an accident. Of course these were exceptional cases; but under the head of "wasted endowments" the School Inquiry Commissioners placed foremost "those endowments for education which are too small to be of any real service by themselves." They state—

Sir John Lubbock

"The small endowments described in the second chapter, consisting of a few pounds a-year, without even a building for a school, can be made of no use, except by consolidation or enlargement. Wherever there are several such endowments in one town or parish, they ought to be united, the trustees of each being represented on the joint trust."

And, again, in the concluding pages, they recommended that when there were in any one town or parish more than one educational endowment, they ought to be brought into relation with each other, and they said that it constantly happened that such endowments, though capable, if worked in concert, of conferring great benefits on the place, were either useless, or even mischievous, because they were divided; and that the endowments would do far more good if so managed as to work in harmony. He did not rely mainly on individual cases of abuses for proposing this alteration of the law, because it was only fair to say that as regarded the great number of the endowed schools, those who had the management of their funds had acted to the best of their ability, and he should be sorry to be supposed to be casting a slur on those gentlemen who had taken part in the management of these institutions. If it was argued that they had no right to alter the dispositions of testators, he could not do better than quote the words of one whose opinion would be received with respect by all sides in that House—Lord Hatherley, who, in answer to Lord Lytton, said—

"I think there ought to be a power of revision after a certain number of years—any 50 years—of any charitable disposition a person may choose to make of his property, because you do not allow a man to dispose of his property in favour of his great grandchildren; he cannot do it for more than a life in being and 21 years after that."

And the Endowed Schools Commissioners, all men of the highest eminence, quoted with approval a passage from the Report of the Popular Education Commissioners, in which it was stated that—

"The power of posthumous legislation exercised by a founder in framing statutes to be observed after his death is one which must, in reason, be limited to the period over which human foresight may be expected to extend. . . . By the law of England, and by the law of nature, a man is incapable of making a perpetual disposition of his property. The State suffers him to exercise an indefinite power over the land for the purpose of foundation; and in so doing it is not only entitled but bound to secure the interests of future generations, which can be done only by retaining the power of modifying the founder's regulations, when necessary, to suit the requirements of succeeding times."

If it was said that such a measure as that now proposed would tend to discourage future endowments, he would only reply that it would be well to check foolish testators from tying up their property, and that wise ones would be glad to feel that their dispositions would be modified from time to time, so that their liberality might produce the greatest amount of good. Moreover, the fact was that from the nature of things the schools were altered. There were very few schools indeed in the statutes of which large alterations had not already been made. Mr. Fearon, who carefully examined into that point, could not find one single school in his district which was exactly what the founder meant it to be. These alterations had sometimes arisen from mere neglect, and sometimes been made by the Court of Chancery; but they had been so large and so numerous that to allow them to stand, and refuse to change any further really meant that they were to pay respect to changes introduced by chance or carelessness, or at best on very imperfect information, but to refuse to introduce those which a general and systematic survey of the facts showed to be really needed. The present Bill, if adopted by the House, would still leave testators ample—nay extraordinary—powers. They would still be able to regulate the expenditure of money for 50 years—for no less than half-a-century—after their death. In other matters it was universally admitted that the dead could not be permitted to tyrannize over the living; that property was not the property of the dead, but of the living; and that each generation should be allowed to manage its own affairs. In family arrangements they knew that settlements were limited to lives in being and 21 years afterwards; and the "dead hand" had become proverbial. There were, no doubt, many who regarded endowments for religious education as something sui generis, and who thought it sacrilege to touch any such bequests; yet some of those legacies would be admitted, on all hands, to be useless or even mischievous. Years ago a sum of money was left to found an annual Walloon sermon at Norwich; such a sermon was preached every year, and, for aught he knew, might be so still; yet, no one at Norwich now spoke Walloon, nor could any English clergyman be found who was acquainted with that dialect, so that the preacher learned the sermon by heart, and solemnly delivered in church a discourse which no one, not even he himself, could understand. Again, some years ago, a sum of money was left to be spent in propagating Joanna Southcote's peculiar tenets. In consequence of some informality that will was happily set aside, and now scarcely any one believed in Joanna Southcote; but if there were an endowment of £10,000 a-year to support her views, no doubt a certain number of persons would persuade themselves that they did. He presumed they would all admit that such an endowment as that would be simply mischievous. But an opinion which after 50 years' nursing had acquired so little strength or vitality that it could not maintain itself, must be either erroneous or, at any rate, unsuited to the mental condition of those to whom it had been taught. There was an old saying that Magna est veritas et prevalebit; and it was true that the progress of mankind was towards truth; but that progress was slow; the majority of nations were far indeed from enlightened views on religious matters; and, in our own case, if 20 theological systems were taught by endowments, they tended to strengthen and artificially prolong the existence of 20 systems, 19 of which were necessarily wrong. In fact, endowments for the maintenance and propagation of particular opinions were peculiarly mischievous, and everyone would admit that that was the case as regarded every such system except his own. Endowments in support of religion—endowments which tended to raise the character without fettering the intellect of man—stood, of course, on a very different footing from endowments in favour of a particular set or system. In science they had chairs—say of geology or astronomy; but no one dreamt of founding endowments to support particular theories or systems. Everyone admitted such endowments would retard the progress of science and injure the very cause they were intended to serve. They had realized the truth that it was wrong to persecute those who differed from them; they had still to learn that it was equally mischievous to bribe. Such a course tended to degrade and corrupt truth, and to poison religion at the very source. He should regret if the Government felt it to be their duty to oppose the Bill, because the measure now before the House did but carry out and apply to endowed schools the principle of the University Tests Bill—a principle so often affirmed in that House by overwhelming majorities. Moreover, the Government had themselves brought in a Bill—the Charity Commissioners Bill—which went beyond anything contained in the present measure. The Government proposed that, if the Charity Commissioners found that from any cause any given charity was productive of inconsiderable benefit, they might frame any scheme which they might deem best calculated to further the general objects for the promotion of which the charity was founded; and especially, under Clause 6, charities might be consolidated. Thus, then, he proposed to do in the case of schools exactly that which the Government themselves thought was right in regard to other charitable foundations. Perhaps he might be told that the Endowed Schools Act was a compromise, but he would urge on the House that since that Act became law the condition of things had been altogether altered by the passage of the Elementary Education Act. Since the duty of providing for the elementary education of the people had been thrown on the ratepayers, endowments devoted to the maintenance of elementary education practically tended in the main, not to promote education, but to lighten rates. That was a very desirable object no doubt; everyone was anxious to lighten rates, but this ought not to be done at the expense of education. The Elementary Education Act had, in fact, given to such funds an effect never dreamt of by the founders. It appeared to him, then, that the present measure should be supported alike by those who held most strongly the inviolability of endowments, and by those who wished to see them applied, and, if necessary turned, to the best account. How, then, could they best be utilized? Most of those who took an interest in education would agree with a Resolution proposed by the Bishop of Exeter, at a county meeting held in that city, and supported by many influential Conservatives, namely—

Sir John Lubbock

“ That the educational organization of the county, so far as endowed schools are concerned, should consist of schools of different grades, so connected together by exhibitions, that the progress of the deserving scholar from a school of the lower grade to one of a higher grade may be provided for and facilitated.”

The main object of the present Bill was to render that possible, and he hoped therefore it might receive some support from hon. Gentlemen opposite. In the words of Professor Huxley, “we shall thus make a ladder from the gutter to the University,” and though by some that was called spoliation, confiscation, and robbery of the poor, such language could not, he thought, be used by those who really understood what was proposed, as it was obviously for the benefit of the poor; it would throw open these charities to those who really deserved them; the poor would obtain the benefit of those endowments as the reward of industry rather than of solicitation, by their own merits and not by the favour of others. Genius was found alike in all ranks and classes of the community; even now it had in some cases forced a way for itself against all difficulties and obstacles; but, alas! in others it had unfortunately been lost to them. Under the system which it was the object of the present measure to extend, they would have throughout the country schools of different grades connected together by scholarships and exhibitions; they would thus reward not ability alone but industry as well, and where intelligence and industry went together, every child, no matter what his station in life might be, would have the opportunity of obtaining the best education which the country could afford; an opportunity which would not only conduce greatly to his own advantage, but also, as he believed, to the happiness and prosperity of the whole nation. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

MR. T. HUGHES said, he would second the Motion. He must express his admiration of the scheme of the Endowed Schools Act. It was eminently calculated to raise the higher education of the country to a point which they would all be proud of in the future; but it had been found that the Act contained some clauses which were extraordinary exceptions—which were contrary to the spirit of that measure. He thought 50 years sufficiently long to bind the wishes of any testator; but, if not, he would not object to extending the time to 60 years. He believed the object in view could be best carried out by putting the best men in the country at the head of the foundations, and that was what was being done under the Endowed Schools Act. It would be in entire accordance with the Act to place under them schools of all denominations, and to enable them to deal with any endowments which had been in existence for more than 50 years in such a way as they might think most desirable. It might be said that a great measure which had been so recently passed, as the Act of 1869 had, should not be disturbed. He admitted that to be right as a general rule, but was of opinion that when such a blot in that measure existed as these mischievous tests were, they ought to be removed as soon as possible.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir John Lubbock.)

MR. PEASE, in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time upon that day six months, said, he was of opinion that the cause which both he and the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone had at heart would receive more benefit from the rejection of this measure than it would from its being passed into law. The chief objection which he had to this

Bill was that it proposed to deal with the Endowed Schools Act, which was the result of a compromise that House was bound to respect, and which had been accepted as a final settlement of a most vexed question, in which both sides of the House had taken a very warm and decided interest. And, moreover, the proposal of the hon. Baronet, which would bring any endowment under the provisions of the Act, immediately after such endowment had completed 50 years of existence, and which would both change the Governing Body and the whole scheme of education, would go to the extent of preventing all endowments for the future. The peculiar class of endowed schools with which the hon. Baronet proposed to deal were, as far as educational matters were concerned, actually within the scope of the Endowed Schools Act, the Governing Bodies of such schools alone being exempted from its operation. According to the evidence taken before the Convents Committee, there were 65,000 Roman Catholic children in this country, and 4,000 in Scotland, being educated at schools which would not come under the Endowed Schools Act, or any other Act, because the moneys by which they were supported were applicable to other purposes than the schools, and all training schools for ministers were intentionally omitted from the Act. But under the 14th clause, which the Bill under discussion proposed to repeal, in schools under the Dean and Chapter and schools connected with Quakers and Moravians, the whole scheme of education might be altered and re-modelled, though the Governing Bodies could not be interfered with. There were practically eight schools connected with the Society of Friends, among which was the admirably-conducted Quakers' School at Ackworth, in Yorkshire, which would be affected by this Bill; they afforded accommodation for 812 scholars; they had at present 770 inmates; their annual income was £21,000, of which £3,900 was derived from endowments. The children were educated for about £28 a-head, of which about £3 was supplied by endowments. To make those endowments available for the public was not in accordance with the intention of the founders, or of those who had kept up the schools and had extended their usefulness, and no scheme which could be devised by the Commissioners could make those schools more beneficial for the purpose of education, or could introduce more efficient management. Under this Bill those schools would gradually come within the scope of the Endowed Schools Act, the last one falling in in 1892, and the effect would probably be to diminish the interest taken in these institutions, and to break up their whole machinery of education, which now worked so efficiently and satisfactorily. If denominational endowed schools were to be brought within the operation of the Endowed Schools Act to the extent desired by the hon. Baronet, a certain day ought to be fixed for that change to be carried out generally, instead of such schools being allowed to drop in one by one at the expiration of the 50 years of their existence. It would, at any rate, be advisable, before passing such a measure as this, for Parliament to wait and see whether the schemes to be proposed by the Endowed Schools Commissioners under the Act were acceptable to the country. If the hon. Baronet thought that this measure would do away altogether with the denominational character of the people of this country he was very much mistaken, because the tendency of the general feeling of the people was the other way. If this Bill were to be passed, the practice of holding money for denominational purposes in secret trust, such as was practised by Roman Catholics and Moravians, which was a most objectionable and immoral one, would be largely increased. He thought, moreover, the introduction of the present Bill highly objectionable, seeing that the scheme which it sought to amend had not been fairly tried, having been in operation only two years; and it was calculated to cause a greater evil than it professed to cure.

Sir John Lubbock

MR. GOLDNEY said, he must regard the introduction of the Bill as a misfortune, inasmuch as it was an attempt to tinker the Endowed Schools Act, the whole machinery of which it would throw out of gear. The Act in question had been carefully considered by a Select Committee, and the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Forster) had won his spurs by the courtesy and conciliation he displayed in conducting it through that House. The measure had been accepted by the various denominations as a final settlement of the question, and it would be unfair to reopen it almost before the ink with which the Endowed Schools Act was written was dry. Unless these denominational endowed schools were protected, Parliament would be encouraging the practice of secret trusts, that had been adopted by the Roman Catholics, in order to prevent their endowments from being dealt with by the State. The hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) had ignored the great principle of the Act, and proposed that, though there was no absolute power on the part of the Commissioners themselves to make certain changes, power to do so should be given to the Governing Bodies themselves. Now, he must say, that the schemes which had been framed under the Endowed Schools Act were most admirable; the endowments of Christ's Hospital, for instance, being proposed to be dealt with in such a manner that 5,000 children in the City would be educated by their means. It would be most undesirable to interfere with those schemes, and to unsettle people's minds again upon a subject which had been disposed of by a satisfactory compromise, more especially when everyone was endeavouring to enter into the spirit of the Act, and to carry out its provisions effectually. As to the dress of the Bluecoat School, to which some persons objected, for the last century or more it had been a great police regulation or protection to the Bluecoat scholars throughout that great City, thereby securing their good behaviour, for no instance could be shown of a boy from that school getting into disgrace when rambling about at holiday-time, or out of school-hours. The governors of that school had done everything to promote the education and preserve the health of the scholars. Their health was better preserved than that of the scholars in any public school in the kingdom. If the governors were satisfied with the dress, and the scholars themselves took a pride in it, he (Mr. Goldney) thought no one ought to object to it, unless he could show that some ill result had been occasioned by it. The Act of 1869 ought to have a fair trial. He hoped this Bill would be withdrawn, because he believed it would work unsatisfactorily, and cause very great confusion. He begged, therefore, to second the Amendment of the hon. Member for Durham.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Pease.)

SIR JOHN HANMER said, it would be a great mistake to suppose that the operation of the Endowed Schools Commission had given anything like unqualified satisfaction throughout the country. He trusted that the House would not place more difficulties in the way of the Established Church by passing this Bill, which would enable the Commissioners to extend the benefits of Church of England endowments to Non-conformists and Roman Catholics. The Act of 1869 had produced the greatest dissatisfaction. In rural parishes in his own neighbourhood the greatest apprehension had been caused with reference to small charities that had been enjoyed for two centuries according to the intentions of the founders, by the Commissioners coming down to a great town in the district and threatening that all these small endowments should be diverted from the purposes to which they had been originally devoted, and be made to form part of a fund for the support of a magnificent public educational institution, which they proposed to establish in some central town. Until he had ascertained the objects of the Bill, he entertained the greatest hope that it was a Bill not to enlarge, but to restrict the powers of the Commissioners. The Commissioners had come to the district in which he resided to cast their shoe, as it were, over the whole of it, and make a washpot of every kind of endowment in the rural parishes, for the purpose of establishing another Harrow at Wrexham, in which the shopkeepers, clerks, miners, and colliers in Wrexham were to be taught Greek and Latin at the expense of the inhabitants of all the surrounding humble rural parishes. The trustees of charities that were not devoted to education were told that if they would only be foolish enough to surrender their trusts to the Endowed Schools Commissioners the latter had power to accept those trusts. He knew a clothing charity, the income of which was devoted to the giving of clothing to poor people at Christmas, but if the Commissioners had their way the property of that charity would be devoted entirely to the building of a grand educational establishment at Wrexham entirely objected to that mode of ministering the Endowed Schools. No doubt the Endowed Schools Act good in many respects, and would greatly benefit the cause of education judiciously and carefully administered; but if those who were intrusted with administration set up in their enthusiastic schemes for raising education to a higher pitch than it had ever reached in the country, except, perhaps, in ancient Athens, they would spoil the good the Act might otherwise accomplish. (Sir John Hanmer) himself was attached to the principle that the intentions of founders were not to be respected. Besides the foundations of kings, nobles and others, there were many cases where "John Jones, labourer," or men in similar position in life, had left £100 to their own parishes, and it would be just to apply those endowments to some other place. The argument that because they sought to maintain these small charitable endowments they therefore wanted to save their own pockets was offensive. [Mr. ACLAND: It is true. At any rate, he did not think there was any intention that under the Education Act such endowments should be swept away. He should have great satisfaction in opposing this or any other measure which proposed to increase the power of the Commissioners.]

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he thought, judging from the course of the debate, that no hon. Members were likely to support this Bill, except the hon. Mover and Seconder. And even the hon. Mover himself had failed to show that there was anything in his precipitate and premature amendment of a recent Act to remove the abuses he had enumerated. His object seemed to be to make a raid against the general principle of testamentary disposal of property, and against what some persons had called "superstitious will-worship;" and whose argument seemed to be that reverence could best be shown to the dead by entombing their wills as speedily as their bodies. The effect of the Bill would be to prevent persons leaving any more endowments to schools, with any definite religious intentions, and destroy the last vestige of respect for those which already existed. That would be a very serious result, because there was hardly any motive which induced men to give their property for great national purposes so strong as motives connected with peculiar religious views. And the Bill went still further, for its principles were intended to be of universal application, although such public schools as Harrow and Eton were specially excepted from the Act of 1869. The Select Committee on that Bill was brought to a unanimous conclusion, mainly by the able management of the Vice President of the Council, who presided, and the intention of that Act was as clear as possible. The 14th section, which it was proposed to repeal, provided that no new scheme should interfere with any will or deed made within 50 years of the date of the Act, so that, at least, what had recently been expressed should not be disturbed; and it was also intended that they should depart from the vague method of interpreting wills by inference previously adopted. But the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock), who had entered Parliament since the passing of the Act, proposed to change it within 24 months, and to substitute for a fixed date of non-disturbance a running period, which would produce chronic uncertainty and accumulate litigation for ever. This attack on all specific educational endowments would be welcome by those who wished to do away with denominational schools. [Sir JOHN LUBBOCK said, he had no wish to abolish such schools.] The hon. Baronet's plan for promoting combinations of every species of schools together would have that effect. This Bill was one of those raids against the Church to which they were becoming accustomed. In front of the Church there seemed to have been placed a screen or blind, which was not very effective. It was proposed to sweep into the general scheme the endowments of Quakers and Moravians, which were held to be distinctly private property; and in the same boat with them it was thought the equally private collegiate schools might be quietly swamped. Perhaps the most material portion of the Bill was the proposal to repeal the 19th section of the Act, which provided that no new scheme should interfere with endowments wherever the scholars had been educated upon any particular doctrines or formularies. It was now proposed even to strip them of their speciality. The hon. Baronet observed that, in some cases, the laches of trustees might have caused a break in the continuity of such instruction; and what the carelessness of trustees had allowed, the hon. Baronet recommended that the Commissioners should be bound to do. The proposal to combine educational endowments in one, where there was any specific religious character in the instruction, was, in fact, a proposal to secularize all schools in the kingdom. The Bill would strike a blow at the testamentary disposal of property, and even at the law of evidence; it would prevent further endowments of schools being made by any persons with religious views at heart, and destroy the respect felt by the House for any such past endowments.

MR. WHITBREAD said, the Bill excited great alarm among those whom it affected, and he thought the extension of the powers of the Commissioners would defeat the objects aimed at. He believed that the 50 years' limit was a fair compromise, and that arrangement ought not to be upset. The House had not sufficient experience of the working of the Act. In many agricultural districts and many small towns the people were not yet sufficiently educated to draw fine distinctions between property left for charitable uses and private property, and when they saw endowments handed over to a body of gentlemen sitting in London who were practically irresponsible—[Mr. W. E. FORSTER: No, no!]
—they would imagine that the rights of property were not very sacred. The right hon. Gentleman denied that the Commissioners were practically irresponsible, but a scheme proposed by the Commissioners became law if there was no discussion on it in the House within 40 days after it had been laid on the Table, and what sort of opportunity had the House had this Session of discussing a scheme proposed by the Commissioners? If the Commissioners were not practically irresponsible, let the right hon. Gentleman give the House a day for discussing a scheme proposed by the Commissioners.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he could testify to the patience and ability shown by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Forster), as Chairman of the Endowed Schools Bill Committee, and felt bound to explain that the 13th and 19th clauses of the Act were the result of a compromise. The Act was intended to cure abuses and what a magnificent general scheme of education out of existing endowments for the purpose of improving them. But the Bill which his hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) introduced with the intention of separating the secular and religious endowments of the schools, provided that with reference to the secular endowments of the schools, the Bill should be a complete and final settlement of the whole matter, and that the secular endowments should be kept in the hands of the State, and that the religious endowments should be kept in the hands of the Church. His hon. Friend had said that endowments were made in favour of any particular class of persons, and why should there be any endowment in favour of any particular religion? The answer was, because in the nature of things, the endowment of every religion is by that religion in its word, and that the truth is, it was everlasting. He would from his own experience, and from the life history of a running period of 25 years. He was one of the managers of a school, and he was followed by his mother in the elementary school, and he was a member of the school in which he lived. It had been in existence 25 years, and in this Bill, because he might 25 years hence have taken from him that which had been a great pleasure and glory of his life. Probably every hon. Member knew of similar cases, and he would ask whether it was fair, equitable, or charitable to disturb such arrangements? If such a measure as the present ever became law, it would be the inauguration of a period of inevitable confusion. His hon. Friend had asked what was the magic in the year 1869, but was there no magic in a period of contentment? The Bill passed in that year was one of the most complete Reform Bills ever passed, dealing as it did in the boldest manner with vested interests which the Elementary Schools Act of last year did not touch, and being at once creative and reformatory. In the face of that he would ask his hon. Friend to give people a period of rest, a little breathing time, a little space to see how the scheme would work. If that was done the great streams of charity which for many ages had enriched and fertilized English society would still continue to flow, and the spirit of faith which was their fountain and source would still exist, though under it might be, more enlightened influences than those which had in many cases guided its action. At all events, he trusted the

Mr. Beresford Hope

House would show significantly: did not approve this measure.

Mr. ACLAND, as one who had for three years in the Endowed Schools Inquiry Commission, and had also a witness of the fair and candid spirit of the Members of the Commission, wished to say a few words in support of the Bill of the hon. B. for the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock), who no doubt had brought forward this measure with the best intentions, with a purpose to divide the hon. Baronet's high thinking as to the right views on the separation of secular and religious endowments, which would place it in the same footing as the endowment of a church, which had no right to any case for alteration. He had to show that the Commissioners were engaged in carrying out the Endowed Schools Act by any exception which stood in their way. He knew personally that the proceedings of the Commission, so far from exciting the alarm which the hon. Baronet the Member for the Flint Boroughs (Sir John Lubbock) had stated, had been received in that part of the country which he represented with the general concurrence of all parties, among whom he might mention the Bishop of the diocese, the Lord of Devon, and the right hon. Baronet his Colleague (Sir Stafford Northcote), as well as many other gentlemen who had long attended to their duties as trustees of schools. Some 60 trustees meeting round a table had reasoned themselves into approval of the Act of 1869, and had agreed to accept the scheme of the Commissioners. It appeared to him that all that had been said by the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone, was in favour of the Act of two years ago, and that this Bill would give the Commissioners no assistance whatever. The four schools mentioned by the hon. Baronet, with every detail concerning them, might be brought before the Endowed Schools Commissioners, and they might, as had been said, turn every one of them into a girls' school in the Black Sea. He sympathized with the generous feelings with which the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. B. Hope) was instinct, and he thought the question of small endowments was one that should be most carefully considered. He could not sit down without entering his protest against the tone taken by the hon. Member for the Flint Boroughs, who had talked about an argument as "offensive," upon which he (Mr. Acland) had said that it was true. There were a number of endowments in England which were applied not for the benefit of the poor, but of the rich, and the rich were very fond of fighting their battles behind the shield of the poor. He could put his finger on cases in which the endowments of the poor had been converted to the uses of the rich, and with respect to which he should not perhaps, escape the epithet "offensive" even from hon. Members of that House. He knew himself a case in which the income from the endowment was £270 per annum, and all that came out of it were two primary schools far inferior to those raised by the clergy with the aid of funds provided by Parliament. He admitted there was some fear of the Commissioners treading upon delicate ground when dealing with the smaller endowments; and he most earnestly protested against the notion that to deal with endowments which would save gentlemen from paying their subscriptions, or, if they did not pay, would save their tenants from paying the rate, was confiscation. As to the Commissioners being irresponsible, that certainly was not the case, for they had to submit their proposals to the House, and he earnestly hoped that the fullest opportunity would be given for the discussion of those proposals.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, that there was one argument which, although it had been incidentally mentioned, had not received, in his opinion, the full weight of consideration during this discussion that it merited. He objected to the doing away, or even to any needless extent interfering with the smaller denominational endowments. He spoke in the interests of the very poor, since it was by means of this class of endowments that education was opened at all to the poorest among those above the ranks of actual pauperism. Something had been said early in the debate about throwing open all such endowments to competitive examination. He objected to that; because just in proportion as they placed the disposal of such endowments in the hands of those who insisted upon competitive examination for everything, so did they interfere with the prospects and place difficulties in the way of the poor child who was debarred from, or could not obtain, preliminary education sufficient to enable him to undergo the competitive test. Indeed, it had become a question in his mind whether the competitive examination system had not already been overdone, and he was quite convinced that to insist upon it as applicable to the classes of the poor concerning which he spoke, and whose benefit he advocated, would only have the effect of placing many of them in a position at once unfair and unreasonable. In order to enable a child to undergo a competitive examination with any prospect of success, some expense must previously have been incurred by the parents or friends of such child; but it was well known that in many of these smaller endowed denominational schools the child was taken in its earliest infancy upon what might be called "the foundation," and thus received such education as might be given to it. Something had been said in the course of the debate about the desirableness of making a ladder from "the gutter to the University." He feared that the Bill, if passed, might effectually destroy the first rungs of that ladder, and would thus completely prevent any attempted ascent of it by the very class for whose advantage it was idealized. If these small denominational endowments were treated in the manner proposed, where, he would ask, was the child of poor parents to obtain that preliminary education which alone could enable him to compete? It had been said that the hon. Member for South Durham was the representative in that House of the Quakers. However that might be, he (Mr. Wheelhouse) felt a very strong interest in the well-being of a society which had its scholastic establishment at Fulneck, a place equi-distant between the borough represented by the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council (Mr. W. E. Forster), and the one for which he himself had the honour to sit. The schools of the United Brethren, or, as they were generally termed, Moravians, were conducted in a manner which could leave little to be desired, and everything which had been stated in favour of Ackworth was equally applicable to Fulneck. A good, plain, sound education, based upon the religious principles of the society, was thoroughly imparted, and it would be the subject of sincere regret to him if any legislation were unnecessarily permitted to interfere with the government of an institution so efficiently conducted. Besides this, if the House of Commons were to be called upon to legislate anew, two years only after a compromise most carefully digested had been effected, the result would be to unsettle and unhinge everything so rapidly as to render it utterly useless. It could not be affirmed that the Act which it was now proposed to alter—whether one might agree with its principle or not—was not perfectly just. To show the care and caution which had been brought to bear upon the question during its discussion, he would only ask hon. Members to cast their eyes over the Report of the Committee, and they would be convinced that almost every aspect of the question had been most thoroughly considered, scrutinized, and sifted. Upon what ground, then, was the House now asked to undo the work of that Committee, and the Act founded upon it so far as these two sections were involved? They were sought to be repealed upon the hypothesis that by so dealing with them something would be done to throw all such endowments open to everybody. But he apprehended this would be better effected by keeping the denominational character of the schools clear and pure, than by the proposal of the hon. Baronet. It was true that another hon. Member had characterized this denominational feeling as being allied to what he termed “superstitious will-worship.” But he (Mr. Wheelhouse) took leave to say, that if by the term “superstitious will-worship” was to be understood a respect—or even if you like it, a regard—for the expressed intentions of the founder, all he could state was that he (Mr. Wheelhouse) was old-fashioned enough to participate very largely in such feelings. He believed that the knowledge held by a testator in this country that he could endow a school, impressed with the seal of his own denomination, did preserve, and that to a large extent, the current of benefactions. In proof that the Endowed Schools Commissioners had, or at any rate thought they had, by virtue of the Act as it now stood, ample powers to deal with the larger foundations, there was at that very moment on the Table of the House a scheme with reference to H. Without saying one word in regard to his views as to that particular school he might observe that everyone who had seen the foundation of John Lyons was struck by its strictly denominational character, and he believed generally speaking, that it would be found, as time went on, a spirit of liberality pervaded all such institutions, and that as occasions and necessities arose they would invariably be remodelled, so as to adapt themselves to requirements of the age. But, after he was particularly anxious once more to impress upon the House the fact that there was a class of children who received their primary education from the smallest of these foundations, and would be far greater injury to that class to have such foundations dealt with in the manner proposed by this Bill than it would be to leave them altogether alone.

Mr. Wheelhouse

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he wished to say a few words in support of the Bill, because the voice of not a single hon. Member who had spoken in the course of the debate, except that of the hon. and learned Member for Frome and the hon. Mover, had been raised in its favour. The principle which lay at the root of the measure was one which of late years had been repeatedly acted on in that House; it was the principle of dealing with corporate property for the public benefit. That principle lay at the root of the Irish Church Act, of the Bill which his hon. Friend (Sir John Lubbock) proposed to amend, and of the measure for the abolition of University Tests which was about to become law; and he was therefore surprised to find its rejection moved by an hon. Member sitting on the Liberal side of the House. He was astonished to hear the argument which had been used in regard to corporate property in land after what had occurred in recent years. He had often seen it urged that there might be another class of exceptions—that where the trusts had been faithfully fulfilled, there was a fair ground for exception. He did not deny that there might be such exceptional cases; but there was nothing in this Bill to prevent the Endowed Schools Commissioners from treating these exceptional cases in an exceptional manner. He thought that many of the objections made to the Bill were simply made because hon. Members had not given much attention to it, and had not a very adequate idea of what its objects were. The object of the promoters of the Bill was simply to ask the House to say that these collegiate, University, Quaker, and Moravian schools should be treated in the same manner as any of the other schools that came under the operation of the Endowed Schools Act. In the interests of religion itself, nothing ought to be allowed to interfere with the improvement and progress of education, especially in the primary and middle-class schools, and it was time that Parliament made up its mind on the subject. He, however, did not understand the position taken up by the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Pease), and other hon. Members. Yesterday the University Tests Bill was practically passed by Parliament, and the principles of this Bill were the same as the principles of that. But he hoped that on this, as on other questions, the Bill of a private Member might become the Bill of the Treasury bench, and the minority of to-day become the majority of to-morrow.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he must deny that there was any analogy between this measure and the University Tests Bill, which, to his great satisfaction, had been practically passed in "another place." There was this great difference between the two cases—in the case of the Universities the Government regarded them as national, and wished to see them nationalized; but the exceptions in the Endowed Schools Act of 1869 were made because they referred to certain schools which did not belong to the public, and which it would be unfair to give to the public. The hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock), who introduced this Bill, had shown the abuses which the Act of 1869 was intended to remove, and had mentioned several instances as illustrative of abuses which still existed. But not one of these schools so mentioned by the hon. Baronet would be affected by the present Bill. He had regretted that the hon. Baronet was not in the House at the time the Bill was being discussed, and he was reminded of his regret when listening to the hon. Baronet this morning, because if he (Sir John Lubbock) had been in the House at the time he would not only have given an eloquent support to the Endowed Schools Act, but would have seen the reason for the course then pursued. He had remarked that the schools to which reference had been made were not excepted from the operations of the Endowed Schools Act; and it happened that the Commissioners were quite able to deal with the dress of the boys at Christ's Hospital if they chose, without further powers. This, however, was a small matter; he was not against the dress personally. Many persons believed that the boys were proud of it, and that, considering the temptations of the town, it might be desirable to maintain it. Passing to the Bill of the hon. Baronet, he said the Commission would rather be hindered than otherwise by any change in the term of years, because an alteration in this direction might necessitate a supplementary arrangement in the case of constitutions agreed on this or last year, and it was therefore advisable to adhere to the original date. The exceptions the Bill proposed to repeal were those relating to the cathedral schools and the schools of Quakers and Moravians. The hon. Baronet had said he was astonished to find these schools were exempted from the Act; it was his statement, however, that was surprising, because these schools were not exempted so far as regarded their teaching, the exemption relating solely to the constitution of the Governing Body. The case for excepting the Quaker and Moravian schools was very clear, and rested upon this—A school mainly supported by subscriptions from an existing body for the education of members of their body, but which happened to have some endowments added to it, while remaining subject to the central educational authority, under the direction of Parliament, as to providing a better quality of education, should be allowed to remain in the hands of that body. The noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) had said that the minority of to-day would be turned into the majority of the future; but he (Mr. Forster) maintained that, so long as the Government permitted denominations to make arrangements for the education of the children of their members, the Governing Bodies of these schools should consist of members of the denomination to which they belonged; for instance, it would be unfair to oblige the Quakers' schools to receive among its governors those who were not Quakers. It was upon this principle that Parliament acted in dealing with the Endowed Schools Act, and any other course would, in fact, be giving to the whole community that which was provided by and only intended for a part, and no one could say there was any justice in acting in that manner. As regarded the cathedral schools, he denied that the conclusion arrived at was a compromise. An alteration had been made in the original Bill, but it was made in the direction desired by the hon. Baronet. As originally introduced, the Bill excluded the cathedral schools altogether; but an influential deputation interested in these schools desired that they should be included, not because they wanted the government taken from the Dean and Chapter, but because they wanted the assistance of the Government and the Commissioners to help them in improving the education at these schools. Their desire was complied with, and that assistance had been given. The schools which were exempted under the subsection were, in fact, not public schools within the real meaning of the term, and it could not be right to take hold of their Governing Body and by that means throw them open to the whole country. With regard to the 19th section of the Act of 1869, which the hon. Baronet proposed to omit altogether, that section followed two or three clauses which affected religious instruction in schools acknowledged to be public schools, and defined the different classes of schools. The hon. Baronet objected to the terms under which the schools were defined in the 19th section, and though he (Mr. Forster) did not hold the definition up as perfect, he did hold it up as one that had received the utmost discussion, and which it would not be just to upset so soon after it had been settled. No doubt it would be easier for the Commissioners and the Government to reform the endowed schools if there were no section 19, and if they could take all schools as public schools, without having to consider which were public and which were not; but they had to deal with facts as they existed. The definition of the 19th section excluded from the position of public schools those schools which had had a special denominational character attached to them by their founder, and which character had remained attached to them down to the present time, and that seemed to be a perfectly fair definition. The proposal of the hon. Baronet to refuse to acknowledge the right of a man to make endowments for the special instruction of a part of the community, and to divert special endowments to the use of the general public, was not in accordance with his notions of justice; the principle involved in such a proposal was very different from that involved in the Endowed Schools Act. The promoters of the legislation of 1869 found that there existed throughout the country a number of public school endowments intended for the public which were either misused or altogether taken from the public, and they wanted to see that they were used aright in the one case, or given back to the public in the other. This was very different from taking endowments not intended for the public and handing them over to the public entirely. The hon. Baronet said he had a common object, and that was to get an effectual reform; but he asked the hon. Baronet whether on grounds of prudence it was wise so shortly after the Commission had been set to work to alter the law under which they were working. The Royal Commission was appointed in 1869; the Bill based on its Report was referred to a Select Committee, and very long discussions upon the matter ensued. Great differences of opinion were expressed because every interest was represented, and there was no doubt that no measure had been passed of late years in which all interests concerned were so fairly considered. The exception which had been made he considered a just arrangement, and in consequence of that just arrangement the Bill passed the Commons unanimously; the Temporary Commission was now at work, and he asked the hon. Baronet whether it was prudent, to say nothing of fair to disturb the law regulating their labours before they had got thorough work? The Commissioners were deciding very important questions, how far certain sections should go, it would be most unwise to alter the terms by which they had been going hitherto. Besides the inconvenience to the Commissioners, a change after so short a time would detract from the stability of the measure and the respect which an Act of the Legislature should be regarded. As the Department which he was connected would have the duty of carrying out the decisions of the Commission, he spoke with some concern upon the subject, because any change now made would materially increase the difficulties connected with the work of the Department, and proportionately obstruct Public Business. Under these circumstances he trusted the hon. Baronet would see the force of the practical objections he had raised and not divide the House.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, it was no use in crying over spilt milk, and it was too late to deplore the language and argument which now, he was sorry to say, they habitually heard from the Treasury bench, and, unfortunately, from his right hon. Friend who had charge of these questions. The speech of his right hon. Friend was an excellent one, but it would have been more consistent if it had come from the Opposition. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members cried "Oh," but unfortunately it was too true that speeches from the Treasury bench of late were usually applauded by the Opposition. That was their experience last Session, and that accounted for the not very encouraging condition of the Liberal party in the country. His right hon. Friend had defended, not the Bill of last Session, but the exceptions contained in that Bill, which were unwise concessions made by the Government to the opposite side of the House. How did his right hon. Friend say these exceptions came in? He (Mr. V. Harcourt) regretted to hear that it was in order that the Bill might pass unanimously.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had made no such statement; he had spoken of the "concessions," as the hon. and learned Member described them, as a just arrangement, and had remarked that, in consequence of that just arrangement, the Bill passed unanimously.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT had understood his right hon. Friend to say that those concessions had been made as a matter of prudence, and that unless that had been done the Bill would never have been passed by the House of Lords, but that was not an argument that should be addressed to the House of Commons. The House of Commons had nothing to do with the question whether a Bill would be carried in the other House. But suppose there had been an endowed school, whose endowment was to be applicable to a particular county or parish, would his right hon. Friend say that the Endowment Bill of last Session would not be applicable to it? He (Mr. V. Harcourt) held that the Bill would apply to it. What the Bill really did, and the concession which a Liberal Government really made, was this—that no school should be meddled with which was of a religiously denominational character. He was entirely at a loss to understand how his right hon. Friend distinguished this Bill from the University Tests Act. Were the endowments of the Universities not destined to a particular part of the nation? They were certainly specially destined, and therefore his right hon. Friend's assertion that no endowment of a particular part of the nation could be dealt with was unfounded. The true principle was that while you did not allow any individual to affect private property beyond a limited period after his death—namely, a life in being and 21 years afterwards—you should adopt a similar rule with regard to property destined for charitable and religious uses, and say that such property should not be tied up for ever, regardless of what changes might meanwhile be made in Church and State, but that the uses for which it was destined should be liable to review after the lapse of 50 years. That was the principle of the Act of 1869, and the principle was as sound now as it was then. A founder ought to be presumed to desire that his endowment should be as useful 50 years after his death as it was at his death. At the latter period he might be the best judge of what was best; but he could not be the best judge 50 years afterwards, and it was not to the advantage of the public, or of any class of the community, that you should stereotype for ever the ideas of a person who lived 50 years ago. When they asked that a principle so reasonable, sanctioned by the House two years ago, should be adopted now, he confessed to a feeling of surprise that it should meet with opposition from a Liberal Government. It was true the Government were supported by some Liberal Members, but by whom? By the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Pease), who was a "chartered libertine" in education, for the interests of his particular denomination were protected by a sub-section in the Act of 1869; by the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), whose motive he would not discuss, for the peculiar circumstances of his town made it natural that he should resist interference with endowed schools; and by the official representative in that House of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners (Mr. Acland). That was the combination of Liberals with Conservatives by which the Bill was to be defeated, and it was well that such a combination should be understood. The hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. B. Hope) had called upon the House not to shake men's confidence in posterity and in the fixity of endowments. After what had occurred within the last few years, the hon. Member must have greater faith than a grain of mustard seed, or else that faith must have been sorely shaken. But he was not surprised at the line taken by the hon. Member. What surprised him were speeches from the Treasury bench, which, if one shut one's eyes, might be supposed to come from the other side of the House. "Give us a little rest," said the hon. Member. Such an appeal from a Conservative was natural. The Conservatives were the party of rest, and it was a good thing that there should be such a party. But the Liberals did not profess to be a party of rest; they were the party of progress; and it was remarkable, therefore, that Liberal Members should be lectured by a Liberal Government, and told that they should rest and be thankful for measures passed some years ago. The tactics of the Ministry seemed to be these—When a considerable measure was under discussion, they told Liberal Members below the gangway—"Better take what you can get. You can amend the Act afterwards. For goodness sake, don't divide now!" Afterwards they said, as in this case—"Don't disturb the settlement!" In that way all the principles of the Liberal party were disappearing. Although no doubt existed that the supporters of the Bill would be beaten, he trusted that the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone would press his question to a division, for they would be beaten in asserting the true principles of the Liberal party; they would be beaten because the Liberal Government would be supported mainly by hon. Gentlemen opposite. They were sent there, however, not for the purpose of voting in majorities, but for the purpose of asserting principles which believed to be sound and true, and time would come when those principles would be accepted and acted upon by the Liberal party in Parliament.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said he hoped when the time came for the Liberal party to assert those principles, the first of the Liberal party, who had just pronounced so spirited an allocution, would be at the head of it. It was not for him to defend the Treasury bench from its attacks, but the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. V. Harcourt) had made a number of assumptions which seemed open to considerable doubt. Like some other hon. Gentlemen, he said "we, the Liberal party," as though the country was at his back. That reminded him of the answer made the other day by a child at one of the London schools. The child was asked where the wind came from, and at first replied "from the country," but immediately afterwards said "from the windmills." In the present instance the windmills fancied that they were the country, and that the wind all came from them. The hon. and learned Gentleman had sent a great blast against the Treasury bench. He (Mr. G. Hardy) wanted to know when the new principle was set up, that whenever there was a new argument advanced by the Government, some one was to get up from below the gangway and blame those above it with having sold themselves to the Conservative party? Every interest had been represented in the Endowed Schools Commission, and he could not admit that right hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House had made any concession with reference to the Bill of last year. What had been granted had been admitted by the President of the Council to be merely an act of justice. Was it to be endured for a moment that enormous schools like those of Mr. Woodward, established for the benefit of a particular class as defined by their religious creed, should be subjected to changes in their Governing Body, upon the constitution of which the whole scheme was based? He admitted that endowments of which the nation was properly the trustee might undergo review, and that endowments should not be allowed to be used against public policy. It was not now necessary to examine how far this doctrine should be carried, but in this particular instance the State was in no way precluded from interfering for the due regulation of the education given in these schools. As to the limit of 50 years, did the hon. and learned Gentleman want this country to be governed by a perpetual Commission, going about seeking what it might devour, after a foundation had lasted 50 years? Such a proposition was absurd and irrational. He would only say that he did not think the hon. and learned Gentleman could be accepted as the representative of Liberalism. Everything illiberal and intolerant which had been attempted to be forced on the religious part of the nation came from that part of the House where he sat, and at the head of those who had attempted to force that illiberality was the hon and learned Gentleman.

Mr. Vernon Harcourt

MR. RATHBONE said, the reason he supported the Bill was because it would effect an improvement, the need of which had been practically experienced, particularly in the case of many of the smaller endowments throughout the country.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, in reply, said, he was informed by those best qualified to form an opinion, that there was no large town in which these endowments existed in which the inconvenience of the clauses now sought to be repealed was not practically felt. As to large schools like those of Mr. Woodward, they would not be touched by the Bill. He believed the time would come when the principle of this measure would receive the full support of the Liberal party.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 64; Noes 222: Majority 158.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Bill put off for six months.

MEDICAL ACT (1858) AMENDMENT BILL.

(Dr. Lush, Mr. Mundella, Dr. Brewer.)

[BILL 72.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

DR. LUSH, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he must explain the circumstances attending the withdrawal of the Bill of last Session, by stating that it was in no respect satisfactory to the profession generally; and since the Government had declined to bring forward a measure this Session, in consequence of the pressure of Public Business, therefore he had brought in the present Bill. The hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Brady) had also introduced a similar measure, so that there were two Bills now before the House. No doubt he (Dr. Lush) brought forward this Bill from a professional point of view; but the interests of the public and the profession were intimately blended together. About 50 years ago considerable alteration was made in the mode of licensing medical men, and by the Act of 1858 a general Medical Council was nominated; but in its nomination the rights of the medical profession were ignored, because the members of the profession had no influence in that nomination. The Council, further, did not possess the confidence of the profession; and really their only power was to tax members of the profession for inserting their names in certain books. That taxation they had exercised to the amount of £60,000, extracted from the pockets of the medical profession, without giving any corresponding advantage. The present Bill was not of his own framing so much as the result of considerable thought on the part of medical men engaged in teaching and in medical literature. The first principle of it was, that the existing Council should be abolished, and the second, that the members of the Council elected in their place should be fewer. Not only was the change to affect the number, but the origin from which they were to spring. The Council under the Bill would be in number 12, instead of 24, and four would be nominated by the examining bodies, four by the Crown, and four by the great body of the profession. The third, and last, provided that before any medical man could practise he should pass one particular examination, representing the minimum of qualification, instead of their being, as at present, 19 examining bodies. Some of the examinations now passed were of a most inefficient character. There were anomalies in the present system; and what reason could there be, he would ask, why the University of Durham, for instance, should have the right to send a representative to the Medical Council? He believed that the standard of medical education had been considerably raised of late years; but there was still great room for improvement, which, he thought, would be likely to continue, so long as the present very inadequate examinations were suffered to exist; and for that reason, if for no other, he trusted the House would consent to give a second reading to the Bill he now proposed.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Dr. Lush.)

MR. JESSEL said, that the present Bill differed in a most important respect from the Government Bill of last year, which did not propose to put into the hands of the Medical Council, however elected, the right to nominate the Board of Examiners, without any security against an abuse of the power. The Bill, in fact, proposed a monopoly of examination, and all monopoly was objectionable; but if it were created, care should be taken to prevent it leading to a position of stagnation. The Bill defined in a positive manner what the examiners were to do, without having regard to the natural progress of science and learning, for an expansive and improvable system was not provided for by the Bill. Many medical men said that there was no confidence in existing examinations; and, indeed, there had been a competition downwards, so as to secure as large a number of persons as possible for examination. In some instances, also, the examiners had a pecuniary interest in the number of candidates passing the examination. Both these things were undoubtedly evils, and were only to be guarded against by making the examinations sufficiently stringent and by preventing the examiners from having a pecuniary interest in the result of the examinations. No doubt the examinations had in modern times been much improved; but what was wanted was a security for progressive improvement in examinations. The moment that you got only one examining body you would lose the probability of obtaining such improvement. He thought that the examiners should not be appointed by the body which would have the control over the examinations of the other medical corporations. If such were the case students would say that these other examinations were controlled by a body which had an interest in preventing persons from entering the medical profession except by passing their own examination. The cardinal point was to secure a thorough examination, and one that would be fair to all; and, above all, the examining Board and the controlling Board should not be composed of the same persons. He thought, too, that no course of study should be compulsory, but that the examination should be so managed as to test the qualification to practise, and that if this were done, it would become immaterial whether the candidate had, or had not, attended certain classes or institutions. Such a system would lead to perfect freedom of teaching, and he believed that great improvement would follow.

DR. BREWER said, that he must confess to a feeling of astonishment at the strange misconceptions which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dover (Mr. Jessel) appeared to entertain on the objects contemplated by the Bill brought in by the hon. Member for Salisbury (Dr. Lush). The hon. and learned Member for Dover charged the promoters of the Bill with the design of perpetuating the abuse whereby the 19 Universities or corporate bodies, who had the legal power of granting degrees and licences to practice in medicine or surgery, were all found competing with each other for candidates; and he rightly attributed to the pecuniary interest involved in securing the largest share of students, a direct inducement to lower the standard of efficiency demanded for obtaining a degree, and thereby lessening the security of the public and depreciating the test which an examination ought to supply. He (Dr. Brewer) could hardly account for the wondrous misapprehension of the object and scope of the Bill which this representation exhibited. Surely the hon. and learned Gentleman had omitted to read the Bill, and had so fallen into the error of attributing to it the very blots of the Act of 1858, at which the Bill before the House aimed, and which it was the special object of its promoters to remove. It had become patent that the actual constitution of the Medical Council was too restricted, and that the unrestricted competition between licensing bodies for the fees and the patronage of students was dangerous to the future success and advancement of medical science, no less than unsatisfactory to the great body of practitioners throughout the country. It was patent that the Council had failed to regulate and control this state of things, and whether the defects were wholly attributed to the constitution of the Council or not, the medical practitioners of the country generally believed that a re-modelling of that body would be required in order to make it harmonize with the other provisions which must form the subject-matter of any good Medical Amendment Act. The Bill provided that the Council should be diminished in number, and that whilst the Government should be empowered to nominate one-third, the old corporations should be represented more as a body of mixed constituencies than by individual representation. But the chief modification in the constitution of the Council would be found in the provision for the direct representation of the medical practitioners throughout the United Kingdom. The hon. and learned Member for Dover rightly apprehended that his suggestion to trust simply to any examination as the test of knowledge, without taking cognizance of the educational training of students, whether that training were picked up in by-lanes and in a helter-skelter manner, or in obedience to a prepared and well-considered system, would not meet with the concurrence of the profession generally, and he (Dr. Brewer) would take leave to point out to the hon. and learned Member one of the most obvious reasons for this dissent. The science of medicine was not a certain science. It was unlike chemistry, astronomy, and mathematics, and it formed one of a group of uncertain sciences, requiring more of the individual and affording less assistance from positive knowledge than any of the certain sciences supplied. Consequently the instrumentation of the mind—so to say—the excellence of the result of training on the individual was of greater consequence than any mere technical knowledge or special train of facts. The reliability to be placed in the medical practitioner arose far more from the flexibility of his mental operations, the use he had of the processes of thought, the exercises of his mental faculties, than on any mere glibness in answering medical queries, or even in knowing the physical framework, or symptoms of morbid structures of the body. It was, in fine, the instrumentation of the mind rather than the mere knowledge of facts which made a great physician. Therefore, it was of no slight and secondary consequence that a good course of study and a competent body of professors and teachers should form a prominent part in any scheme which aimed at elevating the standard of medical education. He was not sanguine enough to believe that the Bill before the House would or could pass as it stood. He was not prepared to say that there were not some serious defects, and more serious omissions in its provisions; but the object the promoters of the Bill had in view, was to pass the second reading with the express understanding that it should subsequently be referred to a Select Committee upstairs, where evidence might be invited into the undoubted defects of the law as it existed—into the proposed constitution of the new Council—into the best method of forming an examining board—into the nature of inspection required to secure a due care in conducting the examination, and, in fine, to show by what modification of its provisions, or by what additional precautions or suggestions, material might be collected for the preparation of a Bill for medical reform, which should secure what the hon. and learned Member desiderated—that which the Government Bill of last year failed to assure—and that which must be the common aim of the promoters of this Bill and of all earnest medical reformers, a better supply of competent practitioners, through the means of a higher standard of excellence in medical study and medical examinations. If the hon. and learned Member were sincere in his deprecation of the abuses to which he pointed, and desired the reforms which he had suggested, he would undoubtedly succeed in both these objects far better by sending this Bill to a Select Committee upstairs, than by the course, which through misconception of the aims of the Bill, he had foreshadowed.

Dr. Lush

Dr. LYON PLAYFAIR: The cognate Bills of the hon. Members for Leitrim (Mr. Brady) and Salisbury (Dr. Lush) have a double purpose—they aim at reforming the constitution of the Medical Council, and they desire to give a national security for the theoretical and practical knowledge of licentiates in medicine. Their purposes are not new to this House, for it is now a period of 40 years since our attention was first directed to the subject-matter of these Bills. After numerous and vain attempts at legislation, the Act of 1858, founded on compromises, was passed. By that Act the Medical Council was instituted, its object being to enable "persons requiring medical aid to distinguish qualified from unqualified practitioners." Its primary object, as thus defined, was for the protection of the public, and yet, by an anomaly, the public were not called upon to pay for their own protection, but the expense of working the Act was thrown upon the very qualified practitioners, against whom the public required no protection. Such an Act could not work without friction. The general practitioners of the country, on receiving the licence to practice, were taxed for the support of the Medical Council, on which, in defiance to all principles of taxation, they were not directly represented. The Council was composed of representatives of medical corporations and Universities. The representatives are selected by their executive Governing Bodies, and not by the licentiates or graduates, as they might even now be without new legislation. In the fact that the only entrances into the medical profession are through 19 portals leading out of the medical corporations, there is a slight, though not a popular, representation of the licentiates of medicine. But if, as these Bills propose, all these corporation portals are to be closed and entrance to the profession is only to be attained by a single portal, guarded by a national board, or by three portals of a like kind, every kind of representation, close or open, is cut off between the future licentiates and the Medical Council. My hon. Friends have seen this, and have been forced by this circumstance to include in their Bills two objects of a different character. The constitution of the Medical Council is one thing; the mode by which the qualifications of medical practitioners is to be ascertained is another. Both subjects were important; but each is so large and affects so many existing interests, that it would less encumber the path of medical reform if they were dealt with in separate Bills. At all events, past reformers have been unable to secure such support for both subjects as to enable them to carry their measures. Even Government last year found the necessity of asking our attention to one part of the question—the admission of licentiates—leaving the constitution of the Medical Council for future consideration. I feel the difficulty even in addressing the House. I cannot resist, and have no desire to resist, the claims of the medical practitioners to a direct representation on the Medical Council, and I even grant that they should have a preponderating representation upon it, so long as they are taxed for its support; but it is a question of public policy whether they should be so taxed. The Medical Council is primarily established—not to protect members of a profession in their class interests, but to protect the public from unskilled medical practitioners. If the protection of the public be the real raison d'être for this Council, its expenses should be borne by the public and not by the profession. But if this be done, then the constitution of the Council should have more of a public and less of a professional character. In such a case there ought to be a lay element in the Council, because the representation of public interests becomes a more important question than the representation of professional interests. The latter should, no doubt, be represented also, but in a subordinate degree to that which they have a right to ask as long as the cost of the Council is met by the taxation of new entrants into the profession. There are other important questions involved in this part of the subject, to which I can only allude. One is, how much or how little representation should be allotted to the medical corporations and the Universities. The two Bills before us treat this part of the subject in a very different fashion; the Bill of the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Brady) leaving the representation of corporations in its present position, while that of the hon. Member for Salisbury reduces it to very diminutive proportions. My own feelings are in favour of an efficient representation of the corporations. I think they have acted beneficially on the recognition of medical men as a distinct and independent profession. Without them there would be as little coherence and as little esprit de corps as there is among officers of the mercantile navy, who, though all certificated men, want centres of junction to make them a recognized profession, and to give them the strength of combined unities. Any scheme of medical reform which weakens these bonds of union, I feel satisfied will weaken the influence of the profession as a whole. I have said enough to show that there are large and leading principles connected with the constitution of the Council that require careful consideration, apart from the other subject embraced in the Bills before us—the securities for the proper qualifications of medical practitioners. There is no doubt that there is a need of reform here also; less need, indeed, than when the agitation for it first began, because the effect of that agitation has been to force upon some of the examining bodies the necessity of ascertaining the practical and clinical knowledge of the candidates, both in the arts of medicine and of surgery. Still the main fact remains that there are 19 licensing bodies in the kingdom, with from 12 to 20 examiners to each, and it is impossible with such a number to prevent a certain amount of competition for candidates, or to obtain sureties that the standard of qualification will never be below a certain minimum. The two Bills before us treat this evil in two different ways. The Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Dr. Lush) proposes that there shall be a single national examining board, peripatetic in the three divisions of the kingdom; whereas the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Leitrim (Mr. Brady) intends that there shall be three national boards—one for England, a second for Scotland, and a third for Ireland. It does not follow that because 19 licensing bodies are too numerous, that therefore they should be reduced to one. I prefer the scheme of three national portals to one portal, for reasons which seem to me to be weighty. At present the examining bodies in the three capitals enjoy the services of the most distinguished members of the profession. As long as you have an examining board, with its work circumscribed to one part of the kingdom, you may continue to enjoy the services of the chief members of the medical profession in testing the qualifications of the licentiates; but if you have a moveable board, oscillating between distant points, you cannot secure the services of men whose great experience in a practical profession best fits them for performing the duties of examiners. I do not say that you could not secure the services of competent examiners, but they would necessarily be men of less position and experience than are now on the examining boards, and would be less calculated to inspire public confidence in their judgments. Besides, an absolute uniformity in examination is not desirable. Differentiation is as important in science as it is in the structure of organized beings. England, Scotland, and Ireland have always been characterized by the differences of their medical systems of education, and by differences in the practice of the arts of medicine and surgery. These differences, though sometimes leading to fierce professional contentions for a time, have redounded to the advancement of medicine. I should lament to see the characteristics of these schools merge into the sameness which must necessarily be produced by a single examining body; for just as ships must adapt themselves to the character of the harbour into which they are to sail, so must schools suit their students—to the knowledge and peculiarities of their examiners. The very differentiation of the three national boards is a great recommendation of them to my mind, and securities could readily be taken that a certain standard of knowledge should prevail in all, without a definite sameness of knowledge that would merely indicate success in the art of cramming. But whether you have three portals or one portal for licence to practice, such limited entrances must always aim at excluding the inefficient and yet admitting the moderately competent. You may by them exclude the incompetent and assure a respectable mediocrity in the profession, but you cannot by such means give an active stimulus to excellence. There are, therefore, behind this scheme many important questions which we cannot treat lightly. Do we by it injure or strengthen the Universities and medical corporations in inducing members of the profession to seek higher titles than licentiates, and thus always secure among medical men a class distinguished for literary and scientific attainments, and for high skill and prolonged experience of their profession? If your scheme fail to do this you bring down the profession of medicine to a dead level of respectable mediocrity. Take the division of the kingdom with which I am best acquainted. In Scotland, the three Universities of Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen educate about one-third of the whole medical men of the kingdom. Drawn within the walls of a University the medical students become imbued with the spirit of its teaching, and enlarge their studies in science beyond the mere prescribed curriculum of a medical education. Will these Bills encourage or destroy these University teachings for medical students? Will they weaken or strengthen the Universities as sources of national education for the people, by crippling or augmenting their resources? These are grave questions as affecting the public interest, and especially grave to me, who represent the largest medical school and medical constituency in the kingdom. I do not intend to discuss them now, for I cannot think that my hon. Friends propose to push these Bills through their various stages at this late period of the Session. My own constituents certainly do not believe that the time for actual medical reform has been reached in these efforts of two private Members. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen (Mr. Gordon), and myself certainly possess the largest medical constituencies in this House; but with the exception of a single letter, which was in answer to one from myself, I have not received any communication in regard to either of these Bills. Is this because medical men are indifferent to medical reform? Certainly not that. There is very nearly unanimous feeling that changes are required in the mode of licensing medical men, and in the constitution of the Medical Council. Nor is it because the Bills before us are unworthy of attention. Both of them are well-considered Bills, and present their own views with care and elaboration. But the indifference to their fate depends on the fact that they aim at reforms beyond the power of private Members to effect. If the medical graduates of my Universities, amounting to several thousands, believed that medical reform depends on the fate of these Bills, my life would be a burden to me in the amount of correspondence which it would entail. My complete immunity in this respect is owing to the belief that Parliament, while it treats these Bills with the respect due to well-considered meaasures, will not pass them into law. I trust that my hon. Friends will be content to consider their Bills as indications to the Government of the paths which they may pursue in medical reform. The Government alone can deal with a subject so important to public interests. They are perfectly aware from the 40 years' war on this subject, that much reform is needed, but that in making it great evil as well as great good may ensue. The interests of the public and the interests of the medical profession can be best brought into co-relation by the aid of a Government having no prejudices or passions created by professional contentions, and whose only object can be to give the public security for its health and life, and to the licentiates and graduates in medicine that status which will be assured by the possession of high scientific and skilled practical knowledge of their profession.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, there were two points for discussion—one, as to the mode of examining and certifying medical practitioners, and the other as to the constitution of the Medical Council. With regard to the first point the Government entirely appreciated its great importance. They were aware of the very great practical evils that resulted from there being 19 accredited bodies for certifying medical practitioners, but they had been unable to deal with the question this year. That had led two private Members to bring in Bills on the subject, but neither could hope to pass his Bill during the present Session. From the number of questions pressing on the Government for legislation, he could not pledge them to bring in a Bill next year; but he could assure hon. Members that it was their wish and anxiety to do so. If they were unable to deal with the subject next year, and if any private Member, such as his hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Dr. Lush) or any other, took up the subject, no obstacle would be thrown in the way of the fullest consideration of it by the House; and if it was desirable the Bill might be referred to a Committee upstairs. Legislation had failed last year because, although the Bill which had been introduced into the House of Lords had been most carefully considered, it had been thought desirable, when the Bill came down to that House, to add to the questions they were then attempting to settle the other question of the constitution of the Medical Council, and it was then too late in the Session to deal with that subject.

Dr. Lyon Playfair

MR. BRADY said, there were at present 19 different medical examining bodies, 19 modes of medical licensing, and 19 different systems of medical education. The Bill proposed to reduce these to one for Ireland, one for Scotland, and one for England. It would not be easy to decide the question in the present Session; but he trusted that the Government would early next year introduce a satisfactory measure on the subject.

SIR JOHN GRAY said, he must express his gratification at the announcement that the Government would consider the subject during the Recess, with a view to grappling with it in the next Session.

DR. LUSH said, he would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill withdrawn.

METROPOLIS WATER (NO. 2) BILL.

Select Committee on the Metropolis Water (No. 2) Bill nominated:—MR. BRAND, SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, SIR JAMES LAWRENCE, MR. GOLDNEY, MR. CAMPBELL, and Five Members to be added by the Committee of Selection.

GLASGOW BOUNDARY BILL.

On Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, Bill to determine the Boundaries of the barony and regality of Glasgow for the purposes of Registration, ordered to be brought in by The LORD ADVOCATE and Mr. ADAM.

SASINES REGISTER (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, Bill to facilitate the keeping the General Register of Sasines for Scotland, ordered to be brought in by The LORD ADVOCATE and Mr. ADAM.

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 15th June, 1871.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Courts of Justice (Additional Site)* (182); Oyster and Mussel Fisheries Supplemental (No. 2)* (183); Ecclesiastical Titles Act Repeal* (184); Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, Amendment (185).

Second Reading—Union of Benefices (155), negatived; Gas and Water Provisional Orders Confirmation* (162); Burial Law Amendment* [126]; Public Health (Scotland) Act (1867) Amendment* (148).

Committee—Betting* (129); Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 1)* (127).

Committee — Report—Marriage Law (Ireland) Amendment* (135).

Report—Citation Amendment (Scotland)* (177); East India Stocks (Dividends)* (178); Postage* (179).

Third Reading—Pharmacy* (153), and passed.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) ACT, 1870, AMENDMENT BILL.

PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

LORD CAIRNS rose to ask their Lordships to give a first reading to a short Bill which had for its object to remove certain doubts that had arisen with regard to the effect of a certain portion of the Irish Land Act passed last year. The occasion of this Bill had arisen out of certain observations which on Tuesday evening last had been imputed to the learned Lord Justice of Appeal of the Land Court. However, after the contradiction given to the language reported to have been used, he would not refer to it in detail. The two questions which had been raised with reference to the Act were these:—First, it had been doubted whether the rights intended and supposed to be given by the Act to tenants by the Ulster tenant-right had been really and effectually secured to them by the wording of the Act; and, secondly, whether in the case of property sold in the Landed Estates Court, and subject to these tenant-rights, the rights of the tenant might not be jeopardized and lost altogether by the effect of the conveyance by the Court, unless these rights were specifically noticed and reserved on the face of the conveyance. Now, as to the former question, there could not be the least doubt that the Act intended to secure these rights to the tenants; and, moreover, claims were made under the Act very frequently, they had been repeatedly adjudicated upon, and if any person thought the Act failed in securing the rights of tenants, it was only necessary to appeal from one of those decisions in order to set the matter at rest. There had been no appeal challenging the efficacy of the Act in that respect, and he saw no necessity for legislation. The other question, however, was more difficult—it was an important question to consider what effect a conveyance by the Landed Estates Court might have upon the rights of occupying tenants. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack remarked the other night that there was a difficulty in the way of legislation, as there might be an appeal to this House from the recent decision. Now, if an appeal could settle the matter, he (Lord Cairns) should prefer, though at the risk of some delay and expense, to await it; but it was really one which no appeal would decide. What had happened was this:—A considerable property in the North of Ireland being about to be sold, preparations were made in the Landed Estates Court for advertising it, and for stating the rights and encumbrances to which it was subject. Some of the tenants applied to the Court, not as litigants, but asking the Judges, in their administrative capacity, to place on the particulars of sale and in the conveyance some notice of their rights. The Judges conceiving this to be unnecessary, and their rights to be sufficiently secure, the tenants carried the matter to the Court of Appeal, where both the Judges sustained the decision of the Landed Estates Court. They did so, however, on different grounds, the Lord Chancellor thinking that the rights were sufficiently secured, while Lord Justice Christian doubted whether they could be enforced, and apparently thought the Landed Estates Court could take no cognizance of them. Now, in case of an appeal to this Court, their Lordships might think the decision of the Landed Estates Court was correct, and yet a purchaser might afterwards contend that under the Landed Estates Court Act the property was free from all claims not stated in the conveyance. Without expressing his own opinion on the matter, the doubt was obviously a reasonable one, which it was desirable to remove by a short declaratory Act before any vested rights had been created which it might be difficult to deal with. He would not re-open the controversy as to the Act itself. Many of their Lordships had a great repugnance to it at first, while the objections of some were removed or lessened by the alterations it received in this House; but they would, he was sure, be unanimous in thinking that whatever rights were thereby given to tenants, should not be endangered by the accident of a particular property being sold in the Landed Estates Court without any reference to such rights on the face of the conveyance. In truth, it would be impossible to specify them in detail in every conveyance, as they depended on a variety of circumstances, and it was therefore desirable to enact that they should not be affected by such omission. It was important to landlords as well as to tenants that when estates came to be sold, they should not be disposed of with any uncertainty as to the charges upon them. He therefore asked their Lordships to give a first reading to a Bill enacting that in the case of any proceedings under the Landed Estates Court Act the rights of tenants under the Act of last Session should remain valid, although they might not be specified or referred to in the conveyance. The noble and learned Lord then presented a Bill to amend the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870.

Lord Cairns

THE LORD CHANCELLOR thanked his noble and learned Friend for introducing the Bill. After what had occurred it was desirable that all doubt should be removed, and the sooner this was done the better. On the part of the Government he should be happy to assist in passing the Bill as speedily as possible.

Bill read 1^a; to be printed; and to be read 2^a To-morrow. (No 185.)

UNION OF BENEFICES BILL—(No. 155.)
(The Lord Bishop of Exeter.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that the object of the measure was to extend to all cathedral cities the Act of 1860, which enabled contiguous parishes to be united. In his own cathedral city there were many parishes so small that the work of the Church could hardly be carried on in them with becoming dignity, and some of the churches were so hemmed in and ill-ventilated and lighted, that worship could not be fitly carried on in them. The work of the clergyman could not be carried on in a becoming and efficient manner, because the income was so small. In many of them it was impossible to get persons to undertake parochial offices. The churchwardens of two parishes in Exeter—one containing 200 inhabitants, and the other 300—had called upon him and represented to him the desirability of uniting these two parishes; and that it was desirable that one of the churches should be closed. They said that they had incurred personal liability for the repair of the fabric, and that the result of a voluntary rate had only produced the sum of 10s. He believed that great benefit would result if the union of small benefices could be facilitated. The provisions of the existing Act respecting London were not precisely suited to other cathedral cities, and the consents required were very numerous; but he doubted whether Parliament would dispense with these safeguards, while the expense attending the removal of bodies might be regarded as a check on ill-considered action. Seeing, therefore, no immediate prospect of better machinery, he should be sorry to lose the present opportunity, when consents might be obtained which a few years hence might be impracticable, and he believed that the inconvenient arrangement of parishes of which he complained was almost confined to cathedral cities.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Bishop of Exeter.)

THE EARL OF POWIS said, he objected to both the form and substance of the Bill. His objection to the form was that it referred to another Act—which would be very inconvenient for those who would have to work out its provisions. He objected also to the substance of the Bill, as it would create pluralities without limitation as to the population of the parishes united; and it would facilitate the pulling down churches for the purpose of selling the sites. It was true that the existing Act exempted London from such a limitation; but this was an exceptional case, for a London parish might have a week-day population of 25,000, and one of only 300 or 400 on Sundays. The clauses were agreed to after much discussion at the instance of the most rev. Prelate who then presided over the See of London. The parishes mentioned by the right rev. Prelate might be united with others provided the aggregate population did not exceed 1,500—a limitation which was imposed on the ground that such a population was as large as a clergyman could attend to single-handed. It was undesirable to pull down churches and sell the sites, for a small parish did not necessarily imply a small congregation. He would move that the Bill, which he thought had been drawn by an astute conveyancer, in order that it might slip through without notice, be read a second time this day six months.

An Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this day six months.")—(The Earl of Powis.)

THE BISHOP OF LONDON approved the object of the Bill, but he would ask his right rev. Brother as to the wisdom of attaching it to the Act of 1860, which had been as unworkable as the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Powis) could wish. During the ten years of its operation there had been 31 commissions to consider the advisability of the union of benefices in London, 30 of them being in the first two or three years after its passing. Eight of these schemes were approved and 23 disapproved; but of those eight only one had been carried out, the church being in course of erection: one was likely to be carried out, and three or four others might come to maturity. The reason was that the Act gave not only a voice to every party interested, but it gave them an absolute veto, and anyone could either refuse his consent or make it conditional on extravagant terms. The result was that persons imposed terms which it was impossible to accept. In other analogous cases there was some mode of adjudicating on objections, but here there was none, and, though the parishioners generally might have no objection, it was not easy to procure their attendance in any number; while it might be the interest of the vestry clerk to keep things as they were. In some of the city parishes, they being already old unions, two or three, or even more patrons had to be consulted, each having an absolute veto. He had been informed of a case which had been hung up, because a patron who had a fourth turn refused his assent unless he received patronage in exchange, or considerable compensation—although one of those gentlemen who called themselves "clerical agents" stated that the value of a fourth turn to presentation was inappreciable. The proceeds of sales of sites, moreover, were much smaller than they should be. The recent Census had shown a large decrease in the City parishes, and in many the Sunday population was vanishing. Indeed, he was informed that in one the number of people who slept in it on the night of the Census was under a dozen. The unworkableness of the existing Act had become such a scandal that its amendment must speedily be undertaken, and he could hardly recommend any extension of it in its present shape.

THE EARL OF CHICHESTER said, he should vote for the second reading of the Bill, but he entirely agreed with the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of London) in his statement regarding the great difficulty that was experienced in working the original Act. The removal of bodies made the union of City parishes very expensive, and the sites had not, as was expected, realized a sufficient sum to build and properly endow churches in populous suburbs. It was desirable that an improved and general measure should be passed.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY objected to the form of the Bill as clumsy, and not calculated to meet the necessities of the case. Those difficulties would have to be faced sooner or later by a Bill of an effectual and comprehensive character. In some cities, where churches were crowded together without populations attached to them, it was impossible, now that church rates were abolished, to keep them in repair.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, the power of uniting small benefices was very desirable, and the present Bill simply extended an existing Act to all cathedral cities. York much required such a power. A meeting held there shortly after his acceptance of the see, and attended by all the leading Churchmen, unanimously condemned as a great evil the existence of 26 small benefices, some without endowments or congregations. He had appointed a clergyman, in one case, to two contiguous benefices—a plan which had been in operation two or three years without the slightest complaint from the parishioners that the duties were less efficiently performed. Two congregations thus assembled in each church alternately; but there was no reason why they should not have a single church, and the sites of the churches pulled down would often be serviceable for schools. He admitted that the Bill would be but slightly openative, but as far as it went he felt bound to support it.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he opposed the Bill for the very reason given in the last observation of the most rev. Prelate—that it would be but slightly operative. The unworkableness of the existing Act was a reason for not extending it. He objected to such a mode of dealing with the question. He did not agree with the noble Earl (the Earl of Powis) that the Bill had been drawn by an astute conveyancer, for the recital spoke of “the Session of Parliament which sat” in such and such a year. It would be unintelligible without reference to the Act of 1860, and he could not see why cathedral cities required legislation more than other large towns. Under these circumstances he trusted that the right rev. Prelate would leave the subject to be dealt with next Session on a larger and more comprehensive scale.

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to say that he thought that the Bill could be easily amended in Committee in a way to remove the objections urged against it.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he had not heard a single argument advanced in favour of the Bill; and even those who supported it qualified their approval by so many modifications that it would be hardly wise to accept their advice and pass a Bill which was so ill-drawn that it would be a crying disgrace to them.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he thought the right rev. Prelate was justified in introducing a Bill which proposed simply to extend the same power to cathedral cities which had already been given with respect to the Metropolis, on the principle that it was always desirable to secure uniformity of procedure. Although the procedure fit for London might not be fit for other smaller towns, the right rev. Prelate thought it would be better to adopt the clauses of the Act dealing with London rather than encumber the Statute Book with exceptional legislation, in the same way as it had been deemed expedient in the case of railways and public companies to make one law applicable to all. No one connected with a cathedral city could doubt the want of some measure of this description. Since he had had the honour of holding his present office he had been informed of several of those small bene-fices having lapsed to the Crown in consequence of the impossibility of finding persons to accept them. The present measure, however, was capable of great improvement.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY remarked that if Parliament intended to occupy itself with subjects of this kind it might be desirable to have a Churchyard Desecration Clauses Act; but, in the meantime, he pointed out that while in London, where land was very valuable, it would be well to incur expenditure under the Act of 1860, in ordinary cathedral towns, where land as a rule was not valuable, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would provoke a great deal of ill-feeling by desecrating the ground and hurting the feelings of the relatives of those interred there, without in the end being able to recoup themselves for the outlay.

On Question? Resolved in the Negative; and Bill to be read 2^d this day six months.

THE APPELLATE JURISDICTION OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD WESTBURY, in rising to call the attention of the House to the state of the Appellate Jurisdiction of the Privy Council, said, that on the last occasion when he brought this subject forward the manner in which the great functions of the Privy Council as a Court of High Appeal were discharged was fully entered into. The great importance of the subject, both in a legal and constitutional point of view, was fully admitted; and there was, he believed, but one opinion expressed—that it was the absolute duty of the Government to remove the evil which was admitted on all hands to be a disgrace to the administration of justice. At that time not fewer than 370 appeals from India and our colonial possessions had accumulated, and to that number were to be added others not then lodged, but which were in course of transmission to this country. Upon inquiring the time that would be required for the dispatch of these appeals, it was found that if the Court sat continuously, de die in diem, for the same period of time that the Courts of Chancery and Common Law were in the habit of sitting, at least two whole years would be required for the proper dispatch of the accumulated amount of judicial business. But during those two years there would be a fresh supply of appeals, and probably 200 new appeals would be lodged while the accumulated business was being disposed of. They all knew the amount of business that was constantly arriving from the Courts of India, and the importance which was attached by India and the colonies to the connection with this country as securing a satisfactory determination of litigation. If, then, the Court took two years to dispatch the 370 appeals before it, and there was a nearly equal accumulation of fresh appeals during that time, it was hopeless to expect to arrive at a speedy and satisfactory administration of justice. Therefore it was impossible to see that anything could be done except to apply ourselves promptly to the constitution of a tribunal which would first dispose of the arrears and then deal satisfactorily with the appeals from India and our colonial possessions as they arose. On that occasion some difficulty was raised by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, not to the evils he (Lord Westbury) had pointed out, but to the remedy he proposed should be applied; but as he distinctly stated that he would divide the House unless he received from the Government something like a positive pledge of action in the matter, that pledge was given, and he withdrew his Motion. Notwithstanding all this, absolutely nothing had been done, and for reasons which no man could tell. There was no division of opinion—there was no hesitation as to what should be done; and though it was to his mind a poor expedient, he was willing to accept it, such as it was, because he despaired of obtaining anything better. It was agreed that there should be added to the Judicial Committee two of the Puisne Judges, who should be encouraged to accept retiring pensions, such pensions being augmented by an addition of £1,000 a-year, so as to make up salaries similar in amount to those they were receiving at the time of their retirement, on condition that they devoted themselves continuously to the duties of the Judicial Committee. In addition to this it was proposed to secure the services, by a similar process, of at least one member who had filled the office of Judge in one of the High Courts of Judicature in India; and these three Judges, with Sir James Colvile and Sir Lawrence Peel, who would receive similar allowances, would constitute the permanent Committee. He should have been very glad if a more comprehensive scheme had been adopted, but he was afraid that in this day they were all too desirous of merely patching up and resorting to miserable expedients instead of fulfilling great and imperative duties in a manner correspondent with their importance. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was the final Court of Appeal for doing justice to many millions of people who were increasing in wealth and commercial relations, all giving rise to a variety of judicial questions calling for settlement. These people were provided with Judges of First Instance; but they could not in the colonies get the quality of justice they required, and there was a great deficiency in regard to Judges who should exercise the highest appellate jurisdiction, and a feeling of disappointment resulted. It was characteristic of most men that they were content with the administration of justice when they drew it from the highest and most important sources, but were not content to receive it through subordinate channels. In one of the leading Australian papers—The Melbourne Argus—there appeared the following expression of feeling, which conveyed what he wished to impress on the House—

"But there is no doubt that a strong feeling of dissatisfaction with the present machinery for finally disposing of colonial appeals is rapidly growing in this country. It is too bad that the most important cases should be left untouched for two, for three, or even for four years. When at length the time for hearing arrives, there is no security that a Court will be formed such as the colonies have a right to expect."

Then followed some discouraging observations, which, though not far from being just, he should abstain from reading. The article then proceeded to say—

"We earnestly trust that neither pains nor cost will be spared to provide a fitting organ for the greatest appellate jurisdiction in the world. We look, therefore, with the deepest interest for the news of the promised law reforms of the Lord Chancellor. All that we ask is that our suits shall be decided by a fully organized English Court, and not by some stray legal casuals. We think that the colonies are worth the salaries of three or four Judges, even if the expenses of the Court should mount up to £20,000 or £25,000 a-year. Such a sum does not seem unreasonable for the dignity and efficiency of the oldest jurisdiction in the kingdom, and, we may fairly add, the greatest; and if England is so poor as to be unable to provide for the due performance of the Queen's primary duty, it will be well worth our while to contribute towards a Court which shall be fit to advise the Queen how to do right towards all her subjects who dwell beyond the limits of the British Isles."

The "promised law reforms of the Lord Chancellor," referred to in the extract he had quoted, had unfortunately passed into that limbo of the past which was peopled with the ghosts of many other "promised reforms," and if he were called upon to give a motto descriptive of the policy of the Government in reference to legal reforms, he should inscribe, in large characters, the words—

"Quærenda pecunia primum est, Virtus post nummos."

"Virtus," in this case the duty of providing for the proper administration of justice, was by Her Majesty's Government placed post nummos. A great Commission had sat and reported upon this subject as to the proper course to be taken, and nothing was wanted but the money in order to enable the administration of justice to proceed in a proper manner. The same motto would apply to the scheme for building the Law Courts, and there were other schemes for which nothing but nummos was wanting, and yet they were postponed. It was very painful to him to say anything against Her Majesty's Government; in fact, he frequently abstained from speaking in order that he might not fall into this, and it was only when goaded beyond the power of endurance that such remarks escaped from him. As to the appeals, nothing had been done since last year, and the present state of things was worse than it was then. In the year 1870 there were 370 appeals in arrear, and on the 10th of the present month the registrar reported the number set down for hearing as 86; the number in the office and under prosecution being as nearly as possible 300 more—making 386, foreign and colonial, in all. This number did not include the appeals relating to patents, the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty cases, the interlocutory motions and petitions, and the Indian appeals, which might be estimated at not less than 100 more, or 486 in all. For various reasons some of these appeals might not come on for hearing, and he would therefore strike off the 86, leaving in arrear 400 appeals of great importance to be dealt with. The appeals were also of great importance, for no appeal was brought before the Judicial Committee which involved a stake of less than £1,000, and many related to estates valued at hundreds of thousands of pounds, and sometimes the interests of a whole Province. What an enormous amount of anxiety was produced by the ownership of this property remaining undecided! Such a state of things was a premium to a litigious and obstinate man to persevere in litigation which was almost hopeless, because he might perhaps compel the opposite party to consent to some kind of compromise. It would be useless for him to dilate on the disappointment of nations that were forced to submit to our yoke, and who asked in return that they should enjoy the advantage of having justice properly administered. What, then, could we do in this matter? We might establish a great tribunal, presided over by some man of great eminence and reputation as a lawyer, and having other able Judges associated with him. Such a tribunal would discharge its duties in as satisfactory a manner as his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack and the great Courts of Westminster Hall discharged theirs. It was vain, however, to ask for the establishment of such a tribunal; and therefore he asked for something which was more in accordance with the will of the Government, and which was a sort of expedient for the present, although it was neither consistent with their Lordships' dignity, nor at all adequate to attain the great object in view. He asked the Government to give a pledge that within ten days from the present time a Bill should be introduced into that House for the purpose of constituting a tribunal in the manner which his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack proposed last year—namely, by adding to the Judicial Committee two Judges from Westminster Hall, and by so constituting what he might call the Indian Chamber of the Committee that it might sit constantly until the great heap of business before it had been diminished to such an extent as to be manageable for the future in the ordinary way. For some reason, which he could not at present discover, the appeals from Bengal were far more numerous than those from the other Presidencies of India. Out of the 386 appeals at present awaiting a hearing there were from Bengal 274, from Madras five, and from Bombay only two. How was this enormous disproportion to be accounted for? Surely there must be in the constitution of the Court of Bengal and in the arrangements something which made it impossible that the cases should be satisfactorily decided in the first instance. If the noble Duke the Secretary of State for India would determine what was to be done in India, and if the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack would consider the constitution of this tribunal, we might sweep away the opprobrious arrears of appeals, and fairly expect that they would not be augmented in the future. He said in the most determined and explicit manner that if he could not obtain from the Government that which they promised him at the end of June, 1869, he would, like the widow in Scripture, try to get it by importunity. If a Bill were not brought in within the time he had named, he pledged himself to move an Address to the Crown, and take their Lordships' opinion on the subject. It would be useless for his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack to answer that there was in the House of Commons, a Bill which, in fact, was but a second edition of that which failed on a previous occasion to receive any approbation in their Lordships' House. The Bill in question had not, he believed, yet been read a first time in the House of Commons, and it would be a mockery to say it was likely to pass and come into immediate operation. Unless their Lordships came to the rescue and demanded that what was right should be done, he should be left to renew the present appeal in June, 1872.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that no pain which his noble and learned Friend could give to himself and the members of the Government could be equal to the pain they all felt at the existence of the grievance which he had described. They had been quite assensative to it as he had been, and he was perfectly aware it was a grievance of which India and the colonies had occasion justly to complain, that there was no well-organized Court to hear appeals from them, and finally to decide their litigation. Without for one moment palliating or justifying the grievance which existed, he wished to describe its nature and character. He only wished it were possible within ten days to effect the salutary change desired by his noble and learned Friend; and, although he could not give a solemn pledge that the change should be effected in any given time, he would say that the Government would do their best to remedy the grievance arising from the present state of this Appeal Court. It was hardly just to say that nothing had been done—that a pledge had been given and broken; for a Bill was introduced into this House, and, although it did not meet with the approbation of the noble and learned Lord, their Lordships passed it, and it was sent to the other House, where the progress of measures of law reform had been impeded, and was likely to be impeded, by measures of more popular interest. Certainly the present Government had not been slow in endeavouring to effect law reforms. That which was most pressing when he came into office was the reform of the Bankruptcy Law, which preceding Governments had attempted, and the great need of which was shown by the fact that in the course of the year there were not less than 80,000 bankruptcy cases, in 5,000 or 6,000 of which alone a dividend was paid; whereas, he was glad to learn, from the learned Judges who presided over the Bankrupt Courts in the North of England, that the result of legislation was that there were very few cases in which no dividend was paid, that in the majority of cases a dividend of 10s. in the pound was paid, and there were very few in which the dividend was as low as 5s. in the pound. The Bankruptcy Bill was passed notwithstanding the engrossing demand upon the attention of Parliament caused by the legislation with regard to the Irish Church. In the next Session he was anxious to carry through a Bill for the reform of our legal tribunals; but the pressure of those two important measures, the Irish Land Bill and the Education Bill, fully occupied the House of Commons, and the Bills which he had introduced with reference to the Appellate Court, and the reform of judicature generally, made no progress in the other House. This Session a Bill, which some learned Judges considered a great improvement upon those of last year, had been circulated for comment and suggestion, and for some time it had been in the hands of a Member of the other House, with a view to its introduction there, in fulfilment of a promise he had given when the regular course of business there would permit. The present grievance with reference to the hearing of appeals before the Privy Council was in no way due to the present Government, but it had arisen from two circumstances, to one of which the noble and learned Lord had adverted. The appeals from India had increased with enormous rapidity during the last few years, and of course the Government could not be held responsible for that. Further, the constitution of the Appellate Court, which had well answered its purpose for 30 odd years, had wholly broken down. Five of its most able members and continuous attendants, although all living, had been rendered unable, from age or infirmity, to attend its sittings; and for this untoward circumstance the Government could not be held responsible. They would, however, be responsible if they did not attempt to provide a remedy for the state of things which had fallen somewhat suddenly upon us in this respect. With reference to the delay in the hearing of Indian appeals, he held in his hand a report of a discussion which took place at a meeting of a society that took an interest in these matters, and in that discussion there was read a letter from a gentleman who had a most perfect knowledge of the subject (Mr. Forsyth), who said that one cause of the delay was the want in India of qualified transcribers to prepare the evidence for transmission to this country. From this cause it took ordinarily from four to five years to prepare a case, and that accounted for the number of appeals that were "hung up." But the number that was actually set down for hearing was comparatively small. There were now 80 Indian appeals set down for hearing, but the remaining 200 or 300 were causes which could not be heard if the Privy Council were reconstituted to-morrow.

LORD WESTBURY said, that all the papers had been transmitted and were now in the office; but the appeals were not put down for hearing, owing to the expense and inconvenience of entering them before they could be heard.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, no doubt expense was incurred by setting them down for hearing, because in that case counsel must attend, but causes could be entered without being set down for hearing; and if these 300 causes were ready to be heard there was no reason why they should not be set down. When he came into office there were two years' arrears of appeals in their Lordships' House; but now, notwithstanding that two causes had occupied eight weeks of judicial time—those of the Wicklow peerage and Miss Shedden—the House was hearing appeals of the present Session. That being so, great encouragement was afforded to hope that, by providing Judges who could sit for a few weeks consecutively, the appeals that were set down could be disposed of. The existing grievance, therefore, was not one which had been long foreseen, and which could have been provided against; but, on the contrary, it had come on suddenly, and it had increased very much since the noble and learned Lord occupied the Woolsack, and the accumulation of appeals had arisen from five Judges being placed unexpectedly hors de combat with reference to their ability to sit and hear them. Having last year introduced a Bill for remedying the grievance—a Bill which passed their Lordships' House and was stopped in the other House only by the great accumulation of business—he thought the Government could not fairly be considered callous or insensible to the evils which had been described by his noble and learned Friend. With reference to Australia, he did not know what the statistics were as to appeals waiting for hearing; but there were only two appeals from that colony down on the paper. It was quite right, however, to take care that there should not hereafter be the same grievance to complain of as in India. What he deprecated was, that his noble and learned Friend should take up a tone which seemed to indicate that he was subjected to a personal injury in having had promises made to him and then broken, when he trusted he had satisfied their Lordships that he did not hesitate one moment longer than was necessary in passing a Bill through that House which was only stopped in the other House by the pressure of business. He was quite ready to say that, without confining himself within the rather peremptory limits prescribed by his noble and learned Friend, he trusted they would be able so to arrange matters that, until a Bill, to be commenced in the other House—if they were fortunate enough to receive it in any reasonable time—should pass, the sittings of the Court should be continuous, so as to take up the arrears. But he could not sit down without saying that the appellate jurisdiction of their Lordships' House had not given entire satisfaction, and he trusted the remedy hereafter would be by a general and comprehensive measure. There was one evil which ought speedily to be remedied—he meant the co-ordinate jurisdiction of their Lordships and of the Privy Council in the construction of English law. That House determined English law in the last resort. An appeal came from Australia which was governed by English law. That appeal went to another tribunal whose decisions were final on all questions of colonial law; and there might therefore be a clashing between their Lordships' House and the Privy Council on the construction of an English statute or some doctrine of English law. That was an unsatisfactory state of things, and he hoped when there was an opportunity of bringing forward the larger measure of which he had spoken something would be done to remedy it. He trusted he should be able to propound some means by which these two great Courts of Appeal might be able to render mutual assistance on all questions of English law, so as to act together in concert and harmony with each other, so that there might be uniformity of law; and some measure which, he believed, would be found to contribute very largely to having a continually sitting Court in the Privy Council, and, so far as it was wanted, a continually sitting Court by means of a Committee of their Lordships' House for hearing appeals. Undoubtedly a very considerable reform was wanted in this direction. He had not gone into his noble and learned Friend's statistics. That was not necessary. He quite admitted the evil. But the immediate pressure, he thought, must be measured by the printed list; for there was, in fact, nothing more which was ready to be disposed of. If there were other appeals ready for hearing, he did not understand why they should not be set down. By means of the temporary measure which he had suggested—namely, continuing the present sittings and sitting during the legal session, the present arrears would in all probability be disposed of.

LORD CAIRNS said, he wished to make a single observation on the two measures to which his noble and learned Friend had referred. It was quite true that when the Bankruptcy Act became law the year before last, he hoped that some improvement would be effected in the law on that subject; but if his noble and learned Friend persuaded himself that in the opinion of the public that measure was working well and giving satisfaction, he was labouring under an entire mistake. It was very difficult to say whether there was not at this moment greater dissatisfaction occasioned by the working of that measure than there ever had been before. Then, as to the Judicature Bills presented last year, he thought their Lordships had great reason to complain of the course which had been taken. When brought before their Lordships' House they were mere skeletons of what a measure ought to be—skeletons without life, flesh, or blood. Everything of importance was to be filled up by rules to be made under the authority of those measures. He protested very much against the course which had been taken; but he was appealed to to allow the Bills to pass in order to allow the rules to be prepared, and a compromise was effected that the Bills should not come into operation until the rules, which were to supply the life-blood to the Bills, had been laid before Parliament. Now, what had been done? The Bills had gone down to the House of Commons, where they were not even proposed for discussion. He did not think that a Government with a large majority at their back were justified in laying these Bills aside without attempting to pass them through the other House. What was the consequence? Having arrived near the end of the Session, his noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor) told them he had prepared and circulated some Bills on the subject. All he knew was, they had never been presented to Parliament.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, they had been circulated among all the Judges both of Law and Equity.

LORD CAIRNS said, he must remind his noble and learned Friend that it was not the duty of the Judges, but of Parliament, to legislate on this subject, and it was not enough at nearly the end of the Session to tell them that Bills had been circulated among the Judges which had been referred to in the Queen's Most Gracious Speech from the Throne. Now, a late stage of another Session had been reached, and the measures which had been again referred to in the Speech from the Throne were in about the same position. With reference to the Privy Council, although the printed list of appeals waiting for hearing amounted to only 86, he did not think, judging from his own experience, it was too much to say if the Judicial Committee sat consecutively during the whole judicial year they would be unable to dispose of that arrear; and there would then be another arrear. The delay which occurred was attended with great inconvenience to suitors. Appeals to the Privy Council required a considerable expenditure of money. Printed cases must be prepared before they were set down, and no solicitor would incur that expense, which would be out of his own pocket, while the arrear was such that he saw there was no chance of his case being reached within 12 months. Looking to the time that was occupied by the Privy Council in hearing cases, the wonder was that so many as 86 had been put down. It was no answer to say that the business of their Lordships' House was not now very much in arrear; but even if there was a great arrear he doubted whether it would so imperatively call for the interposition of their Lordships at this particular moment, because the business before this House related to England, Scotland, and Ireland, where people knew what was going on, and could interfere and agitate if they found that their interests were being neglected. Their Lordships, however, were now asked to protect the colonists and the people of India, who were not able to make their complaints known except through the newspapers, and were, therefore, driven to agitate in their own countries for the establishment of a Court of Final Appeal in each particular colony—a step which would destroy one of the most valuable links that connected this country and her colonies—namely, the drawing their sources of law from the Courts of England. He did not say that the Government were to blame for there being so much litigation from the colonies to be disposed of here; but they were exposed to blame for not being at least in a better condition to remedy existing grievances than they were last year. Another complaint that he had to make against the Government was with regard to the Bill that they introduced last year to improve the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. He thought its provisions inadequate, and that they would rather deteriorate the tribunal; but, giving way to the urgency of his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, he abstained from doing anything more than proposing that the Bill should be for one year only. In a division on that point all the Members of the Government voted against him, and his Amendment was negatived by a majority of 11; but when the Bill went down to the House of Commons the Home Secretary, before a word of criticism had been offered, recommended that the Bill should be only a temporary one. That was not encouraging. If his noble and learned Friend (Lord Westbury) had asked for complete legislation within ten days he would have been unreasonable, but he only asked that the proposed Bill should be introduced within that time. There was not the least reason why that should not be done; and to be unable to promise to bring forward within ten days a Bill that was mentioned in the Royal Speech was tantamount to saying that the Government were in difficulties and did not care to meddle with the matter.

LORD ROMILLY said, he had always understood that the remedy for the existing evil was to be a temporary one only; but if the reform of the Judicial Committee was to be postponed until the passing of a general measure as to the whole appellate jurisdiction of this country, he would venture to say that the subject would outlive many of their Lordships. He understood the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack to promise that he would alter the judicial tribunal itself, so as to enable it to sit continuously. It was idle to refer so constantly to the late Lord Kingsdown, who liked sitting in a judicial capacity, and constantly did so, without receiving any reward. By him the Court was kept always sitting; but that could not now be done unless proper persons were employed at a sufficient salary. Some temporary measure was required for enabling the Judicial Committee to dispose of that business which was essential for the administration of justice over a large part of the world. He therefore hoped his noble and learned Friend would not wait until these Bills came from the other House, but would at once introduce a measure to remedy a grievance which was universally felt.

LORD WESTBURY, in reference to the Indian Appeals, said he hoped that the promise of the Lord Chancellor would be put on record.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, there was no necessity for any record. The Government would take care to propose some arrangement by which a competent Court might be constituted to hear Indian Appeals without delay. How the Court should be constituted was a matter that would require consideration.

LORD WESTBURY gave notice that if some measure were not soon taken he would move an Address to the Crown on the subject.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock,
till To-morrow, half past
Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 15th June, 1871.

MINUTES.] — PUBLIC BILLS — Resolution in Committee — Ordered — First Reading — Chain Cables and Anchors * [201].

Ordered — First Reading — Metropolitan Building Act (1855) Amendment * [200].

First Reading — Glasgow Boundary * [198]; Saines Register (Scotland) * [199].

Second Reading — Life Assurance Companies Act (1870) Amendment * [183]; Kingsholm District Boundary * [185]; Sewage Utilisation Supplemental * [186]; Local Government Supplemental (No. 4) * [187]; Intoxicating Liquors (New Licences) * [157].

Second Reading — Referred to Select Committee — New Mint Building Site * [176].

Committee — Army Regulation [39] — R.P.

Committee — Report — Prayer Book (Tables of Lessons) (re-comm.) [181]; House of Commons (Witnesses) * [156].

Withdrawn — Charity Commissioners * [99].

FRANCE—COMMERCIAL TREATY.

QUESTION.

Mr. WHITE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the French Government has notified its intention to put an end to the Commercial Treaty with Great Britain; and, if so, whether that Treaty (in conformity with Article No. 21) would not continue in force for twelve months after such notification?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, allusions have been made incidentally to the Treaty of Commerce between England and France by certain members of the French Government to Lord Lyons, but they have never assumed the shape of official communications. Under these circumstances, the hon. Member will probably not think it incumbent upon me to answer the latter portion of his Question.

NEW PRISON NEAR ROCHESTER.

QUESTION.

Mr. GOLDSMID asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the statement is correct that it is the intention of the Government to build a Prison by means of Convict Labour on land between Gillingham and Borstal, near Rochester, which was originally purchased by the Crown for the purposes of the fortifications round London; and, if so, whether he will undertake that no further steps shall be taken in the matter without the consent of Parliament?

Mr. BRUCE said, in reply, that the question of employing convict labour in building a prison on land between Gillingham and Borstal was still under consideration, and the matter would not be decided until Parliament had had an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon the subject.

METROPOLIS—HAMILTON PLACE.

QUESTION.

Mr. CHAPLIN asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he is aware that a drinking trough for cattle and horses has been erected in Piccadilly exactly opposite the new thoroughfare through Hamilton Place; and, whether he will take steps to procure its immediate removal to a more suitable locality less obstructive to traffic?

Mr. AYRTON, in reply, said, he had been informed that the trough in question had been erected by a benevolent Member of that House, the hon. Member for Weymouth who, believed that in so doing he was rendering a great service to animals. The hon. Member had previously erected a similar trough at Knightsbridge, which had been regarded as a great boon by the drivers of vehicles. The exact site for the trough in question had been selected by the Vestry which the inhabitants of St. George's, Hanover Square had elected for the management of their affairs. Under these circumstances, if the inhabitants of that district did not approve the site that had been selected for the erection of this trough, they should either imitate the example which had been set them by the hon. Member for Weymouth and subscribe the necessary funds for erecting a handsome trough elsewhere, or else they might represent their grievances to their Vestry, and in the event of these not being redressed they could protect themselves by electing an anti-trough Vestry at the next general election for vestrymen for the district.

ARMY—PROMOTION AND RETIREMENT.

QUESTION.

LORD GARLIES asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is not a fact that an estimate has been prepared in the War Office of the probable cost of a scheme for promotion and retirement rendered necessary by the abolition of purchase in the Army, which tends to show that it is likely to cause an annual expenditure of from £800,000 to £1,000,000; and, if this be so, whether he will object to laying it upon the Table of the House?

Mr. CARDWELL: Sir, no estimate has been prepared at the War Office tending to show that the probable increased cost of promotion and retirement caused by the abolition of purchase will, as compared with the present cost, amount to such a sum as is suggested in the Question of the noble Lord. I have repeatedly stated the reason which has prevented my laying upon the Table any such estimate—namely, the absence of any basis on which such an estimate could, in my opinion, be framed so as to be entitled to the confidence of the House.

CHARITY COMMISSIONERS BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. COLLINS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the Second Reading of the Charity Commissioners Bill this Session; and, if so, if he will now fix a definite day for the Second Reading?

MR. BRUCE: I am assured, Sir, that it is impossible to fix a day for the second reading; and, as undoubtedly the Bill will require some time for its proper consideration, the Government think it better that the Order should be withdrawn.

RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

QUESTION.

COLONEL C. H. LINDSAY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the re-engagement of a soldier (whose conduct and health are good) for service with the standards from period to period up to twenty-one years will be allowed to rest solely with himself and his commanding officer; if he will state what will be the considerable changes which he has announced to be his intention to make in the future appointments of Volunteer Adjutants; and, whether he has any intention of making any alterations in the present appointment and duties of Volunteer Adjutants?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the re-engagement of a short-service soldier will depend upon the military authorities on the one side and the soldier himself on the other. It is in contemplation to appoint adjutants to the Reserve forces from regiments of the Army, supernumeraries, for a limited time, and with power of renewal, if their services are satisfactory. It is intended that all the permanent Staff of the Reserve forces shall be under the direction of the major-general commanding in the district and the colonels on the Staff, so as to be generally available for the purposes of recruiting for the Army as well as for the purposes of the Reserve forces.

ARMY—PROMOTION AND RETIREMENT.

QUESTION.

COLONEL STUART KNOX asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is not customary for a Minister intending to introduce a Government measure involving a large outlay of public money, to submit his scheme to the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and, if so, whether an estimate of the probable annual cost of the promotion and retirement, as the necessary sequence of the passing of the Army Bill, was placed before and approved by him before he made his Financial Statement this year, and if he will cause it to be laid upon the Table of the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, it is the practice for Ministers who are introducing measures involving large or even small financial changes to consult the Chancellor of the Exchequer. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War did so in the present instance, and he laid before me, as he has laid before the House, a trustworthy statement, as I believe it to be, of the expense of abolishing purchase. He did not give me any estimate of the cost of providing for promotion and retirement, for the reasons which the hon. and gallant Gentleman may probably have heard already more than once this Session; indeed, he might have heard them from the mouth of my right hon. Friend within the last two or three minutes. I will only add that I am convinced of the wisdom of the course taken by my right hon. Friend, because it would have been a mere illusion to have laid before the House an estimate founded on data on which my right hon. Friend himself could not rely. Whatever the expenditure may be it could have made no difference whatever in the expenditure of the present year.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT.

QUESTION.

MR. HOLMS asked the Vice President of the Privy Council, When the cordon round the Metropolis prohibiting the free ingress and egress of cattle will be removed; and, if its removal depends upon the construction of the waterside market, when will its construction be completed?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the removal of the cordon round the Metropolis prohibiting the free ingress and egress of cattle depended upon the construction of the waterside market, and he had every reason to hope that it would be constructed at the time fixed by the Act—namely, before the end of the year.

METROPOLIS—SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.—QUESTION.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK asked the First Commissioner of Works, When he will be prepared to exhibit the plans and model of the proposed Natural History Museum at South Kensington, and whether before the Estimate for the work is proposed; and, when the Instructions and Correspondence relating to the New Natural History Museum, which have been ordered to be laid upon the Table, will be in the hands of Members?

MR. AYRTON, in reply, said, the estimate of the expense of the Natural History Museum at South Kensington would be laid on the Table to-morrow. He never contemplated a model of that museum being prepared or exhibited, and he did not think any advantage would result from that course. He was informed by the architect that the plan and drawings would not be ready for some time. He had no doubt the architect would do all he could to accelerate the preparation of them. If the plans and drawings were not ready when the Estimates came on, the estimate for the building must necessarily be proposed in their absence.

THE LATE WAR-OFFICE INCOME-TAX COMMISSIONERS.—QUESTION.

MR. MELLOR asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If the late War Office Income Tax Commissioners have had retiring pensions granted to them as follows: viz. Mr. Talbot, late chief clerk, £950; Mr. Wiffin, late accountant general, £650; and Sir William Brown, C.B., £800 per annum?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, Mr. Talbot had allotted to him a pension of £980, not £950, as in the Question; Mr. Wiffin had a pension allotted to him of £650; and a pension of £800 had been allotted to Sir William Brown.

CUSTOMS CLERKS' HOLIDAYS. QUESTION.

CAPTAIN GROSVENOR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is owing to any misconduct upon the part of writers in the Customs that the promise recently made to them of a fortnight's annual holiday, without loss of pay, has been withdrawn?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, in reply, that since the time when a fortnight's annual holiday, without loss of pay, was promised to writers in the Customs, it had been found that such holiday would militate very strongly against the uniformity of the system which had been established in the Department, but a fortnight's holiday would be allowed to the writers for the present year.

INDIA—EAST INDIA ADMINISTRATION PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. GRANT DUFF: I wish, Sir, to take this opportunity of saying that I find I was under a mistake the other day when I accused the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) of exercising an extreme right, or something more than an extreme right, in changing the terms of his Motion. I have since learnt that the course he took could be quite justified by precedent, though I still think it was inconvenient when so very serious a matter as the existence of anything that could fairly be called "widespread discontent" in India was in question. I wish further to say that I desire entirely to retract any moral blame which I attached, or was understood to attach, to the hon. Gentleman. My expressions will not at all bear the interpretation he put on them in his reply, as I am sure he will see if he has them read over to him again; but they do, I think, convey some fraction of moral blame, and that I absolutely retract.

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, I beg to thank the Under Secretary for the explanation he has given. Not only when I heard the words in question used, but when they were read to me the next morning, they caused me very considerable pain. My conduct had not been dishonourable. The course I took was this:—I immediately consulted the highest official in this House as to whether it was in the least degree unusual or improper for a Member to alter the terms of his Motion three days before he brought it forward. Had my conduct been in the smallest degree unusual I should have asked the Speaker to have allowed me to make the most ample apology, not only to the Under Secretary, but also to this House, for, above all things, I have been most anxious since I have had a seat here that I should do nothing which any opponent would be able to say was not perfectly straightforward. I am sure that in future the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary, if I should have occasion to speak on the subject of India, will do me the justice of supposing that I am actuated by motives not less worthy, and a desire not less sincere, to promote the interests of India than he himself is actuated by. In conclusion, I beg to thank both sides of the House for the great kindness which they have shown to me in this matter, and I beg most particularly to thank the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) for the generous way in which he spoke the other night of the motives with which I brought forward my Motion.

Mr. W. E. Forster

ARMY REGULATION BILL—[BILL 39.]

(Mr. Secretary Cardwell, Sir Henry Knight Storks, Captain Vivian, The Judge Advocate.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 13th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART II.—Army Enlistment.

Clause 6 (Rules as to enlistment.)

MR. CARDWELL said, he rose for the purpose of making an appeal particularly to his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens), that he would permit the Government to make a Motion for omitting the clause, and to proceed with the Bill in the mode in which they intended. He entirely admitted, and, indeed, everyone must feel the great importance of the subject which his hon. Friend wished to bring under the consideration of the House. It was extremely desirable that the question should be fully and fairly considered; but he hoped his hon. Friend would think him not unreasonable if he asked him not to bring it forward as a formal Amendment to the clause with which it was the intention of the Government not to proceed.

MR. W. M. TORRENS, who had given Notice to move as an Amendment to Clause 6 (or, if that Clause be withdrawn, as a new clause), page 4, line 41, before "no," insert—

"No person enlisted as a soldier in any regiment of cavalry or infantry of the line shall be called upon to serve Her Majesty out of the United Kingdom until he shall have attained the age of twenty years," said, he hoped the Committee would believe that nothing was more contrary to the interests and wishes of one placed in his position than to tempt them to go into a discussion sooner than it was the general pleasure and convenience to do, and if the Government would only assign him an early day when the Bill had come out of Committee, he would be willing to yield. If the Government thought it would be more for the convenience of Public Business to grant him any day on which this should be the first Order, so that what he considered a pressing question should be in the same position as it now stood, he would not have the slightest objection to sit down and not say another word. But he put it to his right hon. Friend whether it would be a good exchange to give up the advantageous position which he now held for the chance of bringing on the question at an hour before midnight, when it would be impossible that it should be fairly discussed.

After long discussion, Mr. CARDWELL said, he would move that the clause be postponed.

Motion agreed to; Clause postponed.

PART III.—Auxiliary Forces.

Clause 7 (Jurisdiction of lieutenants of counties in respect of auxiliary forces revested in Her Majesty.)

MR. CARDWELL moved, in page 5, to leave out from "either," in line 27, to "howsoever," in line 29, both inclusive, and insert—

"Or by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, either of his own motion, or with the advice of the Privy Council in Ireland."

This Amendment would place the Irish Militia in the same position as the Militia of England, by taking it out of the hands of the Lord Lieutenant.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, he was glad to see such an Amendment proposed, because he believed that the less power there was in Dublin Castle the better it would be.

COLONEL GILPIN asked whether the first commissions were to be in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant?

MR. CARDWELL said, that first commissions would continue to be recommended by the Lord Lieutenant; but when a subaltern had distinguished himself by service, then, on the recommendation of the commanding officer, or of the colonel on the Staff, he would be selected for promotion or for a commission in the Line.

[Committee—Clause 7.]

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he hoped there would be harmonious action between the Lord Lieutenant and the Secretary of State, and that a different course would not be taken in different counties.

MR. CARDWELL said, that would be the spirit in which he should desire to act. The main object was to avoid a dual responsibility.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. CARDWELL moved, in page 5, line 34, after "thereof," insert—

("Saving nevertheless to the lieutenants of counties their jurisdictions, powers, duties, and privileges in relation to the appointment of deputy lieutenants, the raising of the militia by ballot, and the proceedings incidental thereto.")

MR. CONOLLY said, he thought it would be far better to leave the appointments, as at present, in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant, whom it was hardly complimentary to confine to the appointments which were generally filled by a very different class of officers from those which were now under discussion.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON asked whether the right hon. Gentleman intended that the Secretary of State was to recommend the officers—because it was of great importance that the Lords Lieutenant should have the power of appointing those gentlemen who, from their position, were likely to bring a considerable number of men into the regiment, an object which was effected better under the present system than it could be under any other by which it might be superseded.

MR. CARDWELL said, that when the officer was once in the regiment he would rise by merit.

MR. ACLAND said, he did not quite understand whether the right hon. Gentleman had fully realized the fact that the captain of a Yeomanry corps and the commanding officer of a regiment were, practically, the only recruiting officers in a country district.

MR. CARDWELL said, it was intended to consult the Lords Lieutenant on appointments, with regard to their bearing on the recruiting of the regiment.

MR. ACLAND said, if he understood the right hon. Gentleman aright the commanding officers of local regiments would be considered competent to recommend persons as officers. That was intelligible. But he could not help fearing that military men might lose sight of this vital principle, that the commanding officer was the only recruiting officer as a rule. No greater mistake could be made than to suppose that persons of mere intelligence could keep together a corps of Volunteers or Militia.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that it was intended that, in order to keep up a proper connection between the Militia and the counties to which the various corps belonged, the first appointment of Militia officers should be on the recommendation of the Lords Lieutenant. Under these circumstances, would it not be better to insert a statement to that effect in the Bill, otherwise there would be no guarantee for the continuance of the proposed practice, and another Secretary for War might take the power into his own hands.

MAJOR GENERAL SIR PERCY HERBERT pointed out that if the officers of the Militia were to rise by merit, and a considerable number of officers were to be brought from the Army into the Militia, it was difficult to see how this arrangement could work. Of course, officers from the Army could not be expected to take the position of subalterns, and if they were made captains, how could the Militia officers rise by merit?

COLONEL NORTH said, nothing could upset the harmony of a regiment more than to carry out the arrangements contemplated.

MR. CARDWELL said, this was a good illustration of the impossibility of laying down rules beforehand in reforming the Army. The intention was, as he stated, to appoint officers of the Army to be adjutants of the Reserved force, making them supernumerary of their regiments while adjutants of the Militia, and subject to being recalled. It would frequently be necessary to bring into the Militia officers from the Army, and this would probably be done in a greater proportion than at present. With regard to putting the arrangement about the recommendation of officers in the face of the Bill, he would have no objection, as far as he was himself concerned. But he did not think it would be wise, in the first place, and in the next place he did not think there was any risk that any future Secretary of State would wish to be troubled with anything so extremely detailed and inconvenient as providing subalterns for the Militia. There was another thing it was desirable to avoid—namely, dual responsibility.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, they had practical experience that since the recommendation of officers was to be in the hands of Lords Lieutenant these gentlemen had been inundated with applications. The right hon. Gentleman said no Secretary of State would care to take the trouble of appointing subalterns. But there would be a great temptation to do so if these men had afterwards the right of passing into the Line.

LORD ELCHO said, there were two questions before the Committee—namely, doing away with the power of the Lords Lieutenant appointing certain officers, and the amalgamation of the Regular and Reserve forces. The clause before them was one which had been introduced with a great flourish of trumpets, and that Lords Lieutenant should no longer appoint officers to the Militia was proclaimed in triumphant tones. Now, the transfer of jurisdiction would most likely do harm rather than good, for, as was pointed out by his hon. Friend (Mr. Acland), local influence was a powerful element in recruiting. These forces had always been considered local forces, and it was in the interest of the country that they should be locally considered. It had always been thought necessary and desirable to keep the Militia and the Regular force distinct, in the interests of the nation; and it was through local influences especially that the Militia had been maintained at all. He held that this experiment would add nothing to their strength, and might turn out far less beneficial than they supposed. He was not surprised if the Lords Lieutenant did not object to it, because they had in some instances received but scant courtesy from the Government. Then, as to who were to be appointed, the Secretary of State said they now saw from that discussion the disadvantage that would arise if they laid down strict regulations; but, for himself, he deduced a totally different conclusion — namely, that it was absolutely necessary they should know what were the regulations under which officers would be appointed. To judge fairly of the powers given by that clause and of their bearing, they ought to have before them—what they had endeavoured in vain to elicit—a distinct understanding as to the mode in which those powers in reference to the appointment of officers were to be exercised. As a Volunteer officer himself, he asked the Secretary of State the other night to state explicitly what he meant by that amalgamation of the Regular and Reserve forces as regarded the force to which he belonged, and the answer then given was that it was intended to appoint officers of the Regular Army to be adjutants of the Militia and the Volunteers. But that was what was really done at present, and though there was to be a change in the mode of appointment, they would still have the same class of officers—that was, of the Regular Army—appointed to the Militia and Volunteers as adjutants. Instead of being appointed, as now, by the Lord Lieutenant—who in most cases acted upon the nomination or recommendation of the officers commanding the regiment, and responsible for its discipline—they would be selected by the Secretary of State for War, irrespective of any such nomination or recommendation. He had ventured on a previous occasion to protest against that change in the interest of the force to which he belonged. Every man commanding a regiment, whether of Regulars, Militia, or Volunteers, knew that if he desired that his adjutant to work heartily with him for the good of the regiment, they must be on the most cordial terms. The appointment of an adjutant was almost as important as the selection of a man's wife. If a man and his wife did not agree together, things could not go on smoothly for the rest of their household; and it was equally important for the well-being of a regiment that its commanding officer and its adjutant should be cordial and friendly towards each other. Was that likely to be the case if the Secretary of State was to transfer any officer he chose from the Line to the Militia or the Volunteers to act as adjutant? The Government might, in magniloquent language, call that an amalgamation of their regular and Reserve forces; but he did not think it was for the interest of the service to make such an alteration as that now proposed. It was difficult to believe that, after beating the big drum as they had been doing, the Government had no other change in the shape of re-organization to propose, except one which damaged the relative position of commanding officers and adjutants. He asked whether they had not something in the background, and whether they intended to officer the Volunteers and the Militia much more largely than at present with officers from the Regular Army. Before this clause passed, the Committee had a right to be informed as to what was the Government plan of amalgamation—whether that plan was to be confined to this infinitesimal part of their scheme of Army Re-organization, or whether there was something else in the background. He hoped that the Secretary for War would tell the Committee something clear and definite on that point.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked, whether it was the intention of the Secretary for War to make the appointments to the Militia for a period of five years? If the officers were to be constantly changed, it was possible that his plan would not work well.

COLONEL GILPIN stated that the law with regard to appointments of officers generally by Lords Lieutenant was, that the recommendation for a commission should be sent to the War Office, and if within 14 or 18 days no reply in the negative was received, then the commission was made out. With regard to adjutants, their appointments had always come direct from the Crown, but, as a rule, the commanding officer was consulted on the subject; for unless there was a cordial understanding between him and the adjutant, it was impossible that the well-being of a regiment could be maintained. He understood the Secretary for War to say that in future the adjutants to be appointed would be selected from supernumerary officers of the Line; but that would be a most unwise step, particularly with reference to Militia regiments. To deprive the Lords Lieutenant of their patronage was a doubtful expedient, because if the Militia were to be retained as a local force local influences must not be disregarded, and the best men in the county should be induced to join.

MR. A. F. EGERTON desired to know what would be the position of existing adjutants, because if they were all to be deprived of their appointments five years hence, they must consider what they would do. From his own experience he was able to support the suggestion of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), that such appointments should be made permanent, for if a supernumerary officer were to be appointed every five years, no commanding officer of either Volunteers or Yeomanry would answer for the efficiency of his regiment.

Lord Elcho

MR. ACLAND said, it by no means followed that an appointment made by the civil officer of a local force would be better than one made by a general of wide experience. It was clear that the Secretary for War intended to give full-pay officers Staff appointments of some kind connected with the Volunteer and Militia services. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not give way to the repeated charges from the opposite side, and especially from the noble Lord (Lord Elcho); but would retain in his own keeping the responsibility for which he was accountable to his Queen and country. It was impossible for him to work out these questions in the face of such a minority as he had to contend with. If the Reserve forces were to be of any real service to the country, they must submit to strict military discipline, and those who were to command them should be selected by responsible persons. Those who sat on that (the Ministerial) side of the House could not always say what was in their minds upon this subject. It must not be supposed that civilians had no opportunity of knowing something of the feelings of the Army. Their difficulty was that they could not altogether say what they knew was the opinion of the junior ranks, and perhaps of the senior ranks too. They could not say why the abolition of purchase was necessary. He hoped the effect of this discussion would be to make persons in high places take more trouble to become acquainted with the conditions of this civilian service, and he thought it would be well to send some of the best young men in the Army into subordinate positions—as brigade majors or assistant organizers—to work up these forces.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I cannot help thinking that it would be better if hon. Members on the other side would be content to do their own work, and perform their own duties, without lecturing us as to the manner in which we ought to conduct ourselves. When we were last in Committee we had the benefit of a lecture from the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer), and now the hon. Member for North Devon (Mr. Acland) seems to have been so much encouraged by that example as to take the same course. The present discussion gives us a practical proof of the disadvantages under which we are labouring from the reticent and disingenuous manner in which this Bill has been introduced; and we have difficulty in discussing this clause of the Bill because of our ignorance as to the plans of the Government. There seems to be no difference of opinion between ourselves and the Secretary of State as to the object he has in view in filling up first commissions in the Army; but the question is, how it is to be carried out? He says, leave it to an understanding; but he has never told us what is to be the real system of passing officers from the Militia to the Line. Such, indeed, have been the statements on this part of the subject that, not only Members of this House, but the Lords Lieutenant of counties, who are to be made parties to this arrangement, have no idea how it will be managed. I do not object to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, but I think it ought not to be left vague and uncertain; especially as it is quite clear that if there is to be anything like an extensive system of passing officers from the Militia to the Line, very important patronage will rest in some quarter or other. It seems to me that such patronage, and the patronage connected with first appointments, should not be in the same hands. With this view I venture to move, as an Amendment, to insert in line 30, after the words "Her Majesty," "on the recommendation of the Lords Lieutenant of counties."

THE CHAIRMAN informed the right hon. Baronet that his Amendment being in line 30, while the question before the Committee related to an Amendment in line 24, was out of Order.

MR. CARDWELL: Whatever may be the impression formed by the right hon. Baronet with regard to the speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer), I at least may object to certain kinds of lectures read to me by the right hon. Baronet. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) spoke a short time ago about my sneering. I am not aware that I have ever sneered at the noble Lord, and I should be very sorry to do so. He also spoke about my magniloquence and my beating of the big drum. I am quite willing to leave it to the judgment of this Committee whether I deserve to receive lectures upon sneering, upon magniloquence, or upon beating the big drum, and whether the noble Lord is the person to give them to me. But the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Pakington) has used a phrase—I do not know whether it is Parliamentary—which I take the liberty of letting him know he has no sort of right to apply to me—he used the word "disingenuous." The right hon. Baronet repeats it. It is an imputation of motive, and I believe that is un-Parliamentary. But whether it is un-Parliamentary or not, I beg leave to tell the right hon. Gentleman that I think I have served to very little purpose in this House for many years if I am not superior to a charge of that kind coming from the right hon. Gentleman. I will tell the right hon. Baronet what would be disingenuous. I should be disingenuous if I were to pretend to that forecast of the future which I am conscious I have not if I were to try to lay down, or to profess to lay down beforehand, in definite terms, that which I know must be the result of experience. You are going, if you pass this Bill, to endeavour to fuse together systems which have descended to us from our ancestors, which are very complicated in themselves, and the steps in the process of uniting them must be still more complicated. We propose to begin at the beginning, by placing them all under the same military government, and applying to them, so far as their respective natures will admit, the same rules of administration. We think it highly desirable that forces which are intended to take an important part in the military defence of this country should be placed under the command of colonels on the Staff of the Regular Army, under major-generals commanding in the districts, and under the military authorities as a whole, and not under the Lords Lieutenant of counties. We believe that by these means a beginning will be made of a much more complete system of intercommunication and fusion between the various forces than now exists. The right hon. Baronet may, perhaps, have power of forecast enough to know exactly the several steps and changes by which such a union can be effected. If he has, I envy him the gift. All I can say is that I should be happy if I possessed it, and very glad to communicate the results of it to him. But I think it would be disingenuous to profess to possess it when you know you do not, and to pretend to say that that can be done by one determination which, however easy to do when you have the conscription in your hands, you cannot do by one move and one measure when you have voluntary forces to deal with, every one of which you must carry along with you in every step of your progress. For if you take one step rashly, and find that you have displeased and disgusted them, you must either retire from it immediately, and adopt another expedient, or your whole system will fail. I am sorry to have been obliged to occupy the Committee with these remarks; but I certainly could not allow the phrase of the right hon. Gentleman to pass without some notice.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: If any word that can fairly be called un-Parliamentary has fallen from me, I shall at once, on receiving an intimation from the Chair to that effect, withdraw that word. But whether the word be Parliamentary or not, I must say that few things would give me greater pain than to say anything that would be considered personally offensive by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. I had no intention of imputing to him personally improper motives. But, on the other hand, we do feel deeply and strongly on this side of the House that we have been treated by the Government as we ought not to have been. We feel that there has been a want of candour, a want of frank communication of their intentions on this important subject, which we deeply lament, and at which we feel naturally indignant. I think we have a right to complain. We have complained of it again and again. There are many points relating to this subject on which, if it is not in the power of the right hon. Gentleman to give us an answer, I have no hesitation in saying that, in my judgment, he ought to be able to give us an answer. If he is not prepared to do so, I am obliged reluctantly to attribute it to their having brought in this great and important measure without that degree of forethought and preparation which any Government is bound to give to such a measure; and if Government is unable to give us the explanations we require, I say they ought not to have put this Bill upon the Table.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH admitted that the plan of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War of receiving subalterns into the Militia with the prospect of obtaining commissions after two years' service had succeeded to a great extent in filling up the ranks of subaltern officers; but whether their hopes of reward would be fulfilled was another matter. After what he had heard during that debate with regard to the far larger question of attracting officers from the Line to serve as ordinary officers in the Militia, he did not see how any proposal of that kind was to be carried out; because if officers from the Line—who had, perhaps, just obtained their company—were appointed as captains to a Militia regiment above the heads of those subalterns who had served for a long time in that regiment, these Militia officers would be disgusted at being passed over. If that were to be done, what encouragement was there for subalterns to enter the Militia at all? It was a most difficult thing to induce officers who had served in the Line to enter the Militia as subalterns, and he did not see how this part of the system of interchange between the two forces was to be carried out under the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman. The question of officering the Militia was in a very unsatisfactory state, and he suggested to the right hon. Gentleman that to effect an improvement in that particular the pay of officers should be increased; for if they required Militia officers, as at present, to be equally efficient with those in the Line, many men, to whom the pay was no object, would decline to expend the necessary time and trouble in order to qualify themselves for that position, so that they would be compelled to attract to the service a poorer class of officers, who were now deterred from it by the fact that the annual training commonly cost them £5 or £10 more than the pay which they received.

Mr. Cardwell

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he thought it was highly desirable that some greater efficiency should be imparted to the Militia, which was a real reserve, and some fusion of it should be made with the Line, but that was attended with great difficulty and embarrassment, and caused great anxiety among Militia officers. One word of explanation from his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War might remove the anxiety. The difficulty to which he had referred was increased by the facilities which his right hon. Friend had given for making initial appointments in the Militia with a view to arriving at appointments in the Line. If the lieutenancies and ensigncies were filled up, an officer could not come in from the Line except by supersession, and the question arose how that supersession was to take place. He therefore asked his right hon. Friend by whose authority this supersession was to take place? His right hon. Friend had formerly stated that the appointments were to be made on the authority of the Secretary of State. No doubt the responsibility rested with him; but he wished to know whether the Militia regiments were to be placed for the future on the same footing as the Line in the matter of promotion? Looking to the feeling of officers of the Line and the Horse Guards towards citizen officers, there was no doubt that no appointment except the high appointments, which were coveted, would be made, and this would strike a serious blow at the present system. His right hon. Friend had told the House that young men were joining the Militia; but he feared they were joining under a great delusion. Many gentlemen said they had read Cardwell's speech, and it would be a good thing to send their sons into the Militia. But the time of disappointment would come with regard to the appointments, unless some clear indication were given by his right hon. Friend with regard to them. He thought his right hon. Friend should state publicly in his place that the responsibility of the appointments in the Militia would rest upon himself in a far greater degree than with regard to the appointments in the Line, and that with reference to appointments in the Militia he would exercise full control, with a desire of doing justice to the officers of Militia regiments, and with the view of maintaining the esprit de corps which at present existed among them. He regarded the Militia as the true military school of the country. It might be easily embodied, and might be made far more efficient than it was at present. It could be easily disembodied without involving any half-pay or any pension list. All that depended on the local character of that force.

MR. CARDWELL entirely agreed with his hon. Friend (Sir Edward Colebrooke) that the Militia was the real reserve of the country. The appointment of officers would take place on the principle of seniority up to the rank of captain, and after that by selection. He had already stated with regard to the Army, and the remarks applied to the Militia, that it was not intended in the new arrangements in any way to interfere with the regimental system; but that, on the contrary, the principle of selection from the highest degree to the lowest would be exercised with a due regard to regimental considerations. He entirely agreed with hon. Gentlemen that the local principle of the Militia was most important, and that if there was to be a supersession of Militia officers by Army officers it should be upon the gravest grounds, and upon the most important recommendations. He was asked by what authority it would be done. He would answer the question in words that he had before used—the promotions would all be made on the same principles as in the Regular Army, the Inspector General of the Reserve forces being always consulted with respect to every promotion. A special responsibility would certainly rest on the Secretary for War; but the Inspector General of the Reserves would be consulted, because he would have before him the reports of the Generals of districts. He thought the Commander-in-Chief might also very reasonably be consulted.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, he thought nothing could be plainer in a former speech by the Secretary of State than that, after two years' service, Militia subalterns should have an opportunity of obtaining commissions in the Line.

MR. CARDWELL remarked that what he had stated was, that a certain number of subalterns of Militia regiments who had served for two years in the Militia regiments, and had obtained testimonials, should obtain commissions in the Line.

MR. HENLEY wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government whether, if this measure were to pass, there would not be then a suitable opportunity for relieving the counties of the expense which they had at present to undergo in providing armouries and other matters for the Militia. The burden of expense had been increased considerably within the last two years. Those who paid local taxes felt it very much.

COLONEL SYKES suggested to the right hon. Gentleman that his principle with respect to the Militia should be promotion by seniority, and that promotion by selection should be the exception.

MAJOR GENERAL SIR PERCY HERBERT said, there could be no doubt that the great difficulty in organizing the irregular forces was the obtaining of a proper body of officers to command them. On a former occasion the right hon. Gentleman had stated that Militia officers who were to be transferred to the Line were transferred at present, and that they should be appointed in the same way for the future. It would be in the recollection of the Committee that in the early discussions on this Bill, when purchase met them at every turn, they were told that the appointment of officers of the Line was a thing that was perfectly impracticable until purchase was abolished. They were now told that the way in which they were to be appointed to the Militia was the same as before.

MR. CARDWELL explained that what he did say was that if there were any supersessions it would be on the recommendation of the Inspector General of Reserves instead of the Lord Lieutenant.

MAJOR GENERAL SIR PERCY HERBERT replied that the right hon. Gentleman had not said a word about supersession.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY said, it was no doubt a privilege to commanding officers to appoint their own adjutants, and the practice had worked well. It would be found that the adjutants of Volunteers throughout the service were an eminently deserving, eminently hard-working, and a useful body of men, and the explanation was that it had been the interest of the commanding officers to select the best men. It was possible that the exigencies of the service, and the desire to facilitate promotion in the Army, might prove a strong temptation to the Minister of War to pass off upon the Volunteers officers who would not be so suitable. The adjutants of the Volunteers might compare more than favourably with an equal number of officers in the Line, and the general character and knowledge of their profession of the adjutants of the Volunteers had done much to raise the military profession in the opinion of civilians generally. He hoped, therefore, there might be a tacit understanding that the commanding officers of regiments would be allowed to recommend the adjutants who were to serve with them in the same way as the Lords Lieutenant had previously done.

MAJOR WALKER said, he considered that five years' service was infinitely too short for an adjutant of Militia to master all the duties of his position. The adjutant was also paymaster; he was the professional adviser of the officers on all professional matters, and it was, therefore, most important that he should be on the best terms with them. He had been asked to propose an Amendment in the absence of an hon. and gallant Friend of his (Colonel Ruggles-Brise), but he did not intend to press it. It was in page 5, line 36, after "Majesty," to insert—

"All first appointments to the rank of ensign or lieutenant in the Militia having been approved by the Lord Lieutenant of the county."

The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War stated that Lords Lieutenant should be consulted with respect to first appointments in the Militia, but Secretaries for War were neither politically nor physically immortal, and a Secretary for War might succeed the right hon. Gentleman who would not share his opinions on the point. He ventured to prophesy that as the Militia rose—and it was rapidly rising in the estimation of the country—those first appointments would become objects of the keenest competition, and it was, therefore, he thought, desirable that words should be inserted in the Bill, under the operation of which it should be the recognized duty of Lords Lieutenant to assist the Secretary of State in making them.

COLONEL NORTH said, he wished to know, whether the Secretary for War was to have the power, under the Bill, of removing officers of the Army to the Militia against their will? If so, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would inform the Committee what would be the position of an officer who had been thus removed when the Militia regiment in which he held a commission was disbanded?

MR. CARDWELL said, that it was not in contemplation to take an officer from full-pay in the Army and oblige him to serve in the Militia. He thought it, however, extremely probable that many officers would be induced to accept service in that force. One object of the arrangement was to prevent the sale of adjutancies. In reply to the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire (Colonel Loyd Lindsay), he might observe that the great object was to secure the best men as adjutants. It was not desirable, in his opinion, to limit their appointments to a period of five years, and they were, therefore, left open to renewal. What he meant when he spoke of supernumeraries was, that when, for instance, a very good officer was taken from the Army and made an adjutant in the Militia, he should be allowed to remain as a supernumerary on his regiment, so that he might not lose his position in the Army.

COLONEL CORBETT said, he thought that by being placed in the position of a supernumerary in that way an officer might frequently be induced to give up his duties as adjutant in the Militia and return to his regiment. An officer ought not, in his opinion, to be led to look upon those adjutancies as merely temporary appointments. The service ought to be a real service, especially seeing the attention which it would be necessary to pay to the recruiting of the men.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he must complain that the explanation of the provisions of the Bill had been so meagre that hon. Members were obliged to ask questions over and over again before they could obtain anything like a satisfactory answer.

MR. CARDWELL, in replying to the observations of the hon. and gallant Member for South Shropshire (Colonel Corbett), said, that under the Bill a commanding officer would have the power to remove his adjutant at the end of five years if he was dissatisfied with him, or to recommend him to be continued in the position if he was satisfied.

LORD ELCHO said, the discussion showed upon what slight grounds the Government had asked the country to undertake this large expenditure. With regard to Volunteer adjutants, he had heard with extreme satisfaction that they were not to be forced upon commanding officers, and that some security would be taken against the improper sale of these appointments. The simplest rule would probably be that the commanding officer should never listen to the recommendation of the retiring adjutant. He was also glad to hear that these appointments were to be terminable every five years. But it was clear from what the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had stated as to the appointments both of adjutants and of Militia and Volunteer officers that they were left very much as at present. That being so, what became of the great scheme of the Government, and where was the necessity for incurring this large expenditure? The alleged ground for the expenditure was the necessity of amalgamating the forces, and practically the Government were going to leave things pretty much in their present state.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he was gratified to hear the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, for the original proposal had created some alarm. He urged that the Militia regiments should be made feeders to county regiments, so that a stronger tie should be made between the two.

COLONEL DYOTT said, that if the Government intended that no officer should join the Militia service except he began at the bottom of the list—except he entered a Militia regiment—he believed it would be difficult to induce officers who had served in the Line to enter the Militia service.

COLONEL STUART KNOX wished to know whether the position of the existing adjutants would be interfered with.

MR. CARDWELL said, that in his speech on the 16th of February he had mentioned the expediency of having regiments recruited in their own districts, and had also mentioned the proposal with regard to Volunteer adjutancies. So long as existing adjutants were well reported of they would not be interfered with.

Amendment agreed to.

[Committee—Clause 7.]

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH moved at end of clause to add—

"From and after the passing of this Act, no officer holding the rank of honorary colonel in a regiment of Militia, Yeomanry, or Volunteers shall be entitled to recommend persons for appointments to commissions, or for promotion, or in any way to interfere in the command of the regiment."

MR. CARDWELL said, the appointment of honorary colonel was purely honorary, and if there were any regulations giving honorary colonels the power referred to by the hon. Baronet he would cancel it; but as he was informed that the privilege depended merely upon regulation, he did not think it right to end it by means of a statute.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On Question, "That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill,"

EARL PERCY, who had given Notice of his intention to move the omission of the clause, said he would not propose his Motion, as he felt he should not be able to carry it; but he doubted whether the Militia would continue to retain its local character, considering that half-pay officers were to be appointed to commissions; that the Secretary of State was to have the power of choosing the adjutants; and that the Lords Lieutenant were to be deprived of the power of appointing officers above the rank of subaltern.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 8 (Number of auxiliary forces).

LORD ELCHO said, he wished to make a few remarks with regard to the Militia Reserve. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would, either this year or the next, take into his consideration what was the design of General Peel in framing that Reserve—namely, that for every man who joined the Militia Reserve another man should be raised in the Militia regiments. If they could get men of proper age and physique to enter the Militia Reserve, they would have a valuable body on whom they could lay their hand in time of emergency. The Militia Reserve was one which he thought should be cultivated and improved; and in order to effect that object he thought their pay should be increased. Another question was that of the Militia volunteering by regiments for foreign service. Whenever war had occurred—for example, during the Crimean campaign and the Indian Mutiny—the Secretary of State, in the difficulty he experienced of finding men for the Army with the comparatively small force that we possessed, and of meeting the demands for garrisons and other purposes, had made an appeal to the patriotism and gallantry of the officers and men of the Militia to volunteer for foreign service, to which they were not bound by the terms of their engagement. That appeal had never been made in vain, and some 18 or 20 regiments had volunteered and served as garrisons in the Mediterranean stations. The Militia was almost like a second Army for foreign service. If, as believed by some authorities, and, he understood, by Lord Norreys in particular, there were many Militia regiments which would, like that nobleman's own, the Berkshire Militia, be willing to volunteer to be inscribed on a list where they would remain permanently as regiments of Militia ready for foreign service, the Government would know at once that, besides their Regular Army, they had a force to rely upon for foreign service. A high standard of efficiency might be adopted, and the regiments which came up to that standard might be placed on such a list. The Militia was often spoken of as the backbone of our military system; but we did not make the use we might and ought to do of that backbone. If we used our Militia not as that distinguished authority, Lord Sandhurst, recommended lately in "another place," but as General Peel had suggested, they might, with the local connection of the regiments, establish a sound system. He trusted the Government would give their serious consideration to that matter, in which he believed the solution of many of our difficulties would be found.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he concurred in what had fallen from the noble Lord (Lord Elcho), and regretted that in 1867 he did not introduce the provision which General Peel had contemplated. Whatever might be the result of the proposal of the present Government in regard to short service, the forming of an Army of Reserve, and so on, there was no Reserve in which he had half so much confidence as in our Militia.

MR. CARDWELL, without going into the future, which he hoped he would be excused from doing, with so much now upon his hands, remarked that the clause before them made the whole of the first Army Reserve of the Militia Reserve, and of the Militia, free from any statutory limit, and to consist of such a number of men as Parliament might from time to time provide.

MAJOR GENERAL SIR PERCY HERBERT said, he approved establishing relations between regiments of the Militia and of the Line, but hoped due care that regiments were sent to those localities with which they were connected, because it happened that some regiments were known by the name of counties from which they had not recruited a man for several generations.

LORD ELCHO hoped that trifling matters, such as the particular form of a button, distinguishing a regiment, would not be altogether done away with, because, although trifling, they weighed with the class from which recruits were enlisted.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 9 (Enlistment in Militia under ordinary circumstances to be voluntary).

MR. CARDWELL proposed the omission of the clause.

LORD ELCHO said, he must repeat his conviction that if the country desired a strong military force, it must adopt the compulsory system in some form or other, however modified. The principle of home defence in this country had always been that every British subject should come forward, if called upon, to defend his country, and when it was seen that almost the first act of the French Government was to introduce the Prussian system, making foreign as well as home service compulsory, it was high time that some steps should be taken in this country in the same direction. At present the Government had no control over the 170,000 Volunteers now enrolled; but that control could be obtained, and that force could be maintained at a high rate of strength by making it obligatory on all men to serve in some form, and making service as a Volunteer confer the right of exemption from something worse. If any Government had the courage to propose that, and risk their places on carrying it, on the ground that the state of neighbouring nations required it, he believed the country would respond to the appeal. Without some such provision the Army could not be organized sufficiently; and he desired to enter his protest against a system founded on any other basis than compulsory service.

MR. CARDWELL said, he rejoiced in the admission that if this Bill did not remedy the disorganized condition of our Army, neither would any other Bill, unless it were founded on compulsory service. Compulsory service, however, was at this moment the law of the land; but each year an Act was passed suspending that law, and he presumed this year would be no exception to the rule.

Clause struck out.

Clause 10 (Training for Militia).

SIR WILLIAM RUSSELL moved as an Amendment, the substitution of the word "less" for "more" at the end of the clause. If the Militia were to be made really efficient, their preliminary instruction ought to consist of a year's training, and then they would form a force which could be thoroughly relied upon. Another point which he wished to call the attention of the Committee to was the age at which troops were sent abroad. Soldiers under 20 years of age ought not to be sent abroad, and the mortality among the troops sent to India below that age had been exceedingly great.

MAJOR WALKER said, he agreed that the preliminary instruction of the Militia ought to be increased to the greatest possible amount compatible with the interests of the service, but there were important difficulties in the way of such an Amendment as this. If the preliminary training were increased to 12 months it was very questionable whether recruits would be obtained in anything like large numbers, for most men would not consent to give up a whole year of their time for the purpose of military drilling. In fact, the inducement to enter the Militia was different to the Line, as men generally entered with the idea of enjoying a holiday. The clause provided that the men were to attend for drill at the time and place appointed by the Secretary of State, and that, of course, meant that they were to be trained at one of the new headquarters which it was proposed to establish, and in doing that he had no doubt the desirability of keeping up the local connection would not be lost sight of. But this might be dangerous, for the men sent to these training centres might be put under instructors other than those of their own regiments, and, probably, under men belonging to regiments of the Line, and in that way there would be a tendency to cry up the Regulars and give the recruits themselves a contempt for the Militia. One thing that ought to be done was, the establishing of a really well-instructed body of non-commissioned officers, irrespective of the members of the permanent Staff; and their yearly period of training ought not to interfere with their other employments, for they were just the men who, from their steadiness and sobriety, obtained the best civilian vocations.

[Committee—Clause 10.]

MR. CARDWELL said, he cordially concurred in what had fallen from the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Major Walker) and observed that the powers conferred by this clause would not be so used as to lead to any inconvenience. He trusted the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Norwich (Sir William Russell) would be content with the discussion which had arisen, and not press his Amendment to a division. He quite agreed in the opinion that if they were to train a man for a year at a time they would get no Militia recruits at all, and if they did the men so trained would cost as much as, and become soldiers, and not remain Militiamen.

LORD ELCHO said, he would suggest that non-commissioned officers should be allowed to qualify themselves in the manner now permitted to the Volunteers—that was to say, by the capitation grant, a plan which would do away with the necessity of their preliminary yearly training at stated periods.

SIR WILLIAM RUSSELL said, the present system of Militia training was unfair and unjust to the Militia, and an unnecessary expense to the country. Unless the men were trained for a longer period they could not be expected to become soldiers.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, he was of opinion that all Militia recruits should undergo a continuous training of not less than six months at least.

Amendment negatived.

COLONEL CORBETT moved to add at the end of the clause the words "or less than three months." He thought it would be better to retain the men for training during three months when they first offered themselves, and when they would probably be out of work and able to remain, than to call them up a future date; not only that, but it was of no use training a man for less than three months, for it took at least that time to make a man an efficient soldier.

Major Walker

MR. CARDWELL said, he did not think three months at all too long a period for the training; but he did not think the House, which was very jealous with regard to questions of military expenditure, would do well to bind itself by statute with regard to future Estimates. The matter would be better left to the Executive Government acting under the control of Parliament. In addition to this, the exigencies of the labour market in different parts of the country would render it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to carry out the proposals of the hon. and gallant Gentleman.

LORD ELCHO said, he would suggest that increased efficiency on the part of the Militia might be obtained without inconvenience to trade if the system adopted in the Volunteer force were extended to the Militia, and the men were allowed to attend their necessary drills at the times most convenient to themselves. There should be circulating serjeants passing from village to village with boxes of rifles, and the young men could be drilled on the village green, receiving 6d. or 1s. as the case might be, which they would probably spend in what he would hope might, by the time contemplated, be described as unadulterated beer. By adopting this plan, a saving might be effected, in their being able to shorten the period of the annual training.

COLONEL ANSON said, he thought the value of the periodical training was that it taught men discipline as well as drill.

MR. ACLAND said, that if his noble Friend (Lord Elcho) would visit him in Devonshire he would show him some boxes similar to those of which he had spoken, and which were used ten years ago. He would suggest, further, the importance of the training officers being more carefully instructed in their duties.

COLONEL CORBETT said, under the circumstances, he would not press his Amendment; but suggested that the commanding officers of the district should be consulted as to the possibility of periodical training being continued.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, the hon. Member for North Devon (Mr. Acland) should remember that the men who taught the Militia their drill were the same as those who made the best Regular soldiers in the world.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 11 to 14, inclusive, negatived.

Clause 15 (Application of Mutiny Act to volunteers when in training).

LORD ELCHO said, he should not trouble the House with reference to the clause at present, as he had not expected it would be reached that night; but on the Report he should move its omission if the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) did not press the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, he thought the Volunteer force, valuable as it was at present, might be rendered far more valuable. If the Secretary of State for War would firmly handle this question, and determine what was essential for the welfare of the country and of the Volunteers, the latter would respond to any proposal he might make. He believed they would even consent to be called out every year for seven or eight days' service with the Regular Army.

COLONEL WILMOT said, he cordially accepted the clause, but thought there would be difficulties in the way of carrying it out.

MR. CARDWELL said, the clause had been inserted because the Government were willing that those Volunteers who were willing to come should be brigaded with the Regular troops.

LORD ELCHO said, he should like to know whether there were any provisions in the Mutiny Act suitable to the Volunteers. It was absurd to put men under an Act which would not enable the authorities to punish them, especially when the Volunteers were kept in a state of excellent discipline by the power possessed by those in command of instantly dismissing men for bad conduct.

MR. ACLAND said, he did not think the practical difficulties were as great as the noble Lord seemed to fancy. The old Yeomanry were originally under that Act.

LORD ELCHO said, the Yeomanry were paid, whereas the Volunteers were an unpaid force. If the Volunteers were called out in service they would be paid, and would naturally come under the Mutiny Act. Considering the circumstances under which the Volunteers had been called into existence, and the state in which they had been kept for 12 years, nothing had occurred to put upon them the slur of being placed under the Mutiny Act.

Clause agreed to.

PART IV.—SUPPLEMENTAL PROVISIONS.

As to Sale of Commissions.

Clause 16 (Appointment of Commissioners to compensate officers).

COLONEL BERESFORD said, he would move as an Amendment, in page 8, line 34, to leave out "three," and insert "five;" and in page 9, line 5, to leave out "two," and insert "three," so that there should be five instead of three Commissioners. He might also mention that Clause 19 prevented any appeal from the decision of the Commissioners.

MR. CARDWELL said, the business devolving on the Commissioners would not be heavy, though the business devolving on the actuaries, perhaps, might be. It would be very unwise to have a large number of Commissioners, especially as they would have to be paid. No appeal was allowed, because they were really intended to act as a Court of Arbitration; and the Bill defined their duties so clearly, that gentlemen of good sense and intelligence would have no difficulty in discharging them.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 17 (Appointment of clerks by Commissioners) agreed to.

Clause 18 (Powers and duties of Commissioners).

COLONEL ANSON asked the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to accept the following Amendment:—In page 9, line 15, after the word "commission" to add the following words:—

"And having ascertained such prices, the full sum shall be given in every case, without any deduction whatever in consequence of higher pay in any superior rank, or of any subsequent selection to higher rank, or in consequence of any temporary depreciation of the value of a commission in consequence of being stationed in unhealthy climates or in consequence of foreign war, and the only grounds on which any reduction shall be made shall be on account of value previously received in money; and in all cases which may arise in which it may be discovered that an officer has been unable to sell previous to the day appointed for the abolition of purchase owing to temporary causes, such as there being no purchase officer willing to give the customary over-regulation price, or in consequence of there being a supernumerary in one of the ranks of the regiment, then full compensation shall be given to such officer as if no impediment had existed in the sale of his commission."

MR. CARDWELL, although he thought that the clause would effect what was intended in the Amendment, promised to carefully consider the suggestion.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 19 (Decision of Commissioners to be conclusive) agreed to.

Supplemental Provisions as to the Ballot.

Clauses 20 to 24, inclusive, negatived.

Rules by Secretary of State.

Clause 25 negatived.

PART V.—MISCELLANEOUS AND DEFINITIONS.

Power of Government to take Railroads on Emergency.

Clause 27 (Power of Government on occasion of emergency to take possession of railroads).

MR. C. FORSTER, for Mr. LEEMAN, moved, in page 18, line 5, after "thereof," insert "and may take possession of any plant without taking possession of the railroad itself."

Line 7, after "direct," insert—

"And the directors, officers, and servants of any such railroad shall obey the directions of the Secretary of State as to the user of such railroad as aforesaid for Her Majesty's service."

Amendments agreed to.

Further Amendments made.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Barracks and Land.

Clause 28 (Power of county or municipal boroughs to build barracks).

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, although the clause was to be withdrawn, he should be glad to hear what were the views of the Government on the subject, because, with the present pressure of local taxation, there was no chance of any county building barracks. The whole Militia force could hardly be put under canvas, and it was very undesirable that Militiamen should be exposed during the period of their training to the demoralizing associations of country towns.

Colonel Anson

MR. CARDWELL said, he had been in hopes that counties might combine to build barracks for the Militia, considering that money would be lent by the Treasury, and that billet money might be applied in paying a portion of the interest; but looking to the large expense that would be incurred, and the short period the barracks would be occupied, and also to the state of feeling which prevailed in regard to rating, he thought it better to withdraw the clause.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he considered that his right hon. Friend had done wisely in not pressing the clause on the attention of the House. But the Government might avail themselves of the powers they possessed and group counties for the building of barracks; he did not think the counties possessed the power of combining for that purpose. Barracks might be built on an inexpensive scale, to be occupied by different regiments in succession. He saw no reason why the embodiment of the Militia should not be spread over more than the months of April and May, September and October, when harvest was over, might be made equally available

MR. CARDWELL observed, that the calling out of the Militia at any period of the year depended on the labour market; but they had also to guard against a great amount of fraud which might be practised by the same person receiving the bounty of different Militia regiments.

Clause negatived.

Clauses 29 to 31 negatived.

Clause 32 (Power of militia and volunteer corps to acquire land for any necessary purposes) agreed to.

Penalties and Saving Clauses.

Clauses 33 and 34 negatived.

Clause 35 agreed to.

Definitions.

Clause 36 agreed to.

MR. CARDWELL moved to insert, after Clause 26, a new clause (Order as to billeting and quartering of Militia).

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. STAPLETON moved to insert the following new clause:—

(Militia liable to serve in parts of Europe.)

"The general Militia shall be liable to serve in any part of Europe, except those parts which are under the dominion of the Emperor of Russia or the Sultan; but every soldier and non-commissioned officer who shall have enlisted, and every officer whose commission shall bear date before the passing of this Act, whose regiment shall be ordered on foreign service, shall be entitled to elect to remain in the United Kingdom; and such soldiers, non-commissioned officers, and officers as may so elect to remain in the United Kingdom shall serve with or constitute the depôts of the regiments to which they respectively belong."

The Militiamen ought to be enlisted on the understanding that they were to serve in any part of Europe, and the officers ought to accept their commissions on the same understanding. Foreign countries ought to be made aware that in the event of our being involved in war we could immediately turn our Militia to account. It would be easy to make the Militia efficient troops, and thus place at our disposal a fine force without the expenditure of a single additional farthing. Eminent generals had expressed an opinion in favour of the principle involved in his clause, the insertion of which in the Bill he begged to move. The limit as to Turkey and Russia was inserted to show that he did not think the Militia would be called upon in wars undertaken merely on account of India. Any other wars in Europe must be regarded as having for their ultimate object the safety of our own shores, the defence of which was the proper function of the Militia.

Clause read a first time.

On Motion, "That the clause be read a second time,"

MAJOR WALKER, as a Militia officer, opposed the clause, not on the ground of a reluctance to serve abroad, but because he believed that it would prove an obstacle in the way of recruiting for the Militia, for the class of men who entered that force being taken from the lowest strata of society were very suspicious of contracting new engagements. It was the more unnecessary to introduce such a provision into the Bill, inasmuch as during the Crimean War no less than 40 Militia regiments had volunteered for foreign service. He trusted that the House and the country would have sufficient confidence in the patriotism of the Militia, and would leave them a free choice in the matter.

MR. STANLEY said, he must remind the hon. Member who had moved the clause, that when this country was at war, the volunteering for foreign service by the Militia had not only been by regiments, but also by individual Militiamen volunteering to serve in the Line, which had thus obtained a considerable accession to its strength. The proposal, moreover, was objectionable in regard to its limitation.

MR. CARDWELL hoped his hon. Friend would not press his clause to a division.

MR. STAPLETON said, he believed that although a great number of the Militia would be very unwilling to go to India, they would be very willing to serve on the Continent of Europe. He would, however, withdraw the clause.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. WHEELHOUSE, in the absence of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. G. B. Gregory), moved a new clause—(Power to Commissioners to commute).

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. WHEELHOUSE, in the absence of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton), moved, after Clause 23, to insert a new clause—(Compensation to clerks of general meetings).

THE CHAIRMAN said, the clause could not be entertained by the Committee, because it was not covered by the preliminary Resolution passed with reference to the Bill.

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked, whether Her Majesty's Government proposed to consider the question raised by the clause?

MR. CARDWELL said, he was afraid he could not hold out any hope that the Government would think it right that these clerks should receive compensation.

SIR JOHN HAY moved the following clause:—

E 2 [Committee—New Clause.

Officers to lodge security in aid of retirement.

"Be it further provided, That, after the passing of this Act, each officer shall, on receiving his commission in Her Majesty's Army, lodge a sum of money not exceeding five hundred pounds, in the hands of the Accountant General of the War Office, and that on each succeeding step of rank to which the said officer shall be promoted, he shall lodge such additional sum as may be deemed necessary; each officer shall, on retiring from the Army, if he shall have not been cashiered, receive back as a bonus, or as an annuity, the sums of money he shall have so lodged, with such increment as may be due at the rate of three and a half per cent."

The hon. and gallant Baronet said, there was hardly a trade or civil profession which did not require that persons on entering it should, either by themselves or their friends, lodge a sum of money, or enter into a bond with the view of securing their good behaviour. In the Navy, security for good behaviour on the part of those who entered it was required to a considerable amount. He thought the country was entitled to obtain from those who were about to serve it in the Army that security for good behaviour which was required in the other professions in the State. There was this further consideration, that the adoption of the clause would relieve the country of an enormous amount, which was now paid to officers on retirement.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the same objection applied to this clause as to the last—namely, that it was out of Order to move the clause, as it was not covered by the original Resolution.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

PRAYER BOOK (TABLES OF LESSONS)
(re-committed) BILL—(Lords)—[BILL 181.]
COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. LOCKE KING, in rising to move that the Chairman do now leave the Chair, said, he could not help thinking that everything connected with the Bill was unsatisfactory and inconvenient. The time when the measure had been previously brought before the House was inconvenient, and the usual practice of making a statement with regard to a Bill had not been followed by its promoters. A Committee upstairs would be a much better place to discuss Amendments on a religious question like this than a Committee of the Whole House.

Sir John Hay

It was said that the Bill ought to pass because it had come from a Royal Commission. Well, a great deal was expected from that Commission, but it had done very little, and that little very badly. Alterations had been proposed which caused surprise, and others omitted where decision was necessary—for instance, the Rubric on ornaments, by the misinterpretation of which so many innovations had been introduced, and for removal of which the Commission had been appointed, was left untouched. Moreover, this Bill was a mere fragment of what had been recommended. The Commission showed all the weakness of compromise, and that House, also, was expected to show its weakness by accepting the compromise. That the Government should undertake a small Bill like this was by no means satisfactory. If they passed this Bill they would soon have another disturbance with regard to the Prayer Book, and then another Commission. It was said the trade was disturbed, and for that reason this Bill must pass. Whose fault was that? It rested with one or two Prelates, who assured the trade the Bill would pass last year, and, in consequence, the new Prayer Books were printed. If trade complained, the people would complain if that alteration was made. There was a great deal of sentiment connected with the Prayer Book. People were attached to their own Prayer Book—they did not like to change it. It was more than 200 years since it had been disturbed in any way, and if they were now to make any alterations, let it be done in such a way that those alterations would last at least for two or three generations. No one could say if this Bill passed that it would not be necessary that considerable alterations should be made in the Prayer Book at no distant day. Many of the clergy were themselves opposed to the Bill. The Archbishop of Canterbury said that other important recommendations of the Commission should be embodied in it, or it might be said we had been treated deceitfully; and Canon Trevor also objected to it. The Guardian, Church Times, and The Record recommended the postponement of the measure; and he had a letter from a clergyman, who objected that the Lessons provided by the Bill were not, on the whole, an improvement on the old Lessons; that a large portion of the Proverbs now read were omitted, and that neither the clergy nor the laity had been practically consulted upon the matter. The principle was admitted that a portion of the Apocrypha should be excluded, and he would ask why the whole of it should not be excluded, as it was uninspired? Another objection was, that either the Old or the New Prayer Book could be used, so that people would have to take both "Church Services" to Church, because they could not know beforehand which one would be used. Added to all those objections, there was a general feeling among Churchmen that the Bill was unnecessary; and for all those reasons combined, he would now move that the Chairman do leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Locke King.)

MR. BRUCE said, he thought the objections ought to have been taken at an earlier stage, because they amounted to an absolute objection to the measure. The Government felt that had they attempted more than was contained in the Bill, it would have been impossible to carry any measure, certainly during the present, and, perhaps, in any future Session. There was such a diversity of opinion on other points referred to the Commission that it was impossible to say that the views of the Church outside this House had been clearly pronounced respecting them. Under those circumstances the Government had to consider whether they would act upon this portion of the Report of the Commission containing the Lectionary, or abandon altogether the hope of legislation; and they believed that though, among 20,000 clergymen, it was impossible to expect unanimity, the Bill represented the general feeling of the clergy. The Commission was carefully selected; it was fairly representative, consisting of both clergy and laity; they selected from their body a committee of men best qualified to consider the alterations in the Table of Lessons; the committee made a unanimous Report to the Commission, who adopted it as unanimously. These proposed changes were referred to the Universities and to various persons of authority in the Church. Finally, they were considered and adopted by Convocation, although a difference of opinion occurred there; and while Convocation was, perhaps, an imperfect representation of the Church, it was the best we possessed, and he did not know what other steps could be taken to ascertain the opinion of the Church. The Government, therefore, felt it their duty to introduce a measure founded on this part of the Report of the Commission, and for that reason, he felt himself compelled to resist the Motion. They had accepted certain Amendments which would allow time for persons to become accustomed to these alterations; but the details of the measure were such as could not properly be considered either in that House or in a Select Committee. He, however, trusted his hon. Friend would withdraw the Motion.

MR. HENLEY said, he should support the Motion of the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Locke King). He would not say whether the change was a good or a bad one, nor had he one word to say against the composition of the Commission who recommended it; but who asked for it? What Petitions had been presented in its favour, except from printers who would profit by it? Look at the tens of thousands of people whose minds, by this change, would be disturbed. God knew they were disturbed enough already in going into churches. Constant novelties there hindered them from knowing whether they stood on their heads or their heels. But that Bill would make confusion worse confounded, for by one of its provisions the minister was to be allowed to decide in the morning whether he would read one Lesson or two. The humbler classes among them stuck to tradition, and the existing Lessons had long prescription in their favour. Unless a great advantage could be shown as resulting from the change, why make it? Highly-educated persons might understand why it was made, but not humbler folk. Nor did this matter stand alone. The Convocation of one of the Provinces, of their own hook, had chosen to set to work upon the Bible, so far as he knew, without authority from anybody. Who could tell at the end of seven years how much of the Bible would be left? He believed such a change as that would be injurious not only to the Church, but to the faith which in different forms most of them professed, and he thought it was entirely uncalled for.

MR. BUXTON said, that having served upon the Commission, though not on the Committee, he thought it was impossible that anybody could be appointed more entitled to the respect and confidence of the country. The Committee showed clearly that the proposed changes were improvements; the work of selection had been admirably done; and he believed it would tend not to disturb but to satisfy public feeling, when the feeling occasioned by its novelty had worn off.

MR. MONK said, he had nothing to say against the composition of the Committee, the fairness of which he did not dispute; but the great questions submitted to the Royal Commissioners remained entirely unsolved by this Bill, which only dealt with the Lectionary and the arrangement of the Calendar; and in that respect he thought they were somewhat unfairly dealt with, after reading the Bill a second time without discussion, in being told they must either accept or reject it as a whole. In some respects he did not think the new Lectionary an improvement on the old one. Many of the Lessons were seriously curtailed, and in some cases six or eight verses were substituted instead of a whole chapter—a change that he could not approve of. As to the alleged assent of Convocation, did that body really represent the Church of England—laity as well as clergy? Let Convocation first of all reform itself, and then the House would be able to leave the consideration of these matters to it. If the Bill passed, a serious tax, amounting it was calculated to £30,000 or £40,000, would be imposed upon 13,000 or 14,000 parishes, which were now bound to provide Prayer Books of a large size for use there, and how was this money to be raised, now that church rates were abolished? He should support the Motion.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK said, it was to be regretted that such a tribunal as that House should be called upon, by way of appeal, to determine questions in which a large number of hon. Members took no interest whatever. The House of Commons consisted largely of Nonconformists, Catholics, and Jews, yet they were called upon to decide as to the form of prayer which the Church of England should adopt. He did not think that House was a proper tribunal to decide whether or not certain portions of the Apocrypha, and certain books of Moses, were to be read; and the Church of England would have acted more wisely by submitting the matter to some domestic tribunal of its own, than by throwing this obstacle in the way of disposing of the great mass of public measures before the House, and which were more to the public interest.

MR. GLADSTONE: If my hon. and learned Friend the Member for the King's County (Mr. Serjeant Sherlock) had had more acquaintance with the circumstances of the case, and the history of legislation in this country, he would have found that there was some answer to his observations. As long as there is in the country a Church which has the character of a national Church, it would be a great anomaly—in fact, it would be intolerable—that changes should be introduced into its fundamental arrangements, and into its service, which were compulsory by law, and enforceable under penalties, without consent of the Legislature. My hon. and learned Friend feels that there is an incongruity in submitting to the Legislature such details. No doubt there is incongruity; but if he had referred to the history of the country he would have found that such incongruities had, on former occasions, been cured by the good sense of Englishmen, and especially by the good sense of the House of Commons. This is not the first time that a Bill of this character has been submitted to the House of Commons, but on every occasion on which there has been such a Bill the House of Commons has felt that it was essentially ill-constituted for the purposes of an ecclesiastical synod, and has been content to take a broad view of the measures submitted to it, and either to accept or reject them as a whole. I hope the House will not adopt the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Locke King). I am certain it would be far better for us to decline to deal with the Bill altogether than to set about patching it in Committee, according to the individual fancy of this or that Member who thinks that he, by the strength of his own will, could affect this or that particular improvement, and that he could amend it, independent of the great authority which stood arrayed on behalf of this Bill. Let us look whether it is or is not wise to reject this Bill. Individually, I am, like the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr.

Henley), very thankful for the Table of Lessons we have in the Prayer Book, and I should have been perfectly well content to leave to other generations the consideration of its improvement. But when he says—"Who have asked for improvement?" I am bound to say that many considerable persons have asked for it. Great authorities have asked for it. Reference has been made to Convocation. Convocation, though not strictly a representative body, yet is an important body, and represents a large mass of the opinion of the class which of all others is most interested in the question. Convocation in both Provinces has given its assent to this change; the House of Lords has given its assent to the change; and these three bodies—the Commission, Convocation, and the House of Lords—are not bodies of which it can be said that they are of too radical or too reforming a character. The right hon. Gentleman asked—"Why shake the minds of the people?" I feel with him about shaking the minds of the people; but I think it would be an exaggeration for me to say we are confronted by changes. There is no change here in the customs and belief of the Church, and the sound of the ancient English Scriptures; they still sound as before in the ears of the English people; and though the people are attached to the services of the Church, yet I do not think they are so acquainted with the Calendar and the chapter, and verses of the chapter which are to be read on each Sunday, as to detect the change which is to be made. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the choice between one Calendar and the other; but it is only fair to say that Government, in venturing to introduce that Amendment into the Bill, did not intend to act on any principle of giving effect to their own individual will. It never entered into the head of anyone that congregations would go backwards and forwards capriciously from one Calendar to another. The consideration which weighed was that in many parishes it would be a hardship to purchase Prayer Books with new Calendars, and in any case it would be undesirable to provoke opposition by proposing the necessity of a sudden change. That was a matter for which—though we have introduced such a change—we certainly had no strong opinion of our own to urge if we should be proved to be wrong. But though there is no general discontent with the general Table of Lessons, I think, upon the whole, this new Calendar has been favourably received by the country, and it is with that belief that it is now proposed, and not from any impatience to change the existing form of service, which years of use have endeared to so many persons. Nevertheless, after all those bodies I have referred to, possessed of great authority in the matter, have assented to the contents of the Bill, I think that no sufficient reason has been shown why this House, though modified in its constitution in recent years, should decline to accept a measure of this kind; for the House has, on several occasions, dealt with measures affecting the temporal and spiritual arrangements of the Church. I admit the great unfitness of the House to discuss and modify in detail a Bill of this character, but that does not constitute a reason why, as a legislative and deliberative Assembly, it should withhold its general assent to a measure which has undergone great consideration, and has received the assent and approval of a large body of the community interested in the subject. I trust, therefore, the House will not agree to the Motion.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he wished to ask the Prime Minister, whether, by accepting the legislation that was proposed by the Royal Commissioners on this point, the Committee would be precluded from subsequently dealing with their other recommendations? The hon. and learned Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) had cast some aspersions on the conduct of the Royal Commissioners, but if he took the trouble to read the résumé of their Report that had been prepared by one of their number, he would feel that their recommendations were worthy of the consideration of all thoughtful men. In the first instance, he was of opinion that it would be well to leave this matter alone; but having since had the opportunity of very carefully considering the subject, he had come to see the immense superiority of the new Table of Lessons over the old one, and he should be loth to stand in the way of the adoption of so great an improvement. The Government had already made a concession as to the liberty to be granted to clergymen with respect to the use of the new Lessons, in proposing that no one should be obliged to read them until 1879; but it would be more in accordance with the present state of public feeling if that liberty were extended for an indefinite period, and clergymen had the alternative of using either the old Lessons or the new ones. The opinion of Churchmen would soon decide the matter in one way or the other, and on their decision, based upon the experience of a few years, there could be legislation hereafter. With regard to the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for the King's County (Mr. Serjeant Sherlock), he could only say that hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House had been careful not to run counter to the religious feelings of those who sat on the other benches, and he appealed to those who entertained the same opinions as the hon. and learned Member not to use such language as he had uttered on so sacred a matter. He could not consent to the doctrine that the representatives of the United Kingdom were not interested in the settlement of matters concerning the Church of this country; whether hon. Members belonged to the Church of England or not, the condition of the Church must be a matter of the greatest importance to them and to the nation generally, and as in all professions it was of great service to get an outside opinion, so it was of great advantage to the Church to elicit the opinions of Nonconformists, since by that means light would be thrown on some of its difficulties, which everyone who wished well to the country, whether he belonged to her communion or not, would desire, for the sake of the public welfare, to see overcome.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) did not apply, and that he could assure the House that this matter had not been slurred over by the Royal Commissioners. The revision of the Table of Lessons was one of the objects committed to them, and it was not for them to inquire whether there was a public demand for it. When the Commissioners met, they were of opinion that the work of revision had better, in the first instance, be intrusted to a sub-Committee, and such a body was appointed as was truly representative of the larger Commission. The Table of Lessons which they prepared was circulated among the whole body, and by them it was maturely considered. It did not pass without certain alterations being made, and in its revised form it had been adopted by the Convocation of both Provinces and by the other House of Parliament. This House ought not to criticize those details to which some of the Amendments pointed, but should adopt the Bill with the long period that had been granted by the Government for the adoption of the new Table. If it approved itself to the common sense of religious people, the new Table would gradually and peaceably take its place, without the parishes being put to the expense supposed by the hon. and learned Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), since any parish could for a penny buy a copy of the Act which would contain the Table of Lessons. At the end of seven years, if it should not be approved of, and the old Table should be preferred, the present Bill might be repealed by a very short Act. He trusted the Bill would be passed through Committee, and that the new Table would give peace and contentment to the Church.

MR. CANDLISH said, as no Dissenter had yet spoken on the question, he wished to say a few words upon it. Since the Prime Minister had deprecated discussion on the details of this Bill, on the ground that the House was unfit to deal with them, it was fair to presume he was really opposed to it. But how were Dissenters to vote upon the question. [An hon. MEMBER: Not at all.] Dissenters believed that civil government had nothing to do with the internal affairs of a Christian church; how, then, could they do otherwise than vote with the hon. Member for Surrey? The Prime Minister knew that the feeling for disestablishment was growing rapidly. ["No, no!"] He knew that 91 Members had voted for disestablishment, and that should not be lost sight of. ["Question!"] It was the question; because, as he believed, the civil power had nothing to do with the inside of a church, it was his duty to vote for the Amendment. The Prime Minister must know disestablishment was near at hand, and that when the Church was disestablished it would be able to deal with the Prayer Book as it pleased.

DR. BALL said, he intended to support the Government, but he must protest against the doctrine that the House should take the Bill as the Government had chosen to alter it. The Commission which had dealt with the matter was appointed by the late Lord Derby, and was composed of men of all shades of opinion, lay and clerical; the Lectionary recommended by them was adopted unanimously, and although he was not altogether satisfied with it, he was not prepared to raise his individual opinion against the unanimous conclusions of so eminent a body as that Commission. He did not, for instance, approve the change by which the New Testament was to be read only twice a-year instead of thrice; there were many who never heard the sound of the Gospel except in church, and it was unadvisable that the opportunities now afforded to such persons of becoming acquainted with the foundation of our faith should be curtailed. He also objected to allowing two Lectionaries to exist up to the year 1879. In the old Lectionary, 106 Lessons were taken from the Apocrypha; in the new only 40, and numerous other changes were made. If the two Lectionaries were allowed to be in force for the next seven years not only would the people be at a loss to know which Lectionary would be used, but the very existence of two Lectionaries would become a standard of disagreement. He objected to giving parties in the Church an opportunity of setting up that or any other Shibboleth. It would also be a great inconvenience to members of the Church if it were in the power of the minister to choose which Lectionary he would use; as one clergyman would adopt the new one, whilst another minister might use the old one, and thereby great confusion would arise. This proposal was a pure invention of the Government, unsupported by the House of Lords, Convocation, or the Commission. The Prime Minister had said he wished to ascertain the opinion of the people upon the subject; but no steps had been taken to do so, and it was most impolitic to allow the opinion of the people upon such a subject to be developed in the midst of schismatic contentions. He maintained that the Bill ought not to be confined simply to the Lectionary; for, as he reminded the House, the Commission appointed by the late Lord Derby was not selected for that purpose only, but with especial reference to the growth and increase of Ritualism in England. That was not the only unanimous recommendation of the Commissioners, for there were a great many of the numerous recommendations which were made unanimously, and which were not included in the Bill before the House. He should ill-discharge his duty if he did not say that he thought the Bill inadequate; but he had derived considerable consolation from the statement of the Prime Minister—that the Government in passing this Bill must not be taken as opposing the other recommendations of the Commission, which would be open to future consideration.

MR. LIDDELL said, he thought these questions ought to be settled between the members of the Church of England, and that they could never be so settled until the constitution of the Governing Body of that Church was revised and remodelled more in accordance with the feelings of the people of this country. These matters would then be arranged within Convocation, and when they came to Parliament to sanction their arrangement they would meet with that respect to which they were entitled. Were matters in the position he had described, that House need not have incurred the well-merited reproof, which he hoped they would take to heart, of the hon. and learned Member for the King's County (Mr. Serjeant Sherlock). He would support the Amendment. He was a Conservative, and detested change merely as such. Unless change was shown to be necessary, he invariably opposed it. He was not aware that public opinion was in favour of the proposed change, and he believed it would create doubt and difficulty in the minds of the laity.

MR. GRAHAM said, he believed it was not the duty of hon. Members who did not belong to the Church of England to walk out of the House, but to vote on this question according to their conscientious opinion. The Prime Minister had said that the Bill must be accepted in its entirety upon the authority simply of Convocation and the Ritualistic Commission. As a Presbyterian, he (Mr. Graham) could not admit that any such bodies had any right to dictate the formula according to which the people of that country were to worship God. No more unchristian principle could be asserted than that these formulas should be imposed upon the people by the votes of political parties. He could not support this Bill, especially as it provided that matter should be read in the public services of our churches as God's Word which he did not believe to be so.

MR. BRUCE said, he was unable to follow the argument of his hon. Friend (Mr. Graham), to the effect that they had no right to impose the reading of particular Lessons. The existing Lessons rested on the authority of Parliament, and the object of this Bill was partly to reduce the number. As regarded the questions of the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon), and the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Dr. Ball), as to the intentions of the Government, he would observe that there were a great many other recommendations upon which the Commissioners were agreed; but, on the other hand, there were a large number upon which they were not unanimous, and as these comprised some of the most interesting and important questions, in dealing with the others it would have been impossible to pass them by. The Government had to consider whether the time was come for proposing legislation with regard to points on which there was such difference of opinion, and they thought it was not come. But those questions were under the consideration of the Church—possibly at no distant period they might be dealt with; and whenever there was a reasonable prospect of their being satisfactorily and harmoniously decided, that Government, or any succeeding one would, he was sure, be happy to take up the matter.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, he entirely agreed with the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Graham), that neither he nor any hon. Member of that House should walk out on this or any other occasion. With reference to the observations of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish), he wished to remind that hon. Gentleman that 26 years ago the Dissenters' Chapel Bill was brought into the House at the instigation of the Nonconformists, that it had to meet a narrow sectarian opposition, but that the majority of Churchmen in the House supported the Dissenters on that occasion; and he thought the Dissenters would do well to support on this occasion a question which had been thoroughly sifted by the Church authorities.

MR. D. DALRYMPLE, who spoke amid considerable interruption, said, he had taken great pains in examining the new Lectionary, and unhesitatingly declared that the old one was the better of the two. The present Bill gave a chance of two Lectionaries, and he was convinced that this would be certain to introduce into parishes new elements of discord.

Mr. Graham

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish) only desired to extend to the Church the same liberty which Parliament conferred upon the Dissenters 26 years ago. It had been said that the duty of Parliament in regard to this question was to confirm the decision of Convocation; but to this he strongly objected, for this, if for no other reason—that, so far as he had been able to ascertain, Convocation could not be said in any adequate way to represent the opinions of the great mass of the lay members of the Church of England.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 39; Noes 204: Majority 165.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Substitution of Tables of Lessons in schedule for old Tables).

MR. HOLT rose to propose one of a series of Amendments, the first being in page 2, line 3, after "read," to insert the word "and," which would have the effect of introducing into the Prayer Book the old and new Tables of Lessons. He tendered his best thanks to the Government for the consideration they had given to his Amendments, and their endeavour by the alterations they had made in the Bill to introduce them to some extent. The Bill was opposed last Session, and it was hoped that delay would result in the introduction of a more comprehensive measure this Session dealing with the Rubric as well as the Table of Lessons. The Government who issued that Commission, and the present Government, who renewed it, were of opinion that the most important question to deal with was the Rubric, that of the Table of Lessons being secondary and subordinate to it. There were, therefore, abundant reasons last year to show that the Bill was prematurely introduced, because the Commissioners had not then reported on the chief subject submitted for their consideration; and the experience of last Session showed that the Bill must fail unless its scope was enlarged. This was the opinion of the Archbishop of Canterbury, expressed in his letter to the Bishop of London last January. He was therefore surprised and disappointed to find the Bill had been introduced in its present form. It was, however, thought better not to oppose the measure, but to offer such Amendments for the consideration of the Committee as might render it less objectionable. If this Amendment was not adopted, he admitted that most of the others must fall to the ground. His objection to the Government scheme was that it would destroy after some years the use of the old Table of Lessons, and he desired the Committee to take such a course as would leave the clergy free still to use the old Table of Lessons, and by making the action of the Bill permissive, not compulsory, would also prepare the way for the final settlement of the question.

MR. HEYGATE said, he approved of the Amendment. He had reluctantly voted with the minority in the last division, because he feared that this Bill, if carried in its present form, would produce anxiety and indignation in the minds of many worthy people.

MR. BRUCE said, the object of the proposition of the hon. Member for North-east Lancashire was to render the use of the old or new Table of Lessons optional; but the hon. Member seemed to intend that the effect of his Amendment should be only temporary, and he failed to see the practical difference between it and the proposition of the Government. He therefore hoped the hon. Member would not press his Amendment.

MR. T. CHAMBERS said, he thought the new Lectionary superior to the old one, but was in favour of giving a large discretion to the clergy as to the reading of the Holy Scriptures in churches. The Government, after rejecting an Amendment which he had suggested, to enable a clergyman to substitute a passage from the Scriptures for a Lesson from the Apocrypha, had postponed the operation of this minute reform for seven years. He did not think this reasonable, and should support the Amendment.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he thought the Government had adopted a wise and prudent course in giving an option to the clergy in this matter, because many clergymen would have felt conscientious scruples as to using the new Lectionary at once. But in the course of seven years he believed that public opinion would be formed in favour of the new Table, and that it would be accepted by the whole Church. He hoped the House would support the Government.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK, who spoke amid considerable interruption, protested against the practice of requiring the House to legislate on subjects with regard to which it was assumed that some hon. Members had no right to express opinions, and deprecated going into details on this measure.

MR. HOLT said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

DR. BALL moved an Amendment, fixing the period giving the optional power of reading the Lessons at "1873" instead of "1879," the former being the date agreed to by the House of Lords. He wanted to know the reason why the Bill was altered after it came down from the Lords?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the Government adopted the latter period, in conformity with the unanimous assent of the Prelates in the House of Lords.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he would vote for the Amendment, if pressed to a division.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY hoped his right hon. and learned Friend would not persevere with his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Schedule,

MR. HOLT moved in line 25, to omit "the second time," and to insert "one of the two services," leaving it optional to the clergyman to use the particular form laid down at one of these two services.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE urged that this part of the Schedule should be left as it stood.

Amendment negatived.

MR. LOCKE KING moved, as an Amendment, in page 5, line 6, after "minister," to insert—

"Except that when any Lesson from the Apocrypha is appointed for the holyday the proper Lessons for the Sunday shall always be read."

Amendment negatived.

Amendment proposed,

In line 6, after the word "minister," to insert the words "but whensoever a lesson is appointed taken from the Apocrypha, the minister may, at his discretion, substitute a chapter taken from the canonical books of the Old Testament."—(Mr. Holt.)

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 71; Noes 81: Majority 10.

Schedule agreed to.

On Question, "That the Preamble be agreed to,"

Amendment proposed,

In line 19, after the word "Prayer," to insert the words "and such revised Tables of Lessons have been considered and approved by the Convocations of Canterbury and York."—(Mr. Gathorne Hardy.)

MR. MACFIE moved that the Chairman report Progress.

MR. GLADSTONE hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press that Motion, which, at this stage of the Bill, would be very unfair. He opposed the right hon. Gentleman's (Mr. G. Hardy's) Amendment, remarking that there had been a technical informality in connection with the meeting of Convocation at which the subject was considered. The words had been deliberately struck out in the House of Lords, with the assent of all the temporal and spiritual Peers.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER said, he would support the Amendment, and would state that nothing would have induced him to vote for the Bill had it not been for the fact that Convocation, which, however imperfect in its constitution, was actually the representative of the Church, had approved the measure.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he could not admit that Convocation was the legal representative of the Church of England while Parliament existed and the Sovereign remained the Head of the Church. Convocation represented the clergy.

DR. BALL recommended the adjournment of the debate, as the decision come to by the House of Lords was far too important a matter to be disposed of in a cursory manner at the close of a long Sitting.

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to know from the Government, whether the House knew as a fact of that which it was asked to introduce into the Preamble officially.

MR. BRUCE said, he had official cognizance of it, but that it had not been communicated officially to Parliament.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 55; Noes 94: Majority 39.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill to be reported.

The Clerk at the Table informed the House, That Mr. Speaker was unable to resume the Chair this Evening.

Whereupon Mr. Dodson, the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Bill reported, with an Amendment; as amended, to be considered To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he had learnt with great astonishment that the Government intended to proceed to-morrow at the Morning Sitting to discuss the Report of the Committee on Public Business. He protested against such a course being pursued without due notice, and at an hour when professional Members of the House must necessarily be absent. He begged to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.)

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Government were anxious to proceed with the subject to-morrow, not so much in their own interest as in that of private Members. The discussion would be confined to two proposals which had been made by the Committee—that relating to the power of counting out on Tuesdays and Fridays, which the Government proposed should not be exercised until half-past 9 o'clock, when there had been a Morning Sitting, and that relating to the exclusion of strangers.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

METROPOLITAN BUILDING ACT (1855) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Alderman LAWRENCE, Bill to amend "The Metropolitan Building Act, 1855," by adding to the exemptions from Part I. of the Act the buildings of the New Foreign Cattle Market on the site of Deptford Dock, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Alderman LAWRENCE and Sir DAVID SALOMONS.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 200.]

CHAIN CABLES AND ANCHORS BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law respecting the Proving and Sale of Chain Cables and Anchors.

Resolution reported:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE and Mr. ARTHUR PEEL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 201.]

House adjourned at a quarter before
Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 16th June, 1871.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—

Justices of the Peace Qualification* (188); Petroleum* (189).

Second Reading—Lunacy Regulation Amendment (171); Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, Amendment (185).

Third Reading—Citation Amendment (Scotland)* (177); East India Stocks (Dividends)* (178); Postage* (179), and passed.

Royal Assent—University Tests [34 Vict. c. 26]; Protection of Life and Property in certain Parts of Ireland [34 Vict. c. 25]; Ewelme Rectory [34 Vict. c. 23]; Presbyterian Church (Ireland) [34 Vict. c. 24].

FRANCE—THE COMMUNIST INSURRECTION—ENGLISH PRISONERS AT SATORY.—QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he did not see present the noble Earl (the Earl of Airlie), who recently put a Question to him as to the number of Englishmen compromised in the late unfortunate events at Paris; but he thought it right to give the House the latest information in his possession with regard to Englishmen now prisoners in Paris. The unfortunate boy, William Lowe, who was found with a pistol in his hand behind a barricade, had since been released. The fullest inquiry which could be instituted as to the persons who were, or were represented to be, British subjects, and who had been arrested on the charge of complicity in the insurrection, showed that of 19 persons who were known to have been arrested 10 had been released, and nine were still in confinement; while two persons were missing from their homes whom our Consul had not yet found. He wished to take the opportunity of correcting a very natural misreport which happened on his recently reading a despatch describing the conduct of Mr. Saumerez, which their Lordships seemed to think exceedingly creditable. His observation on the judgment and discretion of the writer of the despatch, Mr. Malet, was inadvertently attributed to Mr. Saumerez, whereas he wished to do both gentlemen the justice they deserved.

HER MAJESTY'S SHIP "CAPTAIN."

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE rose to call attention to the Minute by the late First Lord of the Admiralty with reference to H.M.S. "Captain." He thought the issue of this Minute a great mistake, inasmuch as it was published without the knowledge of some of the late First Lord's Colleagues, upon whom, and especially upon Sir Spencer Robinson and the officers of the Controller's Department, it, by implication, cast much blame, because it reflected upon matters in which they were personally and officially concerned. That this blame was not justly deserved was evidenced by the finding of the Court Martial that had sat to inquire into the loss of the Captain, and who found that the ship capsized by pressure of sail, assisted by the heave of the sea; and that the sail carried at the time of her loss—regard being had to the force of the wind and state of the sea—was insufficient to have endangered a ship endued with a proper amount of stability—and they added—

"That the Court, before separating, find it their duty to record their conviction that the Captain was built in deference to public opinion, expressed in Parliament, and in opposition to the views and opinions of the Controller and his Department, and that the evidence all tends to show that they generally disapproved of her construction."

That finding he (the Earl of Lauderdale) thought was just and proper, for no man could have been more opposed to the plans of this vessel than Sir Spencer Robinson and Mr. Reed. The experiment was strongly urged upon the Admiralty by speeches in Parliament, and by letters in the public Press. Mr. Childers, he thought, ought to have allowed the matter to rest on that finding. Instead of that, Mr. Childers issued the Minute to which he was calling their Lordships' attention. On examining the Minute, he found it to be very inaccurate in its statements. For instance, the history of the circumstances which led to the ordering of the Captain was imperfect and one-sided, and the extract from the Report of the Committee of Naval Officers, of which he (the Earl of Lauderdale) had the honour to be Chairman, was so selected as to suggest that the Committee recommended that a conclusive trial should be given to a sea-going turret-ship similar to the Captain; whereas the plan of which they recommended a trial contemplated a vessel only half the size of the Captain, and with 10 feet freeboard; whereas the Captain was intended to have 8 feet freeboard, but when launched had only 6 feet 6 inches. That the Admiralty comprehended their recommendation was shown by their building the Monarch, a ship with 14 feet freeboard, and with two turrets. The Monarch was intended to carry out Captain Coles' views as to turret-ships; but the Admiralty gave up an essential part of Captain Coles' original plan, for they gave up the all-round fire, and put a forecastle on her; and this, no doubt, made her a better sea-going vessel. Captain Coles, however, objected to these parts of the design as discarding some of the chief merits of the turret system. He was then allowed to build a ship on his own plan:—when, however, the plan was laid before the Admiralty she had both a poop and forecastle, thus sacrificing the all-round fire he (Captain Coles) had up to that time so strongly advocated. The Controller's Department was consulted on the plan of the Captain, and they reported that they saw nothing to lead them to believe there was any deficiency in the stability of the vessel; but the plan they reported on had a freeboard of eight feet. The ship was ordered to be constructed by Sir John Pakington, as First Lord of the Admiralty, who was succeeded in his office by Mr. Corry. Mr. Childers had nothing to do with the building of the Captain; but she was received into the service during his tenure of office, and it was impossible to read the Minute without being led to believe that blame was thrown on the

The Earl of Lauderdale

Controller's Department for not expressing strongly enough their objections to the plan. It was perfectly clear the Admiralty intended that the Captain should be built according to the plans of Captain Coles and Mr. Laird, the builder, and that they did not wish to take any responsibility on themselves unless the Constructor's Department reported she was totally unfit for sea. Now, it never entered the heads of the Department that that was the case, and though they totally disapproved of the plan, they did not think she was unfit to go to sea. He had, however, reason to believe that every bit of information known to the Controller's Department was known also to Captain Coles and Mr. Laird, the builder. The only point they were unaware of was the result of the final calculations after the heeling over alongside of Portsmouth Dockyard just before her final departure. That experiment of heeling over was made in the presence of Captain Coles, and he believed all were satisfied about her centre of gravity. Mr. Laird had stated that the results almost exactly tallied with his estimate, and that had the final calculations been made known to him they would not have made him doubt her fitness to go to sea. Nor was this doubted by the Controller's Department, although they disapproved the plan. Both Mr. Reed and Mr. Scott Russell had previously urged the danger of low freeboards; and after the launching of the Captain, when the freeboard proved to be only 6½ feet, the former gentleman stated that she was unsafe without a breastwork. What he supposed Mr. Reed meant was, that she was quite unfit for a sea-going ship, and that sooner or later she would come to grief. His opinion, however, did not prevent the vessel from going to sea. Indeed, public feeling was so strongly in favour of the trial that nothing could have prevented this. One of Mr. Childers' complaints was, that the Controller's Department did not give him full information upon the subject, and that they did not urge their objections with sufficient strength. When, however, he proposed to build other ships something like the Captain, Mr. Reed informed him that it would not be safe to build low freeboard ships with masts; and when he found his remonstrance useless, he retired from his office. All the sea

Lords, Mr. Reed said, were opposed to the construction of low freeboard ships—especially with masts; and, so far as he (the Earl of Lauderdale) could understand from the Minute, the only person in favour of low freeboard ships when the Captain was received into the Navy was Mr. Childers himself. It was a professional question, and it was not right in Mr. Childers to throw the blame on the professional men who were opposed to the construction of such vessels. The building of the Captain was a national experiment, and nothing could be known without subjecting such a vessel to a full trial. But it must be remembered that such experiments could not be made without danger. The real point of a trial commenced at the point of danger, and it was no use arguing, for sailors would not believe in words. The danger attending such trials was illustrated by the indiarubber boats carrying a 13-inch mortar, which were tested at Spithead during the Crimean War, and after promising well, split in halves on the mortar being fired, all but one of those on board happily escaping. The Court Martial reported that the Captain was capsized from want of stability, and the public wished to know to what it was owing: but no report of that kind had been made, and Mr. Childers had stated that he hoped more ships of the same character would be built. Since her loss various reasons had been given for the accident. It had been said that she had too low a freeboard—that she had too high a centre of gravity—that she had not beam enough, and that she carried 800 tons more than she was designed for. Those were points which the public wanted settled—because either one of them was sufficient to capsize a vessel like the Captain. Mr. Childers, in the third part of the Minute, appeared to have proposed to construct a double turret-ship, with a low freeboard, with limited sail power. Mr. Reed objected to this proposal, and it was abandoned; but after discussion it was agreed to build two two-turreted ships, without masts, following out very nearly Mr. Reed's original designs. These were the Thunderer and the Devastation. He thought that a doubtful experiment, and the late First Lord was wrong in building more than one of those ships until the plan had been fairly tried and tested. He distinctly stated that he did not approve of those ships. He objected to their want of masts, to their low freeboard, and to their draught of water. The new principle of sea-going ships like the Monitor was a low freeboard, its advocates arguing that the old principle of a ship rising on the top of the waves was a mistake—that it was better that ships should be built so as to enable them to cut through the waves, and so avoid pitching and rolling. It seemed to him that sailing in such a ship would be submarine navigation, and would be worse than travelling by an underground railway. In the railway you did now and then come to the surface and get a breath of fresh air; but in such a vessel you must be close shut up and live by artificial ventilation. He hoped that only one of those vessels would be completed at first, in order that its powers might be fully tested by a fair trial before the whole expenditure was incurred for the completion of the remainder of them. This low freeboard question was a most serious one. Being a gunnery man himself he was quite aware of the value of a low freeboard and the turret for gunnery purposes; but it was of far greater importance to secure the safety of the men on board. In regard to merchant ships the Legislature was acting differently, inasmuch as it was trying to prevent low freeboards as much as possible—for a low freeboard meant overloading, and no merchant vessels were built with low freeboards. But men-of-war were laden with coal and iron, and with a low freeboard would be much less safe than merchant ships. In the latter the centre of gravity might be low; but the centre of gravity in men-of-war could not be low. The noble Earl read a letter from a sailor to his sweetheart, on the eve of his departure on board a merchant ship which was overladen—the writer stating that he did not at all like the look of the vessel, but that he was not one to show the white feather; but he supposed that if it were good for the captain it was equally good for him, and hoping that she would keep up her heart and pray for his safe return. Now, that vessel was never heard of again. He knew also of a case of an officer of an iron-clad vessel going to insure his life for £1,000; but the authorities at the insurance office, on hearing that his ship was an iron-clad, refused to accept him. In conclusion, he would urge upon the Government the views he had expressed with regard to the Captain. He trusted also they would consider the point he had urged as to the overloading of merchant vessels, and the propriety of introducing into the Merchant Shipping Act provisions to prevent this practice.

LORD DUNSANY, a shipmate of Sir Spencer Robinson's 48 years ago, said, it was no exaggeration to say that Sir Spencer was a distinguished officer, who deserved well of his country, and could not be fairly blamed for the loss of the Captain; under no circumstances could he be held accountable for the occurrence. But, at the same time, he acquitted Mr. Childers of any desire to shuffle off responsibility from his own shoulders. The fault lay in the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, which was characterized by responsibility without professional experience, and so full of anomalies that he should not be surprised to hear of a "Battle of Dorking" any day. He anticipated that great disaster would result in the future from the fact that the First Lord of the Admiralty possessed almost unlimited powers to build ships of whatever design pleased him best, even though in doing so he might be acting contrary to the advice of his professional colleagues. These unprofessional First Lords were, to his thinking, to be regarded in the light of national misfortunes. The late Sir James Graham, for instance, commenced his naval reforms by depriving the officers and architects of the means of technical education—he then reduced the Navy of the country to a state of utter impotence, and he abolished the Marine Artillery—one of the finest and most useful corps in the service. He regretted, however, to find that the Court Martial had travelled out of the inquiry which was specially committed to them—they had nothing to do in the finding except what had been brought before them in evidence. He meant nothing personal against Mr. Childers; but he wished to point out the difficulty of non-professional First Lords when dealing with strictly naval questions.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, that when a great national loss, such as that of the Captain, one of the finest ships in the Navy, occurred, and several hundreds of lives were sacrificed by the catastrophe, the subject was one which undoubtedly deserved the attention of their Lordships, and all the papers and documents calculated to throw any light upon it would receive their most careful consideration. In bringing this subject forward the noble Earl (the Earl of Lauderdale) had referred to several naval questions which were, no doubt, of great interest and importance; but it would perhaps be more convenient if he (the Earl of Camperdown) were to confine himself strictly to the noble Earl's Notice as it appeared on the Paper—namely, the Minute relating to the loss of the Captain. The noble Earl had criticized two matters which were recorded in that Minute, the first being the reply of the Admiralty to the finding of the Court Martial, and the second the proceedings of the Admiralty in ascribing a portion of the blame for the loss of the Captain to the Controller's Department. And here it should be remembered that besides the reputation of the officers who sat on the Court Martial and those in the Controller's Department there was also involved the reputation of the officers who were lost in the ship. As to the reply of the Admiralty on the finding of the Court Martial, the noble Earl said that the Admiralty were scarcely justified in expressing their extreme surprise that so grave a reflection on public opinion and on the Board of Admiralty which in 1866 ordered the building of the Captain, should have been recorded by a Court Martial. But the reason why their Lordships objected to the finding—or to that part of the finding—was that though the statement made by the Court Martial might be perfectly true, it did not rest upon anything that had been set forth in the evidence that had been laid before them. The Court Martial referred in their decision to what they called "a proper amount of stability;" but, as the Admiralty pointed out, it must have been known to the officers of the fleet, and to the Court that a turret-ship with a low freeboard had not the same conditions of stability as a broadside ship with a high freeboard. That was a fair matter for remark by the Admiralty. But, independently of that, the Lords of the Admiralty called attention—as he thought they had a perfect right to do—to the fact that the Controller of the Navy was not called before the Court. Now, the Lords of the Admiralty had not the slightest wish to interfere with the independence of the proceedings of the Court; but when a ship like the Captain was lost, and the Controller of the Navy—the head of the constructive department of the Admiralty, within whose period of office the ship had been built, and with the building of which he had been to a certain degree connected—was not examined before a Court Martial which was inquiring into the circumstance of the ship's loss, he thought the Lords of the Admiralty were not only justified in calling attention to the circumstance, but that they would hardly have been justified if they had not done so. He would observe that the Minute was published by the First Lord of the Admiralty, that the words "By order of the Board of Admiralty" were printed upon it by the Stationery Office without authority—and that the Minute was not the Minute of the Board, but of the First Lord alone, and was written by him in consequence of decided opinions he held on the subject of the individual responsibility of the Ministers of the Crown for the business connected with their departments. When this matter occurred, the First Lord made his own inquiry, and, attributing the fault to certain officers in the Department, he wrote his Minute. The Minute consisted of 42 pages of facts and 73 pages of Appendix.

He would confine himself to the positive statements therein made. It was set forth in the document that—"When Sir John Pakington's Board approved of the design, Captain Coles and the Messrs. Laird accepted the entire responsibility, and the Controller of the Navy and other officers of the Navy were for a time relieved from it."

That—

"It was also clear that, when the Captain was completed and sent for trial to sea, although the responsibility of Captain Coles and the Messrs. Laird for the construction of the ship continued, yet the Controller of the Navy and the other officers became responsible for the ship's fitness to go to sea."

It could not be denied that if the Controller of the Navy entertained the opinion that a ship was not fit to go to sea, he ought to make a direct representation to the First Lord of the Admiralty on the subject. In that view Sir Spencer Robinson himself concurred, when he stated in his reply that the Constructor's Department had no responsibility, either technical or moral; but that they had no apprehensions that a trial at sea would subject the ship to imminent danger, and that if the Chief Constructor had apprehended any such danger the department would have felt itself under an irresistible moral obligation to point out its apprehensions. Sir Spencer Robinson went on to say that neither he nor Mr. Reed considered the ship to be unsafe for trial "if properly handled." Mr. Reed in his report, though he considered that no satisfactory result would be obtained from the trial of the ship, did not express any anticipation of the Captain going to the bottom. This was before the loss of the ship; but at the Court Martial he said, in reply to questions as to the stability and seaworthiness of the vessel, that owing to the want of stability shown in the design and construction of the ship he had for some time entertained doubts as to her seaworthiness. Mr. Reed was asked whether he did not think it was necessary to give that information to Captain Burgoyne; and his reply was that he did not think it was necessary for him to do anything which he did not do. Now, Mr. Childers absolved the Controller in the first instance from responsibility, but went on to say that he became responsible for the ship's fitness to go to sea at a certain period—by which was meant that he ought to have reported to him the vessel's unworthiness to go to sea. Mr. Childers went on to say that he could not believe Mr. Reed's memory was correct when he gave those answers, for if they described accurately Mr. Reed's position it was one of very heavy responsibility. Either he knew the ship was unfit to be sent to sea or not. In the former case he was bound to represent his opinion in the strongest way to Sir Spencer Robinson, who would have been bound by his sense of official responsibility to lay the matter before Mr. Childers; if, on the other hand, Mr. Reed was unaware of the fact, the evidence he gave before the Court Martial was very unfortunate. It was true that Mr. Reed, in a lecture delivered at the Institute of Naval Architects, expressed the same views as were contained in his evidence before the Court Martial; but if he really entertained those opinions, it was an unfortunate circumstance that he did not present a Report on the subject to Sir Spencer Robinson, his superior officer. At all events, Mr. Reed's lecture could hardly be taken as a Report to the Board of Admiralty that the ship was not fit to be sent to sea. He conceived that when a vessel of this importance went to sea, carrying with it hundreds of precious lives, it was a duty imperative on any person connected with the Constructive Department of the Navy to represent to his superior officer all facts within his knowledge as to its unworthiness. All the Constructors, he presumed, were responsible to the Controller; for if they possessed information which they did not give to the Controller, the latter would be placed in a very unfair position. Messrs. Laird asked in February that experiments should be made with regard to the centre of gravity of the Captain. This was deferred by the Chief Constructor until after the steam trial, and when the vessel had gone to sea and was lost Mr. Childers expressed his opinion that the centre of gravity ought to have been ascertained at an earlier period than it actually was. Now, he (the Earl of Camperdown) did not mean to assert that if the centre of gravity had been earlier ascertained the Captain would have been saved; but, at the same time, he ventured to submit that Mr. Childers was justified in making such a statement. The curve of stability of the Captain was not ascertained until after that vessel had gone to sea for the last time—though within a month after the centre of gravity had been discovered by experiment. Without knowing the centre of gravity it was impossible to find the curve of stability. If, in February, the centre of gravity had been ascertained, it would have been possible to discover the curve of stability long before the ship left England on her last voyage, and the calculations would have served as a caution to the officer commanding the ship. With regard to an omission in the Minute of some words at the beginning of a Report of the Controller, no person could regret more than Mr. Childers did that any words which appeared in a Report of the Controller to him, and especially on such a subject, should not also have appeared in the Report as printed in the Minute, and the result of the inquiry as to the way in which the omission occurred was that it was due to an error on the part of a copyist; but the omission did not, in fact, alter the case. The portion of the Report which dealt with facts, as distinguished from observations, was shown by Mr. Childers to two of his Colleagues, and therefore Sir Spencer Robinson might have seen this particular portion of the Report. He wished to call special attention to the bearing of the words which were omitted in the remainder of the letter. If Sir Spencer Robinson had stated the conclusion that the Captain was unseaworthy, and had specially called the attention of Mr. Childers to the fact, then Sir Spencer Robinson was quite free even from constructive responsibility; but what Sir Spencer Robinson wrote was that, although under certain conditions the stability of the Captain was not quite satisfactory, the ship might be accepted; and their Lordships had, therefore, given instructions for the final payment of the account, waiving a condition which had been imposed that Messrs. Laird should hold themselves responsible for making such alterations as might be deemed necessary; and therefore the words omitted had reference, not to the question whether the Captain was or was not a seaworthy ship, but entirely to payment of the claim of Messrs. Laird. The attention of Mr. Childers was called to the matter with reference to the question of payment, and the seaworthiness of the Captain was a secondary question. If the Controller was impressed with the idea that the Captain was not seaworthy, he ought to have specially called the attention of the First Lord to the question of unseaworthiness. He might have been expected to say—"I should really wish you to consider the question whether the Captain should go to sea or not;" and he ought also to have addressed the First Sea Lord, without whose order the ship could not go to sea. The question had been considered only from the side of the Court Martial and from that of the Controller. It might be that if the calculations had been sent to Captain Burgoyne he would have been more on his guard. He (the Earl of Camperdown) thought he need go no further into the question than to remark that a considerable portion of the public maintained that these calculations should have been forwarded to him; and therefore it must be remembered that there was a third side to be taken into consideration, and that involved the reputation of Captain Burgoyne. In reply to the question whether there had been any Report by the Constructor since the accident, such Report had been submitted to the Committee on the loss of the Captain, presided over by his noble Friend (Lord Dufferin), and the Report of the Committee had been laid on the Table. ["No, no!"] He was not aware that that Report had not been laid on their Lordships' Table. He should be unwilling to allude to any document which was not in the possession of their Lordships: he must, therefore, close the remarks he felt himself able on this occasion to make. He would simply recapitulate in few words the reasons which appeared to have led Mr. Childers to draw the conclusions he did in this Minute. Mr. Childers had a strong idea of individual responsibility in each of his Colleagues at the Admiralty to himself. He saw that evidence had been given on this Court Martial which did not tally with the Reports which had been presented to the Board. He was of opinion that the centre of gravity and stability should have been calculated earlier than they were, and that his attention had not been sufficiently called to the question of the liability of the Captain to be upset on the idea that existed in the Constructor's Department. For these reasons Mr. Childers wrote this Minute, and he must leave it in their Lordships' hands to form their opinion upon it.

The Earl of Camperdown

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, it appeared to him that there would be very little advantage in their Lordships' attempting in that House to go into the reasons which led to the loss of the Captain. With regard to the Minute of Mr. Childers, he had already stated his objections to it. He objected to any person being the judge in his own cause. Mr. Childers had over and over declared that for everything that occurred at the Admiralty he would be responsible. This was one of the first things that had occurred;—was he responsible or was he not? If he wished to have a fair report, the question should have been submitted to an independent tribunal. He would not go into the Minute. He objected to it on principle. One great complaint Mr. Childers had against the Constructor was that he did not appoint Captain Coles to that department—Mr. Childers had such faith in Captain Coles that he wished to place him in the Constructor's Department. He repeated, this was not a subject their Lordships could inquire into—there must be an independent tribunal: but it was important for them to know who was responsible for our ships—such as the Cyclops. Certainly not Sir Spencer Robinson, nor the Constructor, who had been away for 11 months. Who, then, was responsible? They had 12 or 14 men of science sitting together endeavouring to devise a vessel which would not turn bottom upwards. Who was responsible? Were they again to have a Minute from the First Lord dividing responsibility according to his own fancy? This system must be brought to an end. Sir Spencer Robinson and Mr. Reed for four or five years had told him continually that such a ship as the Captain, with a low freeboard and with tall masts and sails, would not be a safe ship—it might be an excellent vessel for coast defensive purposes, but not a good or safe sea-going vessel; and he had himself so stated over and over again in that House. But there was a great wish to try the experiment, and he said it should be tried. Captain Coles undertook to produce a vessel of that description which should be seaworthy, and he went down to Messrs. Laird, great ship-builders, who undertook the business. He (the Duke of Somerset) left the Admiralty without having seen the plans and without having given an opinion on the subject. But Messrs. Laird certainly did not fulfil the promise they made. The vessel they produced was totally unseaworthy. If the Captain had survived the storm, it would have been described as one of the finest vessels in the world, and Captain Coles would have come back to re-organize all the navies in the world. It would also have been said that but for the former Board of Admiralty the country might have had eight or ten of these fine vessels instead of only one. He thought, however, that the obstinacy of that Board was not unwise, and certainly he had not from first to last any confidence in these ships.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE objected to the expression that the Captain was not unsafe "if properly handled." This appeared to reflect on Captain Burgoyne, who was one of the best officers in the service. If there had been anything improper in the handling of the Captain, it must have come out in the Court Martial; but there was nothing of the sort. The vessel, no doubt, was capsized in a sudden squall; but the blame ought not to be laid on the captain, who, after being on deck all day with the Admiral, was probably at the time she was struck with the squall lying down on his sofa. The captain was not responsible during ordinary weather at night, the ship being then placed in charge of a commissioned officer, who had orders to shorten sail when necessary, or call the captain. Even the lieutenant might not be blamed—the squall came on so suddenly, and ships were often most pressed, just before the end of the watch.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX said, he would only say a very few words in order to do away with the impression which appeared to have been made on the noble Earl's mind that the Admiralty had passed any censure upon Captain Burgoyne. The expression to which objection was taken was an a priori opinion given by Sir Spencer Robinson. Neither Sir Spencer Robinson nor Mr. Reed ever said beforehand that they thought the ship was unsafe, but only that she would be a bad cruiser, and could not properly fight her guns. Nothing could be clearer than the paragraph which had been quoted by his noble Friend near him from Sir Spencer Robinson's reply to Mr. Childer's Minute, that neither he nor the Chief Constructor thought for a moment that the ship would be unsafe "if properly handled." There was no anticipation on the part of the Admiralty, or indeed of anybody else, that the ship would prove unsafe, and no blame had ever been imputed by that department to Captain Burgoyne.

FOUR COURTS MARSHALSEA PRISON (DUBLIN)—IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE moved for a Return of the cost of maintaining the Four Courts Marshalsea Prison in Dublin, specifying the salaries of each official, the cost of allowances to pauper debtors, and all other expenses; and stating from what funds such expenditure is defrayed. He complained that although imprisonment for debt had been abolished in England, it was still allowed to prevail in Ireland, notwithstanding that for years hopes of abolition had been held out to the people of that country. There were now two Bills on the subject before the House of Commons; but they had been postponed so many times, that he did not believe they would pass this Session.

The Earl of Lauderdale

This was not only an injustice to the public of Ireland, but it was also imposing a charge on the public funds which was entirely wasted.

Motion agreed to.

LUNACY REGULATION AMENDMENT BILL—(No. 171.) SECOND READING.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."

—(The Lord Chancellor.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its object was to afford protection to "persons of weak mind"—that was to say, persons whose mental capacity is so affected by sickness or any other temporary cause as to render them incapable of managing themselves or their affairs. On more than one occasion he had experienced a difficulty in dealing with such cases, because the persons were not so bad as to render it necessary that a commission of lunacy should be issued. Under the Bill the Lord Chancellor, on summary petition, it being established to his satisfaction that the person in question is of weak mind, is empowered in a summary way and without directing an inquiry under a commission of lunacy, to appoint a guardian of the person or property, or of both, of such person. In order to secure that this summary interference should be of a temporary character it was provided that no order should be of force for a longer period than six months, nor was it to be renewed more than once. By one clause it would be necessary for the Commissioners in Lunacy to visit each patient twice a-year, and at such other times as the Court should appoint.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) ACT, 1870, AMENDMENT BILL—(No. 185.)

(The Lord Cairns.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LOED CAIRNS, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its object was to settle certain doubts that had arisen whether rights secured by the Irish Land Act of 1870 to occupying tenants might not be endangered by the omission to specify or refer to such rights in conveyances or assignments executed by the Landed Estates Court. The Bill therefore enacted that every occupying tenant and those claiming under him shall have as incident to the tenancy all rights to which he might be entitled under the first part of the Act; and that any sale, declaration, or convey on the part of the Landed Estate Courts shall be subject to all such rights, although such rights may not be specified or referred to in the conveyance or assignment executed by the Court.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Cairns.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR entirely agreed with the bringing forward of this measure by his noble and learned Friend, to whom he was much obliged for suggesting a means of obviating a not inconsiderable difficulty. Contrary to the notion that prevailed in some quarters, this Bill did not express any opinion upon the legal point that had arisen in one of the Courts in Ireland. Its object was simple, and its clauses were neatly arranged.

LORD CAIRNS said, he had avoided making any reference in the Bill to what had occurred in Ireland, as to which he had only imperfect information. Whatever had been said, it was clear there was much anxiety in the minds of persons in the northern part of Ireland, and it was proper that their doubts should be removed by legislation.

LORD LURGAN thanked the noble and learned Lord for introducing the Bill, which would be approved by all who were tenants under the custom of Ulster.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE QUALIFICATION BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to repeal the Qualification required by the Act George the second, chapter twenty, for the Office of Justice of the Peace—Was presented by The Earl of ALBEMARLE; read 1^a. (No. 188.)

PETROLEUM BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for the safe keeping of Petroleum and other substances of a like nature—Was presented by The Earl of MORLEY; read 1^a. (No. 189.)

House adjourned at Eight o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 16th June, 1871.

MINUTES.] — SELECT COMMITTEE — Thames Embankment, appointed.

SUPPLY — considered in Committee — CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Municipal Corporations (Borough Funds)* [203]; Public Schools Act (1868) Amendment* [204]. Second Reading—Canada* [192]; Treasurers of Rates* [120].

Select Committee — New Mint Building Site* [176], nominated.

Committee—Report—Life Assurance Companies Act (1870) Amendment* [183]; Metropolitan Board of Works (Loans)* [140].

Report—Ecclesiastical Dilapidations* [144-202].

The House met at Two of the clock.

IRELAND—MOUNTJOY GOVERNMENT PRISON.—QUESTION.

MR. CALLAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a report of a trial at the late assizes for the county of Wicklow, before Mr. Justice Morris, whereat it was given in evidence, and not contradicted—

"That certain 'official reports' of the physician of Mountjoy Government Prison relating to the prevalence of incipient insanity among the 'untried' prisoners, brought on by the cellular system, and which in due course should have been laid before the Chief Secretary, were from him withheld and suppressed by one of the Directors of Convict Prisons in Ireland;"

whether any explanation of this statement has been by the Irish Government sought from the Prison Director referred to; and, whether he still holds his office; and, if so, are the Government prepared to institute an inquiry into the truth of a charge of so grave a nature?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, his attention had been called to a report of the trial in question. It appeared to him that the word "suppressed" was too strong a description of the circumstances which occurred. It was true, however, that the report was not laid before the Chief Secretary for a period of a month or six weeks, and when that circumstance was brought to the knowledge of Lord Naas, he expressed his extreme regret that a report of that nature was not laid before him. Lord Naas thereupon ordered a full inquiry into all the circumstances, and the result was that almost immediately a change respecting the treatment of untried prisoners was made. The Director of Convict Prisons referred to still held office; but considering that the circumstances were fully inquired into by Lord Naas three years ago, and that the result arrived at was what he (the Marquess of Hartington) had just stated, he did not see how it was possible for him to make any further inquiry into the matter.

ARMY—LEICESTERSHIRE MILITIA.
QUESTION.

Mr. PELL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that the Officer commanding the Leicestershire Militia gave due notice prior to the training that his regiment would be ready to take part in a field day, and that the time and place were arranged by the General Officer commanding the district, naming May 22nd as the time, and Northampton as the place for such brigade field day; whether the estimate of the cost (under £100), was forwarded to the Horse Guards on May 17th, and the blank ammunition sent down to Northampton, and for what reason he stopped further proceedings by telegram, received at Leicester on the evening of Sunday May 21st; and, whether he is aware that the Officers of the Leicestershire Militia have been thus put to much fruitless expense and inconvenience, and seriously discouraged attempting to carry out the instructions embodied in the Reserve Forces Circular issued by the War Office?

Mr. CARDWELL: I have made inquiry, Sir, and am informed that the telegram from Manchester was received at the War Office on Saturday, the 20th, after office hours, and that on Monday morning, the 22nd, telegrams were sent to the general officer commanding the Northern District, and to the officers commanding the Leicestershire and Northamptonshire Militia, to the effect that the application had been received too late.

The Marquess of Hartington

EDUCATION—POWERS OF SCHOOL BOARDS.—QUESTION.

Mr. BULKELEY HUGHES asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether in a district provided with the requisite accommodation, within the distance prescribed in a Public Elementary School managed by a committee of ratepayers, can the School Board borrow money on the security of the school fund and local rate towards obtaining an additional school house; and, if they can, what limit (if any), would be placed by the Education Department to their borrowing powers or to the dimensions of such unnecessary building, and can the deficiency of the school fund in respect of such school house be raised out of the rates?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the Education Department did not require school accommodation to be provided in any place until they were convinced there was a deficiency of such accommodation; and, with reference to a school board borrowing money for the purpose of increasing school accommodation, the district for which such accommodation must be provided was limited by the boundary of the school district, whatever that might be.

EDUCATION—ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSIONERS.—QUESTION.

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, If he will lay upon the Table of the House a Paper issued by the Endowed Schools Commissioners, containing the general rules upon which they will deal with endowments now applicable to Elementary Education?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, in reply, that he was very anxious that every information should be given by the Department of which he was the head; but he felt considerable difficulty with regard to the document referred to, which was neither headed nor signed, so that it was impossible to make it a Parliamentary Paper without giving it an importance which it was not intended to have. It was not an official statement drawn up for publication, nor was it addressed to the public, but formed part of an explanatory letter adapted to the circumstances of each case.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he thought that the document, together with the correspondence with which it was accompanied, would form an interesting Parliamentary Paper, and he therefore hoped it would be laid before the House.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, some limit must be put on the production of documents of this nature. If documents which were a mere statement of views and were devoid of official responsibility were to be laid before the House, there would be no end of such Parliamentary Papers.

PARLIAMENT—ORDER.—NOTICES.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK, in rising to take the direction of the Speaker on a point of Order, which was of great consequence as regarded the conduct of Public Business in that House, said, he would have asked the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman last night, had not the right hon. Gentleman unfortunately been unavoidably absent from his place. After the dinner hour yesterday Her Majesty's Government determined to proceed with the consideration of the Report of the Committee on Public Business. But the Resolutions which Her Majesty's Government decided on presenting to the House were not handed in at the Table until, he believed, after midnight, and when very few hon. Members were present. At an early hour that morning—after 2 o'clock—he (Mr. C. Bentinck) protested against that course, and urged upon Her Majesty's Government the unfairness of such a proceeding in the certainty of the absence of a great number of hon. Members of the House, and a large proportion of those who had attended to this question, and who had also sat on the Committee. He also pointed out to the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister that he had given a distinct undertaking to himself (Mr. C. Bentinck) that ample notice of discussion on this question would be given. He ventured to submit that that undertaking had not been redeemed. That morning he had seen his right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), who held what was ordinarily termed the office of Leader of the Opposition. His right hon. Friend stated that he left the House after 8 o'clock last night, when no distinct decision had been come to by the Government as to what was to be done at the Morning Sitting that day; that he, too, was under the impression that ample notice would be given, and that he did not consider that even 24 hours' notice would be all that was required.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he rose to a point of Order. The hon. Gentleman opposite appeared to be opening up a question of good or bad faith, which, he submitted, was not a point of Order.

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven will state the point of Order, I will be happy to give my opinion on it.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, if out of Order he would submit to the judgment of the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair, not to that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven has stated that he wished to raise a distinct question relating to the Orders of the House, but much of the matter introduced by the hon. Member is not of that nature.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he would proceed at once to the point of Order. As far as his experience in that House had given him any means of forming a judgment, the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in that matter was a breach, if not of the Rules of the House, at least of the rules of etiquette. He apprehended that, according to the understanding that existed between the two sides of the House, no question could be set down for discussion unless there was sufficient time to enable Amendments to that question to be duly placed upon the Paper also. In that case the rule, whether it was a Rule of the House or a rule of etiquette, had not been observed by Her Majesty's Government, and he would cite as an argument in favour of the position for which he was contending, the almost analogous case of an Amendment upon the Report of a Bill as amended in Committee. Hon. Members knew that it was a Rule of the House, for which the Standing Orders provided, that no material alterations could be proposed on the Report of a Bill, as amended in Committee, except upon notice of 24 hours, and for the very obvious reason that the House ought to know beforehand when any such Amendments should be considered, and that it was only proper that there should be ample notice. He apprehended that the Resolutions stood in exactly the same category, because a Resolution would not be read twice or three times; there would be only one discussion, and one opportunity for the House to express an opinion upon it. Therefore, according to common sense, justice and precedent, he contended that when Resolutions of such importance, dealing with the rights and privileges of the House of Commons, were to be considered, there should be no attempt, as it were, by a side-wind, to go through them without full discussion. That was the point of Order which he desired to place before the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. SPEAKER: The question of the hon. Member for Whitehaven, as I understand, includes two points—first, the point of Order as to Notice; and, secondly, the question of what is, under the circumstances, sufficient Notice. The rule with regard to Notice is, that Notice must be given on the previous day, and this was done in the instance under discussion. With regard to the sufficiency of the Notice, that is a matter of opinion upon which a difference of judgment may exist, and which may vary with the nature of the case; but as far as the strict rules of order go there is nothing, in my opinion, in them to prevent the House from proceeding with the considerations of the Resolutions.

MR. BOUVERIE: The object of the Rules with regard to Notice is, that Members may have full intimation of what is to be proposed, and that those who wish to move Amendments may be able to give Notice to that effect. The Rule of the House as regards public Notices of Motion is that they should be given at a quarter-past 4, when Members are generally in attendance, and there are means of knowing what is to be done. Generally, important Notices are given at that time; but no doubt it is the practice constantly that Notices of Motion are given privately to the Clerk at the Table after that hour, but that is for a subsequent day, and then they appear on the Paper as Notices of Motion given for a future day. I presume, however, that strictly they are supposed to be given at a quarter-past 4, and not at any time during the evening to the Clerk at the Table. I was myself here until 2 o'clock this morning, and was not aware that any Notice for discussing these Resolutions had been given. I was anxious myself to give Notice of one or two Amendments to the Resolutions. I understand that when Notice was given, my hon. Friend (Mr. C. Bentinck), who was more wide awake than I was, did ask a question of the Leader of the House as to what was to be done. It was not until this morning, after my breakfast hour, that I saw that some Notice of these Resolutions had been given. I would submit to the candour of the Leader of the House, whether, upon an important question on which hon. Members of this House feel strongly, it would not be proper that adequate Notice should be given, so that those hon. Members who have a desire to move Amendments should have a fair opportunity of doing so.

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish to answer the appeal of my right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie). In the first place, I do not know upon what authority my right hon. Friend has stated that the Rule of the House is, that Notice should be given at a quarter-past 4. I beg my right hon. Friend's pardon, there is no such Rule. At least, as at present advised, I am disposed to say no such Rule exists. The practice is to give Notice at that time, or in the course of the evening, for next day or a future day, so that hon. Gentlemen when they see the Paper in the morning may be aware what business is coming on in the course of the day. The history of the matter before the House is this—There has been a great pressure on the Government, and questions have been put to us to know when we could proceed with these Resolutions. We have hitherto been very reluctantly obliged to baulk the natural desire of many hon. Members to have these Resolutions proceeded with. What happened yesterday was as follows:—The business began with the consideration of the Army Bill, and in the course of the evening communications were made to us from the other side of the House and the opponents of the Bill generally, to the effect that it would be extremely agreeable to them if the Government would consent to take the Motion of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens) on Monday. Under the circumstances, there being every expectation that the Army Bill would be disposed of last night, it naturally occurred that, having acceded to that wish, we should take Supply this morning; but we took into account the fact that the Government had long ago considered the Resolutions of the Committee on Public Business, and that we had actually made up our minds as to the proposals which we should submit to the House on the subject, although our Resolutions were not actually drawn up. Now, of the three Resolutions which we intended to lay before the House, two were not in the slightest degree connected with our own interests. One of them is intimately connected with the concurrence of independent Members and the other with the propriety of certain proceedings in this House. The latter is that which relates to the power which every hon. Member possesses to call summarily and peremptorily for the exclusion of strangers from the House. Now, the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) has announced his intention positively to introduce a Bill for the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Act on Tuesday next, and under the circumstances it appeared to us not in our own interest, but in the interest of the House itself, that this question with regard to the exclusion of strangers should be disposed of at a Morning Sitting before that day. That is the reason why we determined to propose the Resolution to which I am referring. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven was, I think, perfectly satisfied when I made a somewhat similar statement at half-past 2 this morning. [Mr. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: No!] The other Resolution which we intended to propose at this Sitting is that which relates to counting out when the House meets at 9 o'clock. During the last few weeks, although on those occasions the Government formed one-third, and sometimes one-half, of the Members present, yet the House has been counted out at an early period after 9 o'clock, because independent Members and the champions of the rights of independent Members have not thought fit to be in their places for the purpose of making a quorum. We have done what we could by personal attendance to secure that object, and we thought it was really important that we should settle the question without delay, and in a manner generally approved, by a proposal to delay the count for half-an-hour after 9 o'clock, in the interests of independent Members, not our own, because, personally, it would frequently be more convenient to us to go home than to sit here.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck

MR. CRAUFURD rose to Order. The right hon. Gentleman was doing that which he had no right to do; he was discussing the Resolutions under circumstances which would preclude any answer being given to his remarks.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not speaking to the point of Order, but in reply to an appeal from my right hon. Friend behind me, the Member for Kilmarnock, and if the House does not wish me to proceed I have no desire to do so. I have now stated the reasons which induced us to fix the consideration of those two Resolutions at a Morning Sitting to-day. As to the other Resolution which relates to Supply, I said last night that we should not proceed with it this morning, and my right hon. Friend near me, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, will not proceed with it, but it will remain on the Paper. If the House should not deem it right to proceed with the other Resolutions also, we shall not press them. We simply took a course which we thought would be for the convenience of hon. Members generally.

MR. COLLINS said, he had had the honour of sitting on the Committee upstairs, and he was under the impression due Notice would be given as to the time when the Resolutions founded on their Report would be brought before the House. Hon. Members had, in his opinion, some right to complain that the 3rd of the Resolutions now proposed was not that of the Committee. The hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves) had moved in the Committee that the hour before which a count-out could not be moved when the House met at 9 o'clock should be half-past; but the proposal of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), fixing the hour at a quarter-past 9, had been almost unanimously adopted. He thought it, therefore, extremely unfair of the Government to propose a different Resolution from that of the Committee, after only 10 or 12 hours' notice. If the Government thought the change which they suggested an improvement, they ought not, nevertheless, to take the House by surprise. As to the 1st Resolution, with which it was proposed to proceed, he would merely say that it was, he believed, only by the casting vote of the Chairman that the Committee had determined there should be no debate on the question whether strangers should be ordered to withdraw. Under these circumstances, he hoped the discussion of the Resolutions would not be persisted in on the present occasion; but that another occasion would be taken advantage of, when they would receive that share of the attention of the House as to discussion, to which he (Mr. Collins) considered them fully entitled. He begged to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. Collins.)

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he thought the main point raised in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock had not been answered by the Prime Minister. He (Mr. B. Hope) referred to the impossibility of putting any Amendments on the Paper, owing to the shortness of Notice, and he maintained that—putting aside all technicalities, and looking at matters from a common-sense point of view and with fairness, as he trusted they would always be looked upon in an assembly of Gentlemen like the House of Commons, who would disdain to take any advantage of one another—ample Notice ought always be given to Members upon any important business which was to be brought forward, so as to enable them to put their Amendments down. The points raised in the Resolutions were, after all, of the utmost importance to themselves, intimately connected as they were with forms of procedure which had long existed. The right to insist on the exclusion of strangers might be a somewhat obsolete privilege; but it was a very ancient one, and ought not to be parted with without debate. Of the power of "counting-out" the House, it could not be said that it was obsolete, and it certainly was a question on which both sides of the House ought to have ample opportunity afforded them to express an opinion. He himself must strongly protest against the notion that those who were anxious to protect the rights of private Members had any interest in interfering with that privilege. The power of "counting out" he regarded as a special privilege of private Members, and a Palladium of the proceedings of the House. It was a great protection against bores, and contributed to the saving of the health and lives of Members, as every hon. Gentleman must feel who, like himself, had been in the House this week at 2 and 3 o'clock in the morning, as well as the whole of Wednesday. He did not mean to contend that it might not be desirable to put some restriction on the privilege of "counting out;" but the question was one which ought not, in his opinion, to be decided without mature consideration. The Resolution of the Government on the subject was not that of the Committee; so he trusted they would show their confidence in their own proposal by allowing it to run the gauntlet of free discussion.

Mr. Collins

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: These proposals are of very small consequence, indeed, to the Government, although we look upon them as of consequence to the convenience of the House. It was, therefore, for that the Government went out of their way to bring them forward. The view of many hon. Gentlemen, however, seems to be that everybody ought to discuss them except the persons who are responsible for framing them. In that view I, for one, cannot acquiesce. We have done what we can to meet the convenience of the House; but we cannot afford to waste time in wrangling over the question. The Government will not proceed with the Resolutions to-day, and we shall put them down for Tuesday; but I cannot give any promise that they will come on for discussion on that day. Whether they do or not will depend on the state of the Public Business. It will not be our fault if, when the Motion of the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) comes on on Tuesday evening, strangers are obliged to withdraw.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, as a Member of the Committee, said, he wished to say a few words on the subject. He was not present at the discussion which had occurred after 2 o'clock that morning; but he could not help characterizing the mode in which it was proposed to proceed in the present instance as eminently unsatisfactory. Fair Notice ought, he thought, always to be given of the business which was to be brought on, and the Notice Paper should contain a true record of that business, which was not the case with that which hon. Members received that morning.

MR. NEWDEGATE thanked the Government for postponing the consideration of the Resolutions, as it would have been very unfair to have passed Resolutions which would have been equivalent to Standing Orders without ample Notice having been given. There were several of the Resolutions of the Committee, and especially that which related to taking no opposed business after half-past 12 o'clock, which ought to be submitted to the House. That particular recommendation bore reference to the health of the Speaker and to the health of every hon. Member of the House, and it ought to receive full consideration.

MR. CRAUFURD desired, as the Prime Minister had called in question the propriety of the course which he had deemed it to be his duty to take last Session, to say that he had informed the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler), the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. M. Chambers), and others that he would not move that strangers should be ordered to withdraw when the Motion which had been alluded to came on on Tuesday next.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had made no reference whatever to the hon. Gentleman.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £9,817, to complete the sum for the Fishery Board, Scotland.

MR. CRAUFURD moved that the Vote be omitted. No doubt in the Report made by the Commissioners who had inquired into the Civil Departments in Scotland no distinct recommendation was made as to the Fishery Board; but he thought that anyone who had read the evidence would agree that the Fishery Board was not one which it was necessary to retain. The business of that Board consisted of two main branches—the management of the brand of herrings and the administration of the grant to the harbours. The harbour grant amounted to £3,000 a-year. It might be said with regard to the branding that that was not a charge upon the country, but that it was paid out of the fees. The principle, however, was the same. It was the last remnant of a system of protective Government guarantee that in old times was much approved, but which had since been thoroughly denounced, and had been departed from in every other case except this. It was true that the Commissioners reported that they were not prepared to recommend the abolition of the brand; but careful consideration of the evidence could not fail to prove that it would be very beneficial to the fishery trade if the brand were removed. As to the other branch of the business of the Fishery Board—the administration of these small grants out of the £3,000 for harbours, this grant had been in existence since the Act of George IV. The Treasury had no control whatever over the application of the grant, and no Report was made to the Treasury or to that House on the subject. All that was done was that Parliament voted the sum every year and the Board spent it. The hon. and learned Member instanced the case of the harbour of Anstruther, for the construction of which Parliament had authorized the expenditure of £35,000. Of this sum, £16,500 had been advanced by the Public Loan Commissioners, and the Fishery Board had been authorized to grant a further loan of £6,500 and to expend a further sum not exceeding £12,000 out of the monies annually voted by Parliament. But the Board, without any sanction from the Treasury have for the last ten years applied the whole of the annual grant of £3,000 for this harbour, and thus have spent upon this harbour £11,000 or £12,000 more than they were authorized to do. Every penny of this money had been thrown away, for the whole of the works had been swept away in a late gale. If branding were abolished and the grant discontinued the raison d'être of the Fishery Board was gone. There was another matter. The Secretary to the Fishery Board, who was a valuable public servant, ought not be prejudiced by any such change. But he was also Secretary to the Board of Manufactures, and derived a portion of his salary from each Board. Now he (Mr. Craufurd) would suggest that if the Fishery Board were abolished, there was no reason why the Secretary should not continue to receive his whole salary as Secretary of the of the Board of Manufactures, or, as that Board should be more properly called, the Board of Arts and Science. The hon. and learned Member then moved the rejection of the Vote.

MR. M'LAREN said, that as to the question of the herring brand, a Paper had been laid upon the Table, from which it appeared that the first suggestion for its abolition came from the Government of the Netherlands, who stated, through their Ambassador in London, that they were ready to do away with the brand provided the British Government simultaneously abolished their brand. The Board of Trade replied—

"I have to request that you will state to his Lordship that the Board of Trade hold opinions against the principle of branding herrings. They will be disposed to agree with the Dutch Government that the system should be put an end to by both Governments; but they cannot do that without reference to the Treasury, which is directed by the Lords Commissioners to say that they hold the system of branding in Scotland to be quite indefensible. But they fear that press of business will preclude them for taking measures for its abolition."

Now, when a foreign Government condemned that system, and our own declared it to be quite indefensible, and the Treasury said they kept it up temporarily only because they had not time to abolish it, their course was clear—they had only to stop the Supplies, and he should support his hon. and learned Friend in his Motion to leave out the whole Estimate.

MR. BAXTER said, he agreed with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) that this Vote for branding was the last lingering remnant of protection. He agreed with his hon. and learned Friend that it would be very beneficial if the herring brand were abolished—the Scotch herring fishery would exist in spite of brands—and he was glad to find that persons who had formerly been opposed to the abolition of the brand now said that they thought that if due notice were given the Government would take a wise step in getting rid of it. What the hon. Member for Edinburgh had said in respect of the official correspondence with the Netherlands Government was quite correct. He felt it to be quite impossible for the present Government to defend the brand. He proposed that two years' notice should be given of its abolition, so that the trade might make the necessary arrangements for its cessation. With respect to the grant for harbours, he was not quite sure that he could agree with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Ayr. The grant had been the means of doing a great deal of good, and he was not at all disposed to go to the length of his hon. and learned Friend and abolish the Board altogether; but he did think that expenditure of this kind should be laid before the House, and that they should know from year to year what was done by those who were spending the public money; and the more so because he admitted that the administration of the grant by the Scotch Fishery Board for the last two or three years certainly required investigation. The Scotch Fishery Board had spent in various ways about £45,000 for Anstruther Harbour; but they were in debt, the harbour was not finished, and, what was worse, it was tumbling to pieces. Mr. Hawkshaw had been sent to examine the works and see what should be done; and, although he had not yet presented his Report, which would probably be in the hands of the Treasury in a few days, he had written a letter stating—apart altogether from his other recommendations, which he had not had time fully to consider—that it was absolutely necessary to spend about £8,000 at once on the harbour, in order to prevent the pier and harbour works from tumbling into the sea. He (Mr. Baxter) had replied to Mr. Hawkshaw's letter that it was quite out of his power to sanction that, that too much money had already been spent on that harbour without the authority of Parliament, and that he could not authorize the outlay of a shilling upon it until the opinion of the House of Commons had been expressed. He hoped his hon. and learned Friend would not think it necessary to oppose the Vote this year. He promised that steps would be taken to abolish branding in two years; and that before the Estimates were again presented to Parliament they would consider what measures it was requisite to adopt in regard to the duties hitherto performed by the Scotch Fishery Board.

Mr. Craufurd

MR. GORDON said, he certainly was not surprised at the willingness shown by the Secretary to the Treasury to make a change with reference to branding and also to the Fishery Board, because when about 18 months ago, upon the representation of his hon. Friends the Members for Ayr and Edinburgh, a Commission was issued by the Government to investigate, among other matters, the necessity of maintaining the Fishery Board and what were its duties, the present Secretary of the Treasury was one of the chief accusers of the Board, and gave the Commissioners to understand that his view was that it might be altogether superseded and its functions intrusted to other authorities. He might, however, state that the duties of the Board were not confined to the branding of herrings and superintending the application of the grant for harbours, but extended to the police to be maintained at the different stations of the herring fishery, to the numbering of the boats, the charge of the nets, and also matters under a recent Act relating to the navigation. The duties were important. He might mention also a curious matter. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, being then Secretary to the Admiralty, stated, in his evidence before the Commission, that the police duties might be performed efficiently and at no expense under the superintendence of the Admiralty, and that the other duties connected with the numbering of the boats and taking charge of the nets could be performed by persons under the Board of Trade or the Customs. When, however, the Board of Customs were applied to on the matter, the answer it gave was that those duties could not be transferred to its officers without necessitating a great addition to the force of that department, and probably an expense not less than that paid by the Crown under the present system. Then as to the transfer of the police duties to the Admiralty—the First Lord was applied to—and the answer received was that—“He (the writer) was commanded by my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to say that the question had been considered by their Lordships, but that it appeared to them that if any change was made in the present arrangement it should be in the opposite direction to that proposed, as the duties of police were at variance with ideas in accordance with which H.M.’s ships were manned, and such employment of the men in H.M.’s ships would be neither economical nor in accordance with the interests of the service. Their Lordships would therefore prefer that these duties should be performed in some other way.”

That, he thought, was tolerably conclusive. There was nothing like giving a dog a bad name, and on that principle “branding” had been called “the last rag of Protection.” The effect of the process was not to give any “protection,” but merely to provide an authorized certificate from competent officers that herring had been properly cured. Branded herring fetched a higher price, was sold without trouble or expense, and an excellent trade was thus carried on without litigation. Branding involved no expense to the country, inasmuch as the herring curers paid for it, and the pecuniary result of the transaction was to leave a balance in the hands of the Fishery Board. It would create very considerable discontent in Scotland if the Treasury bench persevered in their determination to abolish the system of branding. The herring trade in Scotland was a very important one, and furnished employment to upwards of 70,000 persons—a large number of whom were boatmen, who would be available for our Navy in time of war.

MR. ELLICE said, he did not rise either to support or oppose the branding system—but he did say that the system had worked admirably in times past, and the herring trade had prospered greatly under it; nor was he aware that any dissatisfaction had been expressed by any of the parties interested in the trade—and many of those most largely interested were amongst his constituents. Although he felt that it would be of but little use for him to gainsay the decision of the Government, he only hoped that the course they had adopted in this matter would not prejudicially affect a trade which gave employment to such a large number of the poorer classes of Scotland. It had been stated that by branding the herring casks the Government were preserving the last rag of Protection; but he, on the contrary, regarded the branding of those casks in the same light as he did the branding of gun barrels. The latter stamped the character of the weapon, and the former the character of the contents of the cask. The stamping of the gun barrels was paid for by the manufacturers, and was a certificate that the gun might be safely used, and the herring brand was paid for by the curer, and was a certificate that the contents of the barrel were wholesome food. As to the economical argument in favour of the abolition of the system, all he could say was, that while the whole expense of the Fishery Board of Scotland was £5,837, the fees paid to the Government for branding amounted to £5,003 per annum. Therefore, in the event of the system of branding being abolished, the result would be that the Fishery Board, which would be obliged to be kept up for other purposes, would have to be paid by a sum to be voted by the House. Then as to the question of the harbour grant, in his opinion the amount of the grant for forming, repairing, and maintaining the small tidal harbours along the eastern coast of Scotland, which were of so much importance to the preservation of the lives and boats of the fishermen engaged in this hazardous trade, so far from being diminished, ought rather to be largely increased. They had to deal with a very large, a very poor, and a most industrious population, on whom a most important supply of wholesome food to the general community depended. The persons who risked their lives in that hazardous calling were all poor people, and one of the chief duties of any Government intrusted with the affairs of this country was, it seemed to him, to encourage and protect that useful class of persons. It had been the policy of the Government for many years past to spend a small sum only—in his opinion a great deal too small a sum—in erecting, repairing, and preserving small harbours of refuge for the fisheries of those people. It was perfectly well known to hon. Members that the whole east coast of Scotland, on which the fisheries chiefly lay, was wholly open and unprotected by any natural harbours, and that it was upon these small fishery harbours, which were mostly tidal, that the safety of the boats and the fishermen engaged depended. And he must say that, as far as he was aware, the Fishery Board of Scotland had expended the small and inadequate funds placed at their disposal in a manner that had given general satisfaction. With respect to the harbour of Anstruther, for the construction of which sums had been borrowed on the authority of Acts of Parliament, he trusted that some satisfactory explanation would be able to be given for the partial failure of the works that had been commenced there. Looking to the eminence and character of the Government engineers employed, he had no doubt such an explanation could be given; but the result had been that over £50,000 had been expended; there was a considerable sum still due to the contractors; and a further sum was required to put the works in such a state that they would afford adequate protection. When the Anstruther Harbour was completed it would be of the greatest advantage to the population of that coast. It ought to have been completed in three or four years; but the engineers had been controlled by a want of funds. As the Government made a bargain with the people of Anstruther, and took possession of the only harbour they had for the purpose of constructing a new harbour, it was the duty of the Government to see that no further delay should occur in the completion of that harbour.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he rose to confirm the statement of the hon. Member for St. Andrew's. He would not have the Committee suppose that this was a case in which the inhabitants and fishermen of Anstruther alone were concerned. The whole of the very large fishing population upon the east coast of Scotland, and upon the east of Fifeshire and the Lothians, was exposed to very severe weather, yet along the whole of those shores there was but one harbour—Dunbar—to which fishing boats could run for shelter. Up to the present time no doubt the Anstruther Harbour was a lamentable failure; but as about £49,000 had been expended upon it, energetic efforts ought to be made to complete the harbour. The very fact that the harbour works had so signally failed was a proof of the violence of the storms to which those coasts were exposed. As to the question of branding, it was not denied that the whole expense was paid by the fish curers and fishermen themselves. Had it been paid by the public he might have had considerable doubt whether they should have been called upon to continue a system which gave a manifest advantage to those who dealt in the articles marked by this particular brand. But as the expense was borne by the dealers themselves, and they were willing to pay for what they considered a certificate of character, there was nothing unreasonable in continuing it.

Mr. Ellice

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE saw no reason why the Fishery Board should be attacked. On the contrary, he thought it one of those institutions which ought to be very much strengthened; and if Her Majesty's Government had proposed to make it a large grant of money he would have supported the proposal. Probably one cause of the failure at Anstruther was the attempt to project new piers into the sea instead of excavating the harbour behind the piers already in existence. If the latter plan had been adopted the Government might, with the expenditure of one-tenth of the sum which had been already laid out, have now had a practical and useful harbour; whereas by attempting to run the piers into the sea they met with or occasioned seas or cross-currents the force of which they had not calculated. There was another thing connected with our fisheries which he should like to see the Fishery Board employed in carrying out. He should like to see the Fishery Board supplied with funds to enable them to place model fishing boats at particular points on the coast, so that the fishermen might be gradually induced to abandon the low freeboard boats which were the cause of so much loss of life. When the Duke of Richmond was at the Board of Trade he had the pleasure of communicating with him on the subject, and he had no doubt that if the noble Duke had remained in office a little longer the suggestion would have been carried out. There was a third point, and that was the police which it was necessary to maintain at these harbours. His hon. Friend the Member for the Wick Burghs (Mr. Loch) would bear him out as to the enormous number of fishing boats which went to sea every night, and that almost every casualty arose from collisions. Sometimes no fewer than 1,100 or 1,200 boats went to sea at night—so that the necessity of maintaining a police along the coast became apparent. There was also the encroachment of foreigners to guard against. As the Fishery Board was within a very narrow amount of being a profit to Government he could not conceive any good reason for reducing or altering its scope or making the changes asked for. On the contrary, he saw good cause for granting more money to carry out its objects, and he felt quite sure it would be to the advantage of the community if such additional grant were made. The discussion as to the brand had been exhausted, except as to one point, and that was the anxiety of the Dutch Government to get rid of the brand. The Dutch were famous as a nation for perseverance, astuteness and other good qualities, and especially for looking after their own interest, and as the Dutch herrings were the only herrings which competed with ours in foreign ports it was a matter of the greatest importance if they could get us to abandon the brand. As long as our herrings went to the Continent with the Government brand, they were looked upon as equal to the Dutch; but if you abolished the brand the Dutch herrings would bring a higher price. The Dutch herring brand spoke for itself as the Scotch herring brand did. He should certainly oppose the Amendment.

COLONEL SYKES said, the question of the brand was a most important one. He was decidedly opposed to its removal. Confidence was given to consumers in all parts of the world by the present system; but if the brand were taken away the confidence of the consumer was shaken or abandoned, and consequently the consumption was reduced. He believed it to be a fact that no less than 10,000 boats went out from Wick fishing every year, and he maintained it was an act of public policy to encourage a fishery which produced seamen in such numbers and of such a character; because in a case of emergency no better man-of-war's men could be found than the men who were engaged in herring fishing in Scotland.

MR. LOCH said, he did not think the Government could have given the brand question the attention which its importance demanded, else they could not have arrived at any such conclusion as that to which they appeared to have come. The experiment was a very dangerous one, for it affected a class of the population who could but little afford to stand the risks attending it. The Northern districts of Scotland were inhabited by a very poor and humble class of persons, who had few resources of their own, and but limited means of obtaining labour at home; and it was to the herring trade they looked for their means of living from year to year. It was with the interests of those poor and helpless people that this experiment would come into contact if the Government persisted. The brand was of very great value to the fish curers. Our principal foreign customers were the Germans, and the herrings were sent to them certified with the Government brand. Now, in those countries the Government brand was looked upon as of far greater importance than any private brand would ever be. His hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Baxter) had spoken about some communication between this Government and the Dutch Government. He said the Dutch Government were prepared to put an end to their brand, on condition that we put an end to ours. The offer was simply ridiculous. The Committee would be surprised when he told them the proportion between the herring trades of the two countries. In 1855 the Scotch herrings exported to Germany measured 388,000 barrels, while the Dutch herrings were only 1,800 barrels; yet with such a difference, it was proposed that we should meet them half way. It had been argued that the effect of the brand was to remove the inducement of the Scotch curer to improve the quality of his herrings. That was a mistake—it was the interest of the curer as it was of every other manufacturer to produce the best article he could. The effect of the brand was to certify that the barrel contained a properly prepared article; and without it the barrels would have to be opened individually to ascertain the quality. The brand was of most importance to the poor fisherman, for it enabled him to get the same price for his article as his wealthier rivals. If he complied with the conditions of the Government and got the brand, his herrings were as valuable, and commanded as high a price in Germany as the herrings of any of the great curers. Do away with the brand, and they would confine the traffic to the great curers.

MR. MACFIE said, his constituents were interested in this question, and they had shown their interest in two ways. In the first place, they intrusted him with a Petition to the House in favour of the maintenance of the herring brand, and in the next place they had deputed a gentleman thoroughly conversant with the entire subject, to make the Government acquainted with their feelings respecting it. That gentleman had told him that the abolition of the brand would cause a depreciation of £100,000 a-year in the herring trade. It was not a question of protection—it was the principle of maintaining for the advantage of a very important existing trade the benefit of a trade-mark which had been established almost from time immemorial. If they took away that, they would greatly depreciate the value of the Scotch herrings, and they had the truth of that in the statement in the correspondence with the Dutch Government—that the continuance of the brand would lead to the price of Dutch herrings being as much below the Scotch as the Norwegian. Not a single Commission had ventured to recommend abolishing the brand. On the contrary, they had had the most emphatic testimony as to the advantage and almost the necessity of maintaining the brand. When they found that a system of business had been established, and had succeeded, surely it was a piece of infatuation to make a change.

MR. M'LAREN said, that it was not to be wondered at that the Members for the Northern fishery burghs should oppose any proposition for removing this remnant of protection; but history showed that the parties most interested in the events were always the worst judges of what was good for them. He should support the abolition of the branding, believing that it was opposed to the principles of free trade, and that it was of no real advantage, but rather the contrary, to those whose interests it was supposed to protect. The Dutch had used a brand, and if it was the cause of the herring trade flourishing in Scotland, why should it not render the Dutch trade also flourishing? Yet the Dutch trade was rapidly declining. The last census showed that the population of Wick was declining. That did not look as if the system was doing them much good. The abolition of the brand would give an impetus to free trade principles and explode an antiquated notion. The superior quality of the article would, he maintained, continue to bring the best price after the brand was abolished.

VISCOUNT ST. LAWRENCE, knowing something of an Irish fishery connected with Howth, could bear testimony to the fact that the system of branding was regarded as extremely advantageous.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that after the reply which had been given by the Secretary to the Treasury, he would not press his Motion to a division. He hoped his hon. Friend would at once issue the notice to which he referred.

MR. ELLICE, referring to the remarks which had been made with respect to Anstruther Harbour, pointed out that the Board were constantly in communication with the Treasury, and that they could not spend 6*d.* out of the annual Vote which they received without the consent of the Government. Some portion of the works were very magnificent and substantial—only some parts were inferior, and it was these that had given way.

MR. ROBERTSON wished the hon. Member the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Baxter) and the Mover of the Motion for the omission of this Vote (Mr. Craufurd) to distinctly understand that there was not a general concurrence of opinion amongst the Scotch Members in what they were about to do, and if the brands were to be removed, it was not to be supposed that such was the general desire of the Scotch Members.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £23,800, to complete the sum for the General Register Office and Census, Scotland.

(3.) £4,503, to complete the sum for the Board of Lunacy, Scotland.

(4.) £13,286, to complete the sum for the Board of Supervision for Relief of the Poor, Scotland.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £4,731, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for the Salaries of the Officers and Attendants of the Household of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and other Expenses.”

MR. RYLANDS rose to move the rejection of the item for Queen's Plates. It appeared indefensible in regard to the administration of the public revenue to vote this sum of money in the Estimates. They had got rid of a similar Vote for England, and last year they abolished the Vote for the Queen's Plates in Scotland. He therefore moved that the present Vote be reduced by the sum of £1,562 6*s.* 2*d.*, the amount proposed to be given for Queen's Plates in Ireland.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Item of £1,562 6*s.* 2*d.*, for Queen's Plates, be omitted from the proposed Vote.”—(Mr. Rylands.)

COLONEL FRENCH said, that the hon. Gentleman was wrong in his statement that Queen's Plates had been given up so far as England was concerned. No Vote was ever taken for Queen's Plates in England, as the money came out of Her Majesty's Privy Purse; and, as for the Queen's Plates in Scotland, they were abandoned at the request of the representatives for Scotland. It was a matter of considerable importance to maintain the breed of horses in Ireland for the purpose of mounting the cavalry, and, consequently, he objected to the withdrawal of the item for the Queen's Plates.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, he would vote for disallowing this item; for if it was wrong to vote money for Queen's Plates in Scotland, it must be equally wrong to vote money for Queen's Plates in Ireland.

MR. BAXTER observed, that the simple reason why the Government allowed the Queen's Plates as respects Scotland to be removed from the Estimates last year was because the general opinion of Scotch Members appeared to be in favour of that course. Not a single Member from Scotland, in fact, rose in his place to object to the omission. No similar opinion, however, had been expressed on the part of the Irish Members, and therefore the Government had retained the Vote.

MR. ROBERTSON was in favour of continuing the Queen's Plates in Ireland, and he hoped to see them restored to Scotland. The omission had occasioned the greatest possible dissatisfaction.

MR. M'LAREN said, that the Vote for Queen's Plates in Scotland was struck out of the Estimates without a division; and he and the few Scotch Members present assented on the distinct understanding that the same principle was to be applied to Ireland. The Vote for Ireland had, however, re-appeared in the Estimates, and he should vote against it, for he thought that it would now be most unjust to make the Scotch people contribute towards the expense of Queen's Plates in Ireland.

MR. HERMON hoped that the hon. Member for Warrington would insist on the omission of the item for Queen's Plates in Ireland, which had nothing to do with the encouragement of a good breed of horses. If the Irish Members desired to have a prize offered for racing in that country, let them subscribe the money out of their own pockets, and let the prize be called "The Irish Members' Plate."

VISCOUNT ST. LAWRENCE considered that it would be peculiarly inopportune to negative the Vote in the present year, since there had been, in consequence of the late war on the Continent, a great drain of horses from Ireland.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had no objection to Queen's Plates in the abstract, nor to racing—on the contrary, he was rather fond of the latter—but had a great objection to Parliament voting money for horse-racing in Ireland when it voted none for that purpose either in England or Scotland. If Irishmen or Scotchmen wanted to have Queen's Plates, let them go to the Queen and ask for them.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, if the hon. Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Robertson) brought on a Motion to restore the Scotch Vote he had no doubt he would be supported by a majority by the Irish Members. The omission of the Scotch Vote had not given satisfaction, because he had himself heard certain Scotch Members say that one or two Scotch representatives had been a great deal too ready to take money out of the country against the wishes of the people. The Irish were a sensitive people, who had, rightly or wrongly, a feeling that frequent attempts were made in that House to diminish the few privileges they enjoyed; and he did not think it was worth while, for the sake of the small sum now in question, to lend any countenance to that feeling.

MR. STACPOOLE approved these Votes, and recommended their more equal distribution.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he was astonished at Irish Members coming there for that paltry sum; and asked why, if they wanted Plates, they did not put their hands in their own pockets like gentlemen and subscribe for them.

MR. MURPHY said, he would certainly vote for the restoration of the Scotch Vote, as he objected to its withdrawal last year; and he hoped the Scotch Members would to-day support the Irish Vote. Moreover, it would be unjust to withdraw it this year, as a Queen's Plate had, on the faith of it, been advertised to be run for at Cork some two months hence.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, the hon. Member for Warrington had moved the reduction of this Vote on the ground that a similar Motion had been carried for Scotland last year. In his opinion, however, that was a piece of gross hypocrisy on the part of his countrymen last year; and it was no reason why they should do an act of injustice to Ireland now. He would vote with the Irish Members in favour of these Queen's Plates; and hoped they would support the proposal to restore them to Scotland when brought forward next year.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that not only was a Queen's Plate advertised to be run for at Cork two months hence, but two or three of those Plates had already been actually won by horses this year; and as they could not expect the Chancellor of the Exchequer to find the money out of his own pocket, he asked from what fund the winners were to be paid? It was a great pity that the Scotch Plates had been abolished; and it was rather a singular circumstance that the first gentleman to raise the question of their abolition was an Irishman, the hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. Pim). He agreed in much that the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) wished to do in the way of economy, but hoped he would not persevere in his present Motion—a very unsportsmanlike proceeding. That Vote did a great amount of good in creating sport, of which the Irish were very fond, and in bringing people together at a social gathering from various parts of the country; and it would be very unwise, suddenly and almost without notice, to take away a paltry sum like that given for such a purpose. Many hon. Members who were interested in this question were absent, and he believed that the hon. Member for Warrington would best consult the wishes of his Irish friends about him by withdrawing his Motion.

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH hoped that the Government would announce some decided line of policy with regard to this matter, and would either restore the Vote for the Scotch Queen's Plates or abolish the Votes for Queen's Plates altogether.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the conduct of the Government had been perfectly consistent in the matter, inasmuch as they had consented to omit the Vote for the Scotch Queen's Plates, because the Scotch Members wished them to do so, and they proposed to retain the Vote for the Irish Queen's Plates in deference to the wishes of the Irish Members.

MR. KINNAIRD could hardly believe his ears. He was astonished to find that anyone professing to be such an economist as the right hon. Gentleman should endeavour to get the Committee to agree to the Vote under discussion by such a low subterfuge as he had resorted to. And he would observe that it was not on the Motion of a Scotch Member that the Votes for the Queen's Plates in Scotland had been withdrawn.

THE CHAIRMAN drew the hon. Member's attention to the fact that it was un-Parliamentary to charge an hon. Member with having had recourse to a low subterfuge. [Laughter.]

MR. KINNAIRD explained that he had applied the expression to the right hon. Gentleman's argument and not to his person. The right hon. Gentleman was totally incapable of being low. It would be easy enough to meet the objection of the right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) by adopting the course which had been taken last year with regard to the Scotch Queen's Plates, and bringing in a supplemental Estimate to enable the Government to find the funds for those Queen's Plates which had already been either run for or advertised.

MR. MONK also thought that the suggestion of the hon. Member who had just sat down would meet the difficulty which had been pointed out.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he wished to make one or two remarks upon the subject under discussion before the Committee went to a division. It was unfortunate that the withdrawal of the Vote for the Scotch Queen's Plates had been supported by one or two Scotch Members who were supposed to represent the voice of the Scotch Members generally, who, in fact, had no real objection to the Vote, while the great bulk of the Scotch people regarded the abolition of these Queen's Plates with regret. A distinction was to be drawn between the great assemblages of gamblers and blackguards at race meetings in the neighbourhood of the Metropolis and the social gatherings of the peasantry and the farmers at the races in Ireland to witness an innocent English sport. The chief defence of this Vote was that as regarded both Scotland and Ireland these Queen's Plates were formerly a charge upon the hereditary revenues of the Crown, which, having been now brought into the public Exchequer, the charges upon them had to be voted by Parliament every year. He should vote in favour of granting the money for the Plates, because he thought that our Irish fellow-countrymen did not get a great deal in this way—and that, although we were always anxious to show our sympathy with them in many respects as a nation, they did not get the same advantages as we did, such as the benefit derived from a Royal residence. While we were spending thousands upon the embellishment of the Metropolis it was unfair to begrudge the Irish people a paltry £1,500 per annum for their amusement. He trusted that the House of Commons would not be indisposed to continue the grant.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that he would just remind hon. Members on the Conservative bench that he had been told on the highest authority (Mr. Disraeli), that one reason why "the Irish were not contented was that they are not amused." There was much more truth in this saying than at first sight might appear, as was often the case with what fell from the right hon. Gentleman. It was true enough that Ireland was too sad to be amused, and a little reflection would show that the national games and sports of the great mass of the people took their tone and in a great measure depended on the presence and examples of those in higher stations of life. In England and in Scotland, in every village there were rural sports in which the residents of the neighbourhood took their part; but in Ireland there was but little of the kind. There were so many non-resident proprietors, and so much of the soil belonged to absentee landlords and public companies, that these social influences were greatly wanting, and perhaps races might be said to form the only national pastime. Racing in Ireland was not like race meetings in England—an occasion for extensive gambling and drunkenness; but the people took the greatest interest in the sport itself, and very often you may see their ministers of religion watching over and participating in the pastimes of their flocks, and by their presence preventing much that was evil, and showing that religion and amusement were not necessarily divorced from each other. He did hope, and, indeed, did not doubt, but that the Committee would confirm this grant, and not in a narrow-minded spirit interfere with national pastimes, to which the people were much attached.

MR. CONOLLY thanked the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock for the generous sentiments he had expressed towards Ireland.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 75; Noes 133: Majority 58.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(6.) £20,935, to complete the sum for the Offices of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

(7.) £300, to complete the sum for the Expenses of the Boundary Survey, Ireland.

(8.) £1,793, to complete the sum for the Charitable Donations and Bequests Office, Ireland.

(9.) £27,168, to complete the sum for the General Register Office and Census, Ireland.

(10.) £77,211, to complete the sum for the Poor Law Commission, Ireland.

(11.) £3,514, to complete the sum for the Public Record Office, &c., Ireland.

(12.) £19,822, to complete the sum for the Office of Public Works, Ireland.

(13.) £33,810, to complete the sum for Law Charges and Department of Solicitor to the Treasury.

(14.) £157,173, to complete the sum for Criminal Prosecutions, Sheriffs' Expenses, &c.

MR. G. B. GREGORY observed that the Vote included £3,000 for clerks of assize, and about £5,000 for officers of the same character called Judges' associates. The clerks of assize performed duties on circuit, and the associates performed duties in town. They were gentlemanly, easy offices, and it was not surprising that some of the holders of them bore the names of eminent Judges who presided over the Courts to which they were attached. He did not mean to complain of these officers; but he hoped that in any new scheme that might be introduced for the administration of the law, these offices, which were in the nature of sinecures, would be abolished, and that any person taking one of these offices in future would be informed that he took it upon the understanding that it would probably be abolished, in which case he would not be entitled to compensation.

MR. BAXTER said, that inquiry would be necessary before anything could be done with regard to this subject. He would, however, assure the hon. Gentleman that the subject should not be lost sight of.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, the subject had been already investigated, and the Government had sufficient information.

MR. AYRTON said, that having regard to the great changes that might be made in the administration of the law, it might be desirable to introduce a Bill providing that persons who might be appointed to offices in that Department should not be entitled to large claims for compensation in case of the abolition of their offices.

MR. DENMAN said, he must deny that the appointments referred to by the hon. and learned Member for East Sussex (Mr. G. B. Gregory) were appointments in the nature of sinecures. One of the gentlemen referred to bore the same name as himself. He happened to go the very circuit to which that gentleman was attached, and, so far from his office being a sinecure, he had a great deal to do, and did a great deal. The salaries of these offices, if they were revised, might probably be reduced; but it was a great advantage to the public that these offices were held by gentlemen of some position. They were the heads of large staffs—of some six or seven persons engaged in the administration of the law, and they caused the work to be done expeditiously, harmoniously, and courteously to all concerned.

MR. G. B. GREGORY explained that he did not say that these gentlemen had no duties to perform.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he must complain of the hardship inflicted on jurors, who were required to give their services for days, or weeks, or it might be even months, and at the end of that time only received the remuneration of a single sovereign. It was not just to take men from their business without some sort of compensation.

Vote agreed to.

(15.) £133,202, to complete the sum for the Court of Chancery.

MR. HUNT, as Chairman of the Committee on Public Accounts, said, he wished to call attention to a matter which had transpired in the course of their investigations. It appeared that, notwithstanding the Act passed in 1869 that the Treasury was to be a party to all alterations of salary in connection with the Court of Chancery, the Lord Chancellor, under previous Acts, claimed the right to make alterations without the consent of the Treasury. The salary of a Chief Clerk of one of the Judges in Chancery had been increased from £1,200 to £1,500 a-year without the three years' probation required by one of the Acts. It was pointed out to the Lord Chancellor that a subsequent Act had been passed which, in his (Mr. Hunt's) view, modified the operation of the previous Act, allowing the increase of salary without any probation whatever; and it was stated that in a certain case a clerk had his salary raised from £1,200 to £1,500 a-year after a fortnight's service, on the certificate of the Judge that the clerk had discharged his duty to his entire satisfaction. That was a great scandal, and the Committee wished to prevent its recurrence. The Lord Chancellor, however, gave reasons why the proceeding might be defended, if a competent person could not be obtained at less than the maximum salary. But in that case the Lord Chancellor ought to get an Act passed to increase the salary of Chief Clerks. He wished to ask whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government had been called to that paragraph in the Report of the Committee on Public Accounts which said that it was desirable that the Treasury should be a party to all alterations of salaries and office expenses of the Courts of Law, and which recommended that the Treasury should institute an inquiry into the operations of the Act on the subject?

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN said, that 15 & 16 Vict. c. 80, empowered the Lord Chancellor to direct that the salary of any Chief Clerk might be increased from time to time until it amounted to £1,500, provided no such increase was given until the Chief Clerk had been in office three years, and had obtained a certificate that he had conducted himself to the satisfaction of the Judge, the increase to be by annual sums of £100. By 23 & 24 Vict. c. 49, s. 12, the Lord Chancellor was empowered, upon certificate of the Judge, to order that the salary should be increased to the full amount in a somewhat different manner. The Lord Chancellor took the view that by 23 & 24 Vict. he was enabled to increase the salary without any probation whatever. The opinion of the Controller and Auditor General, however, was different, and was to the effect that the Lord Chancellor might, on the proper certificate, make the entire increase, not by separate hundreds running over a period of three years, but at once, after a probation of three years, and that appeared to him the correct view. It appeared monstrous to argue that a clerk, if he obtained the required certificate, might have his salary increased to the full amount after only 14 days' service. He regretted that the Committee of Accounts had not expressed in stronger language their sense of the unpopularity of the transaction. In his opinion, it was nothing less than a misapplication of the public money.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was sure the Committee would feel very grateful to the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and to the Committee over which he so ably presided, for the statement which he had made respecting the existence of a state of things which no one would wish to continue. He should take care that inquiries should be instituted into the matter, and he might say that he would do so with the utmost confidence, as there was no one more willing to listen to reason than the present Lord Chancellor, or one more anxious for the good of the public service. Some little inquiry had been made already, but it could not be completed until after the passing of the Chancery Funds Bill.

Vote agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next; Committee to sit again this day.

And, it being now five minutes to Seven of the clock, House suspended its sitting.

House resumed its sitting at Nine of the clock.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

LOTTERY ACTS.—RESOLUTION.

MR. CHARLEY rose to call attention to the existence of Illegal Lotteries, and to move—

"That the provisions of the Lottery Acts ought to be impartially enforced by Her Majesty's Government against illegal Lotteries, irrespective of their objects, in all parts of the United Kingdom."

In the first place, the hon. and learned Gentleman remarked that the law pronounced all lotteries, of whatever kind, and in whatever part of the country they were established, to be illegal, with the exception only of those in connection with Art Unions, and even these had to be approved by the Privy Council, or carried on under Royal Charter; and in connection with that part of his subject, he was only asking the House to re-affirm a principle of which it has always been a strenuous advocate—namely, that the laws be impartially enforced without fear or favour. Moreover, the laws made no distinction between lotteries for religious and secular objects, as all lotteries were pronounced by the State to be illegal, because they had a direct tendency to promote gambling, and to swell the tide of pauperism and vice. It was true that an Act passed in 1856 deprived private persons of the right to sue promoters of lotteries for the recovery of deposits or penalties; but that was done in order that the prosecution of offenders should rest in the hands of responsible officers of the Crown, and should not be left to the caprice of individuals. Nothing, however, could be more capricious than the proceedings of the Government in carrying out the Lotteries Act; the Home Secretary had made distinction between lotteries without any legal authority, and he had even expressed regret that the Lord Advocate had by a circular secured the withdrawal of lottery tickets in Scotland—against which country he (Mr Charley) had nothing to complain of on account of the occurrence of the practice—because he thought it would be better to allow the law to be violated than deprive certain benevolent institutions of the profits arising from the lottery. The Home Secretary, in fact, seemed to think the end sanctified the means; but the principles of Ignatius Loyola ill-became a Minister of the British Crown. Passing from Scotland to England, he found that the law had been very strictly enforced in England also with reference to lotteries unconnected with so-called religious objects. Two cases had recently come before the metropolitan police magistrates, one of which concerned what was described as the South London Art Union. The other was the case of a lottery promoted during the Franco-German War for the benefit of the German wounded, and honoured by a communication from Count Bismarck. The promoter was informed by a detective that lotteries in England were illegal, and upon the promoter saying that he would write to the Foreign Secretary, the reply was that he might if he pleased; but the answer would appear, if made, not to have been in any way favourable, for both speculations were alike remorselessly suppressed. If the promoters, however, had endeavoured to get up a lottery in favour of some Roman Catholic institution, the threat of an application to a Secretary of State might not have been regarded as so hopeless. He now desired to call the attention of the House to the case of a lottery at Oldham, advertised to be held in support of some day and Sunday schools, with a view to the enlargement of premises and keeping them out of the hands of the school board. The lottery was stated by its promoters to be conducted on the principle of the Art Union, under the patronage of the Bishop of Manchester, and among the prizes to be distributed were a bust of Napoleon, a set of Mr. Disraeli's novels, including, he presumed, a copy of Lothair, a likeness of the Bishop of Manchester, and an excellent portrait of the late Earl of Derby. The announcements about this lottery, which were widely distributed throughout Wales, especially among Sunday school teachers and servants of clergymen, gave details of the poverty of the "parish," and purported to come from the "rector;"

but if ever there was a lottery got up on false pretences it was this one, for it might surprise the House to know that the lottery was in aid of Roman Catholic schools, and the "rector" from whom they proceeded was a priest of that Church. It would be found by a Return for which he moved last year, that the attention of the Home Secretary was drawn to this, as well as to other lotteries, by the Secretary of the Scottish Reformation Society, and in answer, it was stated on behalf of Mr. Bruce that the Treasury Solicitor had already been instructed to warn the parties concerned of the illegality of the scheme in which they were engaged. In the subsequent correspondence it was stated that on the receipt of the first notice the promoters of the lottery had recalled the tickets and stopped the affair; but, despite the assurances of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, there were many who had been unable, after having subscribed, to obtain the return of their money. The "rector," as he called himself, or, in other words, the promoter, a Mr. Brinton, had inserted an advertisement in a local Oldham paper, stating that those who applied for their money would have it returned; but there were many who would not see the advertisement, and who, failing to make the application, would never get their money back. In Ireland he believed there had been 55 lotteries of late years, and that 16,000,000 tickets, representing £400,000, had been sold, and in most of these lotteries a supplementary ticket in a lottery, to consist of all prizes, had been offered to those who disposed of a certain number of tickets as a bribe to induce them to exert themselves to sell these tickets. In one of the announcements of these lotteries was a quotation, excellent enough except as regarded its neighbourhood, from a speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, and close by was an advertisement about a foreign lottery, where one of the prizes amounted to £20,000, although the insertion of these advertisements was forbidden under a penalty of £50. Moreover, some of these lotteries appeared to be annual lotteries. When he had, on a former occasion, put a Question on this subject to the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. C. Fortescue), he had received a very unsatisfactory reply, for that right hon.

Gentleman's answer was, that those lotteries had no tendency to increase gambling, and if anybody deemed them contrary to the letter of the law the Courts were open and the question might be tried. The noble Lord the present Chief Secretary, in the same way, in reply to another Question, said that if the lotteries were illegal there was no difficulty in bringing qui tam actions against the promoters. A qui tam action was one in which a person sued as well for himself as for the Queen; and as by the Act of 1806 the forfeiture was taken from the informer and given entirely to the Crown, it was practically impossible to bring an action of this description at the present time. The noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland practically said to the Irish Protestants that they might violate the law if they chose, but as one of the promoters of the Irish Church Sustentation Fund he (Mr. Charley) should be very sorry to resort to any such mode of raising the wind. It would be most unfair after they had disendowed the Church in Ireland to allow the clergy to gamble for endowments. There were some persons whose practice fell short of their preaching, but the Home Secretary was an exception to this rule, for in his case the preaching fell short of the practice, as exemplified in certain rules laid down by the right hon. Gentleman in the last Session of Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman laid it down that it was better for the law to be violated than that the promoters of these lotteries should be deprived of the benefit to be obtained from them, and that, therefore, the Secretary of State ought to possess the power of allowing the holding of lotteries for objects which he approved; he also said that the practice had been to threaten the promoters of these illegal lotteries, but not to carry out the threat in cases where the object of the lottery was a charitable one—a line of conduct which, in his (Mr. Charley's) opinion, was rather calculated to bring the administration of the law into contempt. The right hon. Gentleman not only did this, but he laid down the extraordinary distinction already referred to between religious and secular lotteries, thus producing an agglomeration of principles which needed only to be enunciated to be condemned. The right hon. Gentleman, moreover, appeared to forget that it required two sets of persons to form a lottery—the promoters and the persons who purchased the chances; and though the promoters might desire to confer benefit upon very desirable objects, it was self-evident that they appealed to motives beyond or other than charitable ones. If the person buying chances in a lottery were a friend of the promoter or of the object promoted, he would be willing to give as a subscription as large a sum as he paid for chances; but if he were—as was the fact in the majority of cases—unknown to the promoters and cared little or nothing for the objects sought to be gained by the lottery, he would be simply a man possessed by the gambling spirit, and desiring to enrich himself by a small pecuniary outlay at the expense of the promoter, who in his turn was laughing in his sleeve at the gullibility of his would-be victimizer. Again, as in the case of the Oldham lottery, false pretences were sometimes resorted to, and persons were trapped into supporting by the purchase of tickets objects to which they were altogether hostile. It might be said that the maxim caveat emptor applied, and that the purchasers of lottery tickets must look out for themselves; but in his opinion the principle upon which later legislation on the subject had been founded was that of protecting the public against extreme recklessness in speculation and consequent ruin. Only a short time ago the case was related of two highly-respectable young women, who had gained a scanty livelihood by needlework, but one of them falling ill they were reduced to poverty, and the other risked their little all in the purchase of a lottery ticket, hoping to retrieve their position. The chance failed, however, and they were ruined. He would say, in concluding, that as State lotteries had been prohibited by Parliament so far back as 1806, he wished to know if it was now to be said that the Church had a less scrupulous conscience than the State, and begged to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the provisions of the Lottery Acts ought to be impartially enforced by Her Majesty's Government against illegal Lotteries, irrespective of their objects, in all parts of the United Kingdom,"—
(Mr. Charley.)

—instead thereof.

Mr. Charley

MR. BRUCE said, that while the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) spoke of the Acts being "impartially" enforced, the whole scope of his arguments went to prove that they ought to be enforced indiscriminately. This was the point of difference between them, and his (Mr. Bruce's) contention was, that the fact of the Legislature having taken lottery prosecutions out of the hands of common informers and vested them in the Attorney General on behalf of the Crown, showed that it was intended to give the Executive Government a discretionary power, to be exercised according to circumstances, in regard to the holding of these lotteries. If that were not so, why was the power taken from the informer at all? Then came the real question—Was that power so removed wisely exercised? So far as his own line of conduct was concerned, it was that which had been pursued by his predecessors in office, of whatever party, and he believed it was a line consistent with the intentions of the Legislature, and approved by the majority of the people. The hon. and learned Gentleman maintained that there was no power now to bring qui tam actions. That contention was quite correct; but it was no less true that a remedy might be found in an indictment for a nuisance, or by summary proceedings before a magistrate. The original lottery statute passed in 1802 was severely penal upon those who offended against its provisions, imposing penalties to the extent of £500, or in default of payment a term of three months' imprisonment; but in 1806 another Lottery Act was passed, for the purpose of granting to the Crown a sum of money to be raised by lotteries, and fixing strict rules as to the mode in which the lotteries should be conducted. He confessed that the object of the statute seemed to be rather to keep in the hands of the State the sole power of holding lotteries than to abolish them altogether; but, however that might be, the law existed, and it was the duty of the Government to apply it for the protection of public morality. Some lotteries were conducted solely for the purpose of gain, generally by persons who resorted to the most dishonest means, and swindled weak-minded and ignorant individuals. Against such lotteries the power of the law was always unsparingly applied; but there were also cases in which the attractions of chance were used for religious or educational purposes. The course he had in such cases pursued, in imitation, he was bound to say, of his predecessors at the Home Office, was as follows:—When a case was brought under his notice, he warned the persons who were conducting the lottery that their proceedings were illegal, and as far as he was aware the warning had never been given in vain. The hon. and learned Gentleman had referred to a lottery got up for some religious purpose at Oldham. Now, it was remarkable that information respecting lotteries of this kind was never given either by Englishmen or Irishmen. The Attorney General had assured him that no complaint respecting them had ever been made to the Government by any person residing in Ireland. Indeed, the sole informant against these lotteries in Ireland was the Secretary of the Scottish Reformation Society. On the reception of the information respecting the lottery at Oldham, he at once communicated with the persons conducting it, and informed them that if they proceeded further with it they would subject themselves to prosecution. They promised to relinquish the scheme; but shortly afterwards he received another communication from the Secretary to the Scottish Reformation Society, who said he believed that, in spite of the assurance which had been given, the lottery was actually being proceeded with. Thereupon he made inquiries of the Mayor of Oldham as to whether this was so, and he might remark that he should certainly have caused a prosecution to be instituted against the promoters of the project if, after the warning, they had persisted in it. The Mayor of Oldham informed him, however, that they had abandoned the scheme, and returned the money received from the subscribers. This, he submitted, was a course which could not fail to commend itself to the good sense of the House, as it must be obvious that cases of this kind called for a warning rather than a prosecution by the Attorney General. The hon. and learned Gentleman had said that it was very strange that people would not give their money directly for a charitable object, instead of advancing it indirectly by lotteries or bazaars. Well, it was no doubt a very curious trait of human nature that persons would give large sums of money at bazaars for articles which were not of the slightest value, the prices they paid depending far more on the rank or personal attractions of the conductors of the bazaar than on the intrinsic value of the articles sold. And it would be further found that when the generosity of the customers was exhausted the proceedings almost invariably terminated with a raffle, in which everybody present took part, without imagining for a moment that the transaction was an illegal one. Surely no one would maintain that the Attorney General ought to prosecute in such cases. There was a rational distinction to be drawn between lotteries got up for more purposes of gain and those which were got up for the purpose of promoting a good object; and the good sense of the House would readily determine that the moral consequences were less injurious in one case than in the other. At the same time, he admitted that a great many of the latter kind of lotteries came within the rule he had laid down, which would subject them to prosecution—namely, those which appealed very strongly to the mere love of gain. In the cases mentioned by the hon. and learned Gentleman, where hopes were held out to the subscribers of obtaining a considerable sum of money, or articles of great value, such as a pair of ponies, piano, and a cottage, the principle, and what might be assumed to be the object of the law were violated, and the action of the Crown might be fairly demanded. All he claimed on the part of the Crown was the right to discriminate between different kinds of lotteries. In cases where the object was clearly bad he instituted a prosecution at once; but where the object was not bad, he acted by giving a warning in the first instance, and prosecuting only in the event of that warning not being heeded. He believed the House would not think it was the duty of the Government to pursue any other course than that which he had indicated.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary was not less bound by the terms of the law than any other person. In determining questions of degree, value must be taken into account, and the right hon. Gentleman had himself pointed out cases in which ponies, pianos, and cottages were raffled for. In that, as in other cases, the right hon. Gentleman was apt to interpret his obligations very loosely, for there was nothing in the Act of Parliament which warranted the exercise of the discretion he claimed. He (Mr. Nowdegate), moreover, did not think that if the Home Secretary considered himself entitled to dispense with the law, he set a good example to the other officers of the Government. Why, he would ask, should the law be restrained in the case of quasi-monastic institutions? In his own county large numbers of lottery tickets had been received from Ireland, and he had been repeatedly asked why any lotteries were permitted, except those which were sanctioned by law, such as the Art Union lotteries. The fact that certain exceptions were made by the law militated very strongly against the wise discretion which the right hon. Gentleman assumed the right to exercise.

MR. M'LAREN said, he must call attention to the fact that the law had been more widely interpreted by the right hon. Gentleman to-night, than it was three years ago by the then Attorney General.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 60; Noes 33: Majority 27.

Main Question proposed.

REVENUES, &c., OF GIBRALTAR. OBSERVATION.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN, in rising to call attention to the local revenue and expenditure of Gibraltar, and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to take measures by amendment of the tariff, or otherwise, to put an end to the contraband traffic now carried on between Gibraltar and Spain," said, that his object was to indicate that very important reforms might be effected in that military colony, if certain changes were made in the method of raising the revenue, without either increasing or diminishing its total amount. Little, indeed, could be urged against the amount of civil expenditure in a colony which had no Debt, and which had for years shown a good surplus, that of 1869 being £8,108, out of a Revenue of £37,833. The salary of the Civil Governor—£5,000 a-year—did, however, appear to be excessive; and it was not easy to see what duties he could have to perform among a civil population of 20,000, aided as he was by a colonial secretary, engineer, auditor, collector of Revenues, inspector of Revenues, supervisor of markets, all drawing fair salaries. On the other hand, the item for Education was £222 16s. 2d. There was one special matter in which a great reform might be carried out by the suppression of the numerous low wineshops, where drink of the worst quality was obtained by the sailors and soldiers. A discretionary power was enjoyed by officers commanding regiments on foreign stations, of permitting the sale of spirituous liquors in the regimental canteens, which were, of course, under strict regulations; but at Gibraltar that power was frustrated by local regulations. The rates for spirit licences were so high that it was almost impossible to afford one for each canteen when a regiment was divided, as at Gibraltar, among three or four barracks, and licences had actually been refused to regimental canteens upon the ground that "if granted a number of wineshops, licensed for the soldiers only, would be closed, and the revenue thereby diminished." Those who knew the nature of these wine-shops, the company who frequented them, and the quality of the liquor there furnished, would no doubt consider any increase of revenue derived from their maintenance as very dearly purchased at the expense of the health and morals of their soldiers. More than £5,000 a-year was raised at Gibraltar from licences, but a Government financially so prosperous, had no excuse for maintaining such a system; and even if the money was required, a reasonable duty on tobacco, now free, would answer the two-fold purpose of raising revenue, and checking the contraband traffic now carried on with Spain. The fact was, that the position of Gibraltar, a free port, except as regarded wines and spirits, rose a very grave international question affecting the character of Great Britain as a good neighbour not merely to Spain, but to the many great nations whose neighbour she was by virtue of her island fortresses and other outlying possessions. The present time seemed peculiarly appropriate for considering their position as possessors of Gibraltar, the only territory which they held upon the Continent of Europe. Many thought that they were bound to show cause not only to the British taxpayer but also to friendly foreign Powers, why they kept possession of any European territory beyond the limits of the United Kingdom, but upon so wide a question he would not now enter. It might be doubtful how far Gibraltar was necessary to us as a coaling depôt, a naval station, or a connecting link with India; but all those points might fairly be urged in favour of its retention. On the other hand, it would hardly be maintained in that country, that although Gibraltar did not pay for any other purpose, it was well worth keeping as an entrepôt for smuggling—an assertion freely made by foreign writers. No imperious demand had been made, nor was likely to be made, for the surrender of Gibraltar, but now and then they heard of rumoured proposals as to purchase, or exchange for Ceuta, the Spanish fortress in Africa. Such proposals could not be for a moment entertained; Ceuta would simply be Gibraltar, without strength or prestige, and if they ever parted with the Rock it must not be by sale or barter, but as a free gift from one great nation to another. The present question was whether, admitting the necessity of their retaining the great fortress, they could not prevent its being more than a sentimental grievance to the proud, high-spirited people, from whom they wrested it, and against whom they had held it for more than a century and a-half. They were told that at Gibraltar the sight of their flag and the report of their guns were painful to Spanish feelings, and that was not surprising, when they recollected that that flag and those guns had long protected a system of contraband traffic, injurious alike to the Spanish revenue and the British reputation. Spain had recently shown herself worthy of the esteem and sympathy of free nations, and in no way could they better prove their friendliness towards her and her Government than by exerting themselves to repress smuggling, as they were bound by treaty to do. In Spain, as in all countries where the Press was free, great stress was laid upon the public opinion and the conduct of that country. Their journals were constantly quoted in Spanish newspapers, and particular satisfaction was produced by the friendly sentiments towards Spain expressed in the gracious Speech from the Throne. There was reason to believe that the kindly feeling of Spanish Liberals towards England had conduced to their recent silence upon a question which touched every patriotic Spaniard so nearly as did the foreign occupation of Gibraltar. It was true that smuggling was no longer so crying an evil at Gibraltar as it once was; and that was due chiefly to amendment of the Spanish tariff, a process which, carried out conjointly with their own Government, might put an end altogether to the traffic. As a free port, Gibraltar afforded special facilities to smugglers, in spite of lines of sentries and squadrons of guarda costas. It was, of course, impossible to obtain accurate statistics of smuggling; but it was a significant fact that within three years 30,000 cwt. of American tobacco was imported into Gibraltar, according to recent Returns, and of that more than 29,000 cwt. again exported within the same period, finding its way undoubtedly into Spain, where tobacco had long been a Government monopoly. The Spanish tariff was vexatious, and there was corruption in the preventive service, so that a large proportion probably passed with official connivance; but many smugglers preferred taking their chance to giving a bribe, and not unfrequently they paid the penalty with their lives. Great recklessness of life and property, and general demoralization had resulted from that traffic throughout a large portion of Andalusia; and the brigands, of whom so much had lately been heard, might be nearly identified with contrabandists. Not long ago a similar state of matters existed on the northern frontier of Spain. An old douanier, who was his guide on the Pyrenees, described armed bands of contrabandists as so numerous that it was impossible to resist them, but added—"Since the Emperor altered the tariffs there have been no smugglers to speak of in the Pyrenees." He believed that in the South the same results would follow from a similar policy; but without joint action on their part all efforts of the Spaniards would be fruitless. Smuggling was hardly an offence which could be made the subject of an extradition treaty; but it was difficult, if not impossible, to draw the line between organized smuggling and piracy, or brigandage. The existence of an asylum within the "Neutral Ground" for various sorts of outlaws was a grievance repeatedly urged against them by the Spanish authorities, as in the recent case of the supposed capture by brigands of the British subjects, where serious suspicions of collusion were entertained. If Her Majesty's Government would co-operate heartily with that of Spain in this matter, a great injustice might be redressed, and much might be done towards establishing a cordial understanding between two nations, who had in common many great interests for the future, as well as glorious traditions in the past. In conclusion, he would say, that although the forms of the House would not allow him to make the Motion of which he had given Notice, he trusted that the Government would give him some assurance that it was their wish to meet the Spanish Government at least half way in the matter.

Mr. Nowdegate

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, he could not agree with the hon. Baronet (Sir David Wedderburn), that the salary of the Governor of Gibraltar was too high; because they must not judge from the number of the population, but from the geographical position of the place, the number of troops stationed there, its essential importance to this country, and the necessity of its being under the command of a man of high character. With regard to the cession of Gibraltar, he would not enter into that subject, except to say that he believed the opinion of that House and of the country would be very much against such a step. All, therefore, that could be done was, that while they held Gibraltar they should endeavour to make their occupation as little offensive as possible to any friendly Power. No doubt, the contraband traffic spoken of by the hon. Baronet did exist; but he did not know that they were to blame for that, for the high protective duties of Spain were principally responsible for the encouragement of contraband dealing. Gibraltar was commonly spoken of as a free port; but it was only so in the sense that duties were only levied on wines and spirits. Upon wine the duty was 7½*d.* per half-dozen bottles, and upon spirits $1 a gallon. In 1869 about £11,000 was raised from these sources; and he doubted whether either lowering or raising the duties would exercise a beneficial effect in repressing contraband trade, because the smuggling arose rather from the tariff of Spain. With high protective duties there was sure to be smuggling, and in Spain the ad valorem duty of from 30 to 35 per cent pressed heavily upon merchants. He was not sorry that the hon. Baronet had called attention to that contraband trade, and, as far as Her Majesty's Government were concerned, they would do all that they could to put it down, and to promote a friendly feeling between that country and Spain. A check on the traffic was at present in operation, vessels of a certain size trading from Gibraltar being required to have a licence, which could be revoked on misconduct. Already the attention of the Admiralty and the Foreign and Colonial Offices had been directed to the subject, and it would not be the fault of the Government if they did not succeed in their efforts.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, he was glad to hear from the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen), that he was not prepared to give any encouragement to the idea that we were about to give up Gibraltar, which had been bought so dearly by this country, and which was associated with some of the most glorious episodes of our history. He knew something of Gibraltar, and wished to express his dissent from much which had fallen from the hon. Baronet who had brought the subject under the notice of the House. It was perfectly well known that when a contraband trade was profitable to a certain extent it was almost impossible to put a stop to it. We had abundant proof of that at home, notwithstanding the integrity and effectiveness of our preventive force; and what, therefore, must be the case in Spain, where the smuggler had a friend not only at the port from which he sailed, but in that at which he arrived, it was easy to imagine. When it was borne in mind that the Spanish colonies produced some of the finest tobacco in the world, it was somewhat strange to find that a Spaniard could hardly get a good cigar at any price. The fact was, that the profit was so large that a great smuggling trade was almost necessarily created. He quite agreed in the opinion that the tariff should be reformed; but it was not that of Gibraltar, but that which prevailed in Spain. The laws were fairly carried out in Gibraltar; and if Spain put her laws into execution with equal fairness smuggling would soon disappear. He also concurred with the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) in thinking that the Governor of Gibraltar was not paid too high a salary. The post was a very delicate one, and had generally been filled in a manner well calculated to maintain the character and honour of England.

Sir David Wedderburn

THE LICENSING BILL.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK, in rising to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If the new Licensing Bill will be framed as a complete measure with a view to its being a permanent settlement of the question, or whether it is intended that it should be merely a portion of a more extensive scheme hereafter to be introduced? to call attention to the great loss and deterioration of property that will accrue from any uncertainty on this point; and to move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is undesirable to pass any measure that does not afford a permanent and definite settlement of the Regulations and Licences affecting the property invested, directly or indirectly, in the Liquor Trade,” said, that since he first placed Notice of the Question on the Paper, it had almost been answered by the course of events. A Bill on the subject had that Session been brought in, which was of the greatest pretensions, and which had caused a great depreciation in all the property which was either directly or indirectly connected with the licensing trade of the country. It was, therefore, extremely desirable to ascertain from the Government, if possible, whether that part of their scheme which, after ten years, would throw the licences of all the houses in the trade open to competition, was to be persevered with or not. For himself, he could conceive no principle so disastrous as that applied to property, whether its value were £50,000 or merely the value of a common public-house. There were two great principles involved in the question—one being that the ratepayers of a district should under certain circumstances be enabled to prevent the sale of any intoxicating liquors within its limits, and the other that licences should be granted very much as hitherto. Everyone admitted that the present licensing system was very bad, and that it should be reformed; he therefore thought it was much to be deplored that the Government, after having made so many promises on the subject, should have withdrawn the Bill, and merely contented themselves with stating that they meant to propose some temporary regulations for the future. The fact was that if the measures of the Government had been better matured at the commencement of the Session, the waste of the time of the House, which was so much to be deplored, would not have occurred, and it would have been spared the miserable fiasco of the Budget, the equally miserable fiasco of the Licensing Bill—which was one of the first innocents murdered this Session—and that wretched abortion of a measure, the Local Taxation Bill. As to the question of licences, he, for one, did not see why the ratepayers who felt themselves aggrieved by the existing state of things should not be allowed to exercise the authority which they might legitimately obtain; while, on the other hand, he knew of no good reason why the licensed victuallers should not be permitted to carry their principle, which he thought an equally good one, into effect—that of buying up existing interests from a fund created by themselves, and so diminish the number of publichouses in the country. He thought that a good measure with respect to licensing might have been carried during the present Session, but when a Bill assailing indiscriminately a powerful interest was brought in, no one could be surprised that it failed to receive a favourable reception. That measure was most injurious to the higher class of houses in which liquor was sold, and hardly touched that lower class of houses which all wished to get rid of. Legislation, he believed, might do much to encourage sobriety. It might be done by diminishing the present competition for publichouses; they might place the liquor trade on a sound foundation if both sides would yield a little. A man, in England, sneaked into a publichouse. Abroad, gaiety and conviviality were the characteristics of the places where liquor was sold. And the reason of the difference was, that in England the keeper of the house was not made responsible for the consequences of supplying his customers with more than was good for them. They were now promised a Bill simply to regulate the liquor traffic; but no one could say what its provisions were to be. He was a landowner himself, and it was his custom in laying out land to be built upon to apportion, as far as possible to the circumstances of the case, the houses which, under certain restrictions, were to be used for the sale of beer and other liquors; but such a Bill as the Government introduced would render all his efforts nugatory, because at the termination of ten years anyone, in spite of the arrangements he had made, might obtain a licence without even having a house at the time to carry on the trade. Nothing could be more objectionable than the course which the Government seemed prepared to adopt—namely, to hang up this matter for another year, and leave it uncertain whether that unjust principle respecting the ten years' licence was or was not to be adopted. He should have been content to have seen some portion, though not the extreme portion, of the Permissive Prohibitory Bill carried into law, but all the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department now proposed to do was to establish some regulations in reference to the conduct of business in publichouses. This delay in dealing with the subject of licensing was to be deplored, because large interests were involved, the revenue derived from the liquor trade amounting to £25,000,000. A trade of that magnitude deserved better treatment than it had received, and it was very much to be desired that the intentions of the Government on the subject should be known this year, because the House would be called on to make up any deficit in the Revenue which might be produced by any Bill intended to be introduced by the Government. Surely it would only have been wise and fair at the beginning of the Session either to have brought in a Bill which the Government were resolved to pass, or to have left the question untouched. He believed that the country generally was agreed on the main principles on which legislation should be based, so that the hesitation or failure of the Government were the less to be explained. The hon. Baronet concluded by asking the Question of which he had given Notice.

Sir Lawrence Palk

Mr. BRUCE said, if the hon. Baronet the Member for East Devon (Sir Lawrence Palk) had established one thing by his speech, it was that he had entirely failed to appreciate the magnitude of the question to be dealt with. He called upon the Government not only to introduce a fresh measure, but to introduce one which should deal with the whole subject at once—or, as he said, which should deal with the licensing system as well as with the regulation of houses. The hon. Baronet must know that the licensing system was one of the most difficult problems to deal with; over and over again successive statesmen had attempted to deal with it, and had shrunk from the difficult task; and if the hon. Baronet had undertaken the task himself he would have found the difficulties such that he might have considered even failure was no disgrace. The hon. Baronet called upon the Government at this period of the Session, with a large portion of the Estimates unvoted, and with measures they were pledged to carry uncarried, to bring forward a measure dealing with the whole question, or to inform the House on what principles any measure they might introduce subsequently would be based. He thought the House would be prepared for the statement that he declined to give the required answer. He was quite willing to learn by experience, and, having discovered the shoals and rocks by which the question was surrounded, he would endeavour to avoid them in the future. To all offers and suggestions coming from the licensed victuallers and from others he was willing to pay the most careful attention; and he was ready to admit that in the suggestions which were made after the introduction of his Bill, and not before, he had discerned elements of usefulness in the settlement of the question. From the hon. Baronet they had heard expressions of sympathy with distillers, brewers, and owners of publichouse property, and honestly and sincerely he lamented the injury which undoubtedly had been inflicted upon them by uncertainty as to possible legislation; but there was another portion of the community on behalf of whom he did not hear a single word of sympathy, for whom he felt much more, and that was those who suffered in morals and happiness, and all that made life more desirable and respectable, from the present condition of our licensing laws. He had spoken of the present number of licences as if he forgot that, excluding London, there were of public-houses and beerhouses one for every 150 of the population—men, women, and children. [Sir LAWRENCE PALK said, on the contrary, he was in favour of diminishing the number.] The hon. Baronet would find he could not diminish the number without in some way affecting or injuring the interests of those whose rights he so strongly advocated. He called upon the Government to do that which was utterly impossible—to bring in a measure which should be easily carried—without affecting in any way the interests of the proprietors and keepers of publichouses, and that was impossible. He could only repeat that he was willing to learn by experience; but he should be injuring the cause he had at heart if he were to state, which, indeed, he was not prepared to do, what was the policy of the Government with respect to the licensing part of the question. The progress of Business did not inspire him with hope, but if the opportunity offered in the course of the Session he should be prepared to bring in a Bill to deal with matters of police and regulation; but the discussions which had arisen upon the licensing question imposed upon the Government the duty of re-considering the whole matter and seeing what fresh proposition could be made.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the question could not be treated as it ought to be treated at the end of a Session like this; and, if it were touched at all, it could only be by a measure suspending for a time any further increase in the number of publichouses, for if they went further and dealt with police clauses they would only prejudice a more comprehensive measure in the future. He should like to see the Government take a strong line without attempting to meet the views of either of the extreme parties to the controversy—a line which would gradually reduce the number of houses, without at the same time dealing with them so violently as they were dealt with in the Bill of the Government. This might be done by raising the rateable value of the houses, by restricting the discretion of magistrates to grant licences, and by curtailing the hours that they were open. It was impossible to lay down any fixed rule based upon population; because one house to 1,000 persons might be sufficient in one place, while in another one to 400 or 500 might be insufficient, on account of markets and other causes of influx, which could not be temporarily provided for. The attempt to deal with the subject, other than as a whole, would be injurious to the object all had in view—namely, the diminution of the deplorable amount of drunkenness now prevalent among the working classes.

MR. STAVELEY HILL said, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had answered the question put to him. Let him say boldly that the Bill he had withdrawn provoked so much opposition that he was obliged to leave the matter alone for the Session. The question to which it was desirable that the Government should give an answer was this—Did they mean, in any Bill which they intended to bring forward, to confiscate the property in which a large body of persons were directly and indirectly interested, as they had proposed to do in their measure so recently withdrawn? He thought a fairer answer ought to have been given by the right hon. Gentleman to that question, for this reason—that people ought to know whether the large amount of property invested in the trade was safe or not; and in connection with that part of the question he would remind the House, that in addition to the money actually invested in the trade itself, there were large sums of money invested in mortgages upon the houses used for carrying on the trade.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS, while he thought the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Lawrence Palk) was perfectly justified in putting his Question, conceived that there was no reason to find fault with the Home Secretary for the answer he had given to it. All parties, however, were agreed that some remedy should be applied to the existing state of things, and this being so he had no doubt that some remedy would be found. The licensed victuallers had no interest in the increase of the number of public-houses; and if too many licences had been granted by the magistrates, it would be hard to visit upon the victuallers the fault of those who had to carry out the law. A great many licences must continually fall in by effluxion of time, and with the increase of population, and the transfer of licences from one district to another, it would be easy to control the number of licences. He hoped that in any future Bill the right hon. Gentleman would recollect what he stated on the 13th of July, 1870, that it would be very unjust to deprive those engaged in this trade of their right to sell without giving them compensation. The ten years' clause in the last Bill was looked upon in the light of confiscation, and he was glad that the right hon. Gentleman had thrown aside his pre-conceived ideas, and would endeavour to do justice to all parties.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he believed that many of the persons who signed the Petitions presented to that House in favour of the Permissive Prohibitory Liquor Bill were actuated by a feeling very similar to that which influenced many of those who signed Petitions for the Ballot—namely, that they were dissatisfied with the present state of things, and wished for some improvement in it, they could hardly tell how or what. He regarded the feeling now existing among the working classes on this subject as a very healthy sign, and as the growth of public opinion rather than the result of any legislation, had put down drunkenness in higher ranks of society, so he hoped they would gradually see the same salutary change effected among the working class. He could not view the measure introduced and abandoned this year by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary as one that offered the basis of a satisfactory settlement of that question; and he trusted that for their own sakes as well as for the sake of the public interest, the Government would be able at the commencement of next Session to lay a well-considered and matured Bill dealing with that important subject on the Table, with a full determination to submit it to the judgment of the House. With the enormous amount of property invested in the trade, it was not fair that the matter should be hung up, and he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would make up his mind during the Recess as to the nature of the Bill to be introduced, and, coute qui coute, take the judgment of the House upon it. It was a ground, too, of just complaint that an opportunity had not during the present Session been afforded for a full discussion of the Government proposal, as the opinion of Parliament might have assisted the Government in the framing of their measure. But the interests of the public at large, and the interests of the trade concerned, were equally opposed to any trifling with the subject, and both parties, he believed, would willingly see a fair and liberal measure adopted; such a one, for instance, as, while it contented the publicans, would remove temptation from the working man.

Mr. Harvey Lewis

MR. LOCKE said, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had exercised a wise discretion when he withdrew the Bill, because he could not conceive the pleasure of discussing a measure that was universally condemned. They had discussed the principle of the Permissive Bill, and there could be nothing more plain, clear, and decisive than to say that because drinking beer to a great extent was a bad thing nobody should have any to drink at all. The hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) had been agitating that principle for twelve years, and, notwithstanding what had been said to the contrary, the state of the country with regard to drink had gone on improving. Everybody said a Bill must be brought in, but nobody did it. The hon. Baronet the Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) was the only person who had sketched out a plan which, by any possibility could be carried out, and as he had been so successful with his small beer Bill, he hoped he would attempt something with respect to the large beerhouses. The hon. Baronet had caused a panic amongst the beer-shop keepers, and although he had deprived them of many of their privileges they made no complaint, but great advantage had arisen from the legislation he had adopted. Although the hon. Baronet's course had been, to a certain extent, severe, still, at the same time, it had been extremely mild in comparison with the Permissive Bill and the Home Secretary's Bill, which were two extremes in opposite directions. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would mature a plan during the Recess and submit it at the Sitting of Parliament next Session, in order that it might be fully discussed.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, he was not dissatisfied with the position of this great drink question, because where formerly nobody appeared to take any interest in it, everybody now had a remedy of some kind or other, and that showed him that drinking could not be diminishing in the satisfactory manner they would wish the public to believe. He would not discuss the Bill of the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) until he had seen it, but he would take that opportunity to thank the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary for the efforts he had made this year to deal with the question. The right hon. Gentleman had been attacked on all sides, but he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) wished to pay his tribute to the honest and earnest attention he had paid to the subject. He was not surprised the right hon. Gentleman had failed, because of the difficulty of the subject. It would be impossible to bring in a measure which should be satisfactory to everyone. The reason why the right hon. Gentleman's Bill failed was because he did not excite the enthusiasm of the country, which he might have done had he trusted to his fellow-countrymen in this matter.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he must point out that it was strange that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary should complain of the unreasonableness of his hon. Friend the Member for East Devon (Sir Lawrence Palk), when for the last three years this subject had been under his consideration. That morning at an advanced hour a Bill—Intoxicating Liquors (New Licences) Bill—was read a second time which had reference to this subject, and he did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman meant to leave the solution of this question in the hands of Gentlemen whose names were at the back of that Bill. He hoped that the experience of the right hon. Gentleman would teach him how difficult it was to deal with vested interests.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, he wished it to be clearly understood that when they talked about the drink question they really meant excessive drinking, and it was with that the Government were called upon to deal. The people never would submit to have the power taken from them of saying what they would drink or how they should drink it. Habits of drunkenness were not on the increase, and in the Army the soldiers were becoming increasingly sober as more amusements were being opened up to them, a fact which pointed out the way they should take in reforming the habits of the people generally.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had great reason to complain of the course taken by the powerful association of which his hon. Friend (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) was the head, for they had given the right hon. Gentleman no encouragement in regard to the measure he brought forward at an early period of the Session. He believed that, however defective it might be in details, that measure was an honest attempt to solve a very difficult problem, and as such was entitled to the cordial support of the party which advocated temperance. The financial as well as the moral aspect of this question must be considered, for large bodies who had invested capital in this trade, in accordance with the legislation of the country, could not be expected to relinquish a lucrative business without receiving compensation. There was a general feeling that the number of beershops and publichouses was in excess of the requirements of the population, but he thought that before these could be removed compensation must be given. He hoped the Government would either support the measure of the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Robert Anstruther), which was read a second time at an early hour that morning, or would introduce a similar Bill to prevent the acquisition of new rights.

SIR HENRY HOARE said, he thought it might be assumed that the right hon. Gentleman after withdrawing his Bill would not in any future measure neglect to provide for adequate compensation, but he hoped the Government would distrust the proposals of so-called philanthropists. He was sure the Bill mentioned, putting an end to licences in the current year, would receive support from licensed victuallers.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, it was desirable that if the Home Secretary proposed to bring in a Bill this Session to regulate the police department of the licensing system, he should give notice of his intention, rather than leave the matter in uncertainty. He trusted that whatever measure the right hon. Gentleman introduced he would take measures to ascertain the real feeling of the country, and if necessary appoint a Royal Commission, or institute an inquiry of that kind. His hon. Friend (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), who could not again speak in the debate, had received statistics from various parts of England showing that there had been an absolute increase of convictions for drunkenness; but the police explained this by saying that keepers of houses being now afraid of danger from harbouring drunken people, turned them more readily into the streets, where they were arrested, so that there was no actual increase.

REPRESENTATION OF IRELAND.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN called attention to the vacancies existing in the representation of Ireland, and pointed out that in consequence of the disfranchisement in 1869 of the boroughs of Cashel and Sligo, Ireland had not had during the last three years her full complement of Members in the House, the number having been 103 only instead of 105, the number Ireland was entitled to by the covenant between the two countries. Considering that no Irish measure, except that for the protection of life and property in Westmeath, had occupied attention this Session, he had hoped that the Government, with the majority they had at their back, would have attempted to dispose of the two vacant seats; and he brought forward the matter now with the hope of extracting a pledge from the Government with regard to next Session, because he wished the seats to be disposed of by the present Government. He trusted the seats would be given to boroughs, the representation of which was less adequate than that of the counties. If the Government would only fix upon the places they could easily carry a Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the Government were desirous as soon as possible, of providing for the allocation of the vacant seats; but he declined to give any pledge on the part of the Government as to the time when and the manner in which the Government would attempt to dispose of them. There had been no general re-distribution of seats in Ireland as there had been in England, and many hon. Members were of opinion that there ought to be such a re-distribution; and it was therefore a question whether the allocation of these vacant seats ought not to be postponed until there had been a favourable opportunity of considering the wider question. As to the claims of particular boroughs, it might be that there were other constituencies which would have still greater claims. He could assure the hon. and learned Baronet that the political complexion of any proposed constituency was a matter that had never crossed the minds of the Government at all.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

CONVENTUAL AND MONASTIC INSTITUTIONS.

MR. NEWDEGATE moved—

"That Mr. Thomas Chambers be discharged from further attendance on the Select Committee on Conventual and Monastic Institutions."

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK said, he must object to the Motion on the ground that the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone had attended all the investigations of the Committee, and that all the Committee had to do was to prepare the Report.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, it was at the express desire of the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone that he had made the Motion before the House.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, it would not be fair to the other Members of the Committee to allow such a course to be pursued, and he must therefore oppose the Motion.

Question put, and negatived.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (BOROUGH FUNDS) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. LEEHAN, Bill to authorise the application of the Borough Fund of Municipal Corporations in England and Wales in certain cases, ordered to be brought in by Mr. LEEHAN, Mr. MUNDELLA, Mr. GOLDNEY, and Mr. CANDLISH. Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 203.]

THAMES EMBANKMENT.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire whether, having regard to the various rights and interests involved, it is expedient that the land reclaimed from the Thames, and lying between Whitehall Gardens and Whitehall Place should, in whole or in part, be appropriated for the advantage of the inhabitants of the Metropolis, and, in such case, in what manner such appropriation should be effected."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

Mr. J. G. Talbot

And, on July 3, Committee nominated as follows:—Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Lord JOHN MANNERS, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH, Sir WILLIAM TITE, Mr. BRERESFORD HOPE, Mr. VERNON HARCOURT, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. JOHN LOCKE, Mr. LAIRD, and Sir FREDERICK HEYGATE:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

NEW MINT BUILDING SITE BILL.

Select Committee on the New Mint Building Site Bill nominated:—Mr. BAXTER, Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH, Mr. MUNTZ, and Mr. CROSS, and Three Members to be added by the Committee of Selection:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Three to be the quorum.

Ordered, That all Petitions presented during the present Session against the Bill be referred to the Committee; and such of the Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel or agents, be heard upon their Petitions, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bill against the said Petitions.—(Mr. Ayrton.)

PUBLIC SCHOOLS ACT (1868) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Secretary BRUCE, Bill to amend "The Public Schools Act, 1868," ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary BRUCE and Mr. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 204.]

House adjourned at One o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 19th June, 1871.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—

House of Lords Appellate Jurisdiction (147).

Committee—Dogs* (134-191); Gasworks Clauses Act (1847) Amendment (No. 2)* (154-192).

Committee—Report—Burial Law Amendment* (126); Public Health (Scotland) Act (1867) Amendment* (148); Lunacy Regulation Amendment* (171); Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, Amendment* (185-193).

Report—Charters (Colleges)* (93); Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 1)* (127).

Third Reading—Metropolitan Commons Supplemental* (103); Local Government Supplemental (No. 2)* (149); India (Local Legislatures)* (150), and passed.

DECLARATION OF PARIS, 1856—SEIZURE OF AN ENEMY'S GOODS ON THE HIGH SEAS.—PETITIONS.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH rose to ask whether the Declaration of 1856 had been ratified by Her Majesty in Council, and to present Petitions of Inhabitants of

Birmingham, Armley, South Shields, Chorley, Cononley, Bolton, and Maidstone against the validity of the Declaration of Paris concerning the Seizure of an Enemy's goods on the High Seas. The noble Earl said, it was extraordinary how few persons were acquainted with what that Declaration really was, and he would therefore briefly give its history. When the Plenipotentiaries who had been engaged in negotiating the peace with Russia had concluded their labours, Count Walewski suddenly proposed that before separating they should sign a Declaration with respect to maritime law to the following effect:—First, that privateering should be abolished; secondly, that a neutral flag should cover an enemy's goods with the exception of contraband of war; thirdly, that neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, should not be liable to capture under an enemy's flag; and fourthly, that a blockade in order to be binding must be effective. Some of the Plenipotentiaries stated that they must refer the matter to their respective Governments; but eventually they all signed the Declaration, and other nations were invited to accede to it. Spain, the United States, and Mexico had, however, abstained from doing so. Now, we had beheld with wonder, not unmixed with awe, the rapid growth of Prussia into a powerful and gigantic Empire, which by its energy and military talent had succeeded within five years in crushing two of the greatest military Powers of Europe and our natural allies, Austria and France, and how on both occasions she had been nursed by Russia, which had guarded her boundaries while she was engaged in those wars. This naturally aroused the attention of England, and compelled her to examine her own forces, and she found to her alarm that she could not properly equip and place in the field more than 500,000 troops, the Regular Army not exceeding 200,000, and the Militia and Volunteers, which raised the complement to 500,000, being more or less undisciplined. We were now endeavouring to make up for this, and to match ourselves with Germany and Russia—a nation of 30,000,000 against two nations of 40,000,000 and 80,000,000—and a system of voluntary enlistment against a system of conscription. In this we seemed to have very little chance of success—it was, indeed, like the frog in the fable which tried to swell itself to the size of the ox. We were trusting to the chapter of accidents and to our former good fortune; but it should be remembered that we did not possess the same power of offence and defence as formerly. We had been proceeding on the assumption that because we desired to be at peace and to make no enemies every one would be willing to let us alone. But it would be well to consider whether we had any friends, and whether any Power was likely to help us in our hour of need. He feared that our policy of neutrality on many occasions had produced great coldness; and what security had we that the unscrupulous statesmen who ruled with a rod of iron the German Empire would not, when we least expected it and were least prepared, offer studied insult to this country which would oblige us to engage in war? He could not help feeling the humiliating confession made, as he understood, by the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) during the recent discussion on the revision of the Treaty of 1856, for he admitted in almost so many words that we were obliged to conform to the wishes of Russia in the matter of the neutralization of the Black Sea, because we were not in a position to resist those wishes by force. There would be very little difficulty on the part of Germany in forcing us to go to war if she were so disposed, and she would not want for motives. Germany wished to become a great naval Power, and would like Holland and Belgium, the independence of which latter we had guaranteed; while Russia wished for Constantinople, the key of the East and the West, and after the defeat of Austria and France we were now the sole protectors of Turkey. Our Navy was formerly our chief means of defence; but we had now lost all power of injuring an enemy by sea, while our Army was utterly inadequate for offence or defence. As steam rendered an enemy almost ubiquitous, we should, unless prepared by fortifications round the island, well manned, be taken at a great disadvantage; and though we should send out our iron-clads and swift cruisers, the enemy's fleet would remain in port, preserved by torpedoes, while his commerce would be transferred to neutral bottoms, where, under the Treaty of Paris, they would be safe. This was the case in the Crimean War; for England and

The Earl of Denbigh

France having foolishly admitted that a neutral flag should cover the enemy's goods, the commerce of Russia passed through Prussia, Russia thus receiving about £17,000,000 of our money, and being thus enabled to prolong the war. The enemy, on the other hand, would fit out cruisers to prey on our commerce, the right of insurance would rise, British merchants would prefer neutral bottoms, our merchant ships would rot in their harbours, and our sailors would be attracted by high wages and safety to neutral ships. Our Navy, too, would seek in vain for the enemy, and there being no prize-money in prospect sailors would not man our fleet. The enemy would be able, therefore, to undertake some such scheme as that described in the "Battle of Dorking." In a recent discussion in the House of Commons on the subject, the Declaration was defended on the ground that we should make the best of a bad job, and the Attorney General attempted to prove that England was previously bound by similar engagements; but this he (the Earl of Denbigh) denied. He maintained with the Petitioners that the Declaration, not being an agreement or treaty, was not binding—

"1. Because a treaty can be made only by authority of the Sovereign, and the British Plenipotentiaries who signed the Declaration of Paris had no authority for that purpose from the Queen of England. 2. Because no document is a treaty till it has been ratified by the Sovereign, and the Declaration of Paris has never been ratified by the Queen. 3. Because the Declaration of Paris affects to change the law of England, and no treaty changing the laws of England is valid without the consent of Parliament, and the Declaration of Paris has never been assented to by Parliament. 4. Because the Declaration of Paris affects to change not the conventional, but the permanent and immutable law of nations, to change which is beyond the competence of Parliament or of any other human authority. 5. Because a treaty must profess itself a treaty, which the Declaration of Paris does not, but describes itself as a 'declaration adopted' in order 'to introduce into international relations fixed principles' on maritime law, and 'to establish a uniform doctrine on so important a point;' while, in fact, no uniform doctrine has been established, the United States, Mexico, and Spain not having adopted the Declaration of Paris. 6. Because a treaty must contain reciprocal and equivalent obligations—that the only equivalent, so far as Prussia and Russia are concerned, for the surrender of our power, which is purely maritime, would be a surrender of their power, which is purely military. 7. Because, though it has been alleged that the abolition of privateering was an equivalent for the surrender of our right to seize enemies' goods in neutral vessels, privateering has not been abolished, being avowedly retained by Spain, Mexico, and the United States."

By adhering to the Declaration we should be inflicting on ourselves a mortal injury; and it was remarked at the time by the late Lord Derby and by a noble Earl opposite that in case of necessity we should have to abandon it. This, however, it was better to do before a war broke out, as war might thereby be prevented by showing the uselessness of any Power going to war with us. In 1780 the "Armed Neutrality" was entered into on the principle that free goods made free bottoms; but, although then at war with our American colonies and with France and Spain, we refused to admit the principle, continued to seize the enemy's goods and broke up the league. In 1801 the same tactics were attempted by Russia, which induced Sweden and Denmark to co-operate with her; but what course did this country take? The King, in his Speech to Parliament, said—

"A convention has been concluded by the Court of Russia with those of Copenhagen and Stockholm, the object of which is to renew their former engagement for establishing by force a new Code of Maritime Law inconsistent with the rights and hostile to the interests of this country. In this situation I could not hesitate as to the conduct which it became me to pursue. I have taken the earliest measures to repel the aggressions of this hostile Confederacy, and to support those principles which are essential to the maintenance of our naval strength, and which are grounded on the system of public law so long established and recognized in Europe."

Lord Eldon, in the debate on the Address, said—

"The right of searching neutral vessels originated in the rights of nature, and no convention or treaty can permanently destroy that right."—[Hansard, Parl. History, xxxv. 886.]

The Convention was broken by the Battle of Copenhagen, and Lord Nelson, in a despatch dated April 4, 1801, narrated a conversation with the Crown Prince of Denmark, to whom he had said—

"Suppose that England were to consent, which she never will, to this freedom and nonsense of navigation, I will tell your Royal Highness what the result would be—ruination to Denmark, and the Baltic would soon change its name to the Russian Sea."

Sir William Scott, moreover, declared a military war and a commercial peace to be a state of things not yet seen in the world; and Sir John Nicholls, King's Advocate, in an argument before Lord Kenyon, said—"There is no such thing as a war for arms and a peace for commerce." We had more steamers than the rest of the world put together, and he recently, in an extract from the report of Mr. Joseph Nimmo, jun., chief of the division of tonnage on English commerce at Washington, met with the following remarkable words:—

"England now enjoys almost a monopoly of the steam Navy of the world, and her power on the ocean is as great as when she overthrew the maritime power of Holland, and made herself commercial mistress of the seas. The most striking point is that in the trade of the United States with Europe there are now 133 foreign steamers engaged, of which 101 are British, and not one wearing the American flag."

These steamers it would be our interest, in case of war, to fit out as privateers, while it was, of course, the interest of the other Powers to discountenance privateering and to represent it as legalized piracy. If, however, it was right to employ francs-tireurs on land, why should not privateers be employed at sea? If we could not touch an enemy's goods on board a neutral ship, any war in which we might be involved would be much more protracted. There was a maxim "the command of the sea gives the command of the land," and we could not afford to throw away our chances, for recent events in France offered us a warning. The fratricidal conflicts which had just happened were the fruit of socialistic doctrines, and the International Society was said to have its head-quarters in this country, where, according to a statement in the leading journal, it had 95,000 adherents. Last year, moreover, the Prime Minister received a deputation from Messrs. Odger and Co., who represented the Communists; and on the Treasury bench in the House of Commons sat one who seven years ago was the intimate friend and trusted correspondent of the arch-conspirator of Europe, Joseph Mazzini. We trusted too much to our insular position; but he feared we were sowing the wind, and that unless we withheld our hand in time we should reap the whirlwind. Since England had first embarked in and sanctioned unjustifiable aggressions she had apparently lost her sense of justice and had been struck with judicial blindness. Like a Samson shorn of his strength and blinded at the hands of the Philistines, she made weak concessions, and could only utter protests, which were generally disregarded. England could rehabilitate herself, and by a stroke of the pen could recover her maritime supremacy; but until by her conduct she earned the blessing of the Almighty she could not utter the Scotch motto—“Nemo me impune læssit.” The noble Earl then quoted the following passage from Vattel as to the nullity of treaties pernicious to the State:—

“Though a simple injury or some disadvantage in a treaty be not sufficient to invalidate it, the case is not the same with those inconveniences that would lead to the ruin of the nation. Since in the formation of every treaty the contracting parties must be vested with sufficient powers for the purpose, a treaty pernicious to the State is null and not at all obligatory, as no conductor of a nation has the power to enter into engagements to do such things as are capable of destroying the State, for whose safety the Government is intrusted to him. The nation itself being necessarily obliged to perform everything for its preservation and safety, cannot enter into engagements contrary to its indispensable obligations.”

He would conclude by putting his Question, Whether the Declaration of Paris had ever been ratified by the Queen in Council?

EARL COWPER replied, on behalf of the Government, that the Declaration had never been ratified by Her Majesty in Council, but that they did not on that account consider themselves at liberty to repudiate it. The question of the treatment of neutrals had often been debated in Parliament, particularly 15 years ago, when this Declaration was signed, and it had been received generally with favour by their Lordships; and therefore he conceived it was not necessary for him to argue the matter further than to express his conviction that the Declaration had a tendency to mitigate the evils necessarily arising from war. It had been shown that during the 150 years prior to the French Revolution, 34 agreements were entered into between this country and other Powers, in all but three of which it was provided that free ships should make free goods.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he did not regard the Declaration as a document of as sacred a character as a ratified treaty. Sir George Lewis admitted, during the discussions of 1856, that if we were at war with any of the parties to it, it would cease to be binding as regarded that belligerent; while the late Lord Derby went so far as to declare that England had cut off her right hand, and called it the Capitulation of Paris. At the same time, Lord Derby held that all the Powers which had subscribed to the Declaration, and had not since disavowed it, were morally bound by it; but that we had a right to disavow it if our Government thought fit to do so. With regard to privateering, it was impossible to believe that if we were at war with some maritime Power, and met with a disaster at sea, we should adhere to the Declaration, instead of making use of those private means which we possessed above all other countries. Queen Elizabeth repelled the Armada almost entirely by private ships, which we now called privateers; and to speak of the Declaration as irrevocable was to lock up all the weapons of self-preservation which some contingency might render necessary. He did not recommend the Government to disavow the Treaty; but he wished to repeat the opinion he expressed at the time that it would have been better had it never been made, and principally because he believed that in time of war it would be impossible to maintain it. His lamented Friend Lord Clarendon, in his able defence of the Treaty, principally relied on the contrast between what took place at sea and what actually occurred on land. Lord Clarendon said the great object of modern civilization was to mitigate the horrors of war and extend and define the rights of neutrals; but that this had not been with respect to war by sea as it had been with respect to war by land, where the property of neutrals, and even of peaceful subjects of the enemy, was respected. Now, the late war had proved that his lamented Friend was too sanguine in his views as to the progress of civilization, for in the recent war—14 years after the Declaration—the Germans did not respect private property on land—they made monstrous requisitions on private property, and in many cases there were cruel instances of pillage of private property. Lord Clarendon was under the delusion that these things would not happen, and that belligerents at sea could be placed on the same civilized footing as those on land; but these were all vain dreams. War would always be war, and bring with it all its horrors. It was all very well in fine weather and in time of peace to fancy that we could carry on war, as had been said, with rose water; but depend upon it, when the terrible pressure came, the sword would cut into shreds paper which had been signed during any peace. The vanity of the expectations that were entertained in 1856 was further evidenced by subsequent events—especially that admirable proposition that no war should begin without a previous attempt to mediate. This had proved an entire dead letter in the Danish War, the Italian War—when he himself pressed it on the belligerents—the Prusso-Austrian War, and the War of 1870—though in the last case the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) did his best to take advantage of that Protocol. Such Protocols or Declarations, in his opinion, did more harm than good, for they were only meant as lovers' promises, made to be broken. If we were at war with any great nation, the force of circumstances alone would oblige us to abandon the Declaration of Paris and resume the position we formerly held.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the noble Earl who had just sat down had referred to two considerable authorities in support of the Petitions—Sir George Lewis and the Earl of Clarendon. But he (Earl Granville) thought that Sir George Lewis's opinion—that if we were at war with one of the parties to the Declaration it would no longer be binding as between that belligerent and ourselves—confirmed rather than weakened the sanctity attributed to it by his noble Friend (Earl Cowper), for this was exactly what happened with the most formal treaties ratified in the most solemn manner. The late Lord Derby, moreover, deemed that the Powers which had signed the Declaration, and had not disavowed it—as none of them had done—were bound in honour to observe it. But then the noble Earl (the Earl of Malmesbury) proceeded to make a statement which he could not but think—considering that the noble Earl was an ex-Secretary of State—was not a very judicious one. The noble Earl commenced by saying that he discounted what had been suggested by the noble Earl who introduced the subject, and what had been alluded to in “another place”—namely, that the Declaration ought never to have been entered into; that it would prove impracticable to maintain it in time of war; and that those nations who had signed it ought to withdraw from it.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, the noble Earl had misunderstood him. He said he did not wish that this country should repudiate it now.

EARL GRANVILLE: But his noble Friend went on to enunciate what he considered the extraordinary doctrine that whenever we found it inconvenient to ourselves we should dispense with those honourable engagements into which we had entered. He entirely agreed that it would not be advisable, on our part, to repudiate it at the present moment; and at the Black Sea Conference he did not see what possible argument he could have brought forward for doing it. It was necessarily connected with three other propositions, and since 1856 no objection had been taken in the House of Commons to the doctrines there laid down. It might, no doubt, do harm to an enemy to seize his goods in a neutral bottom; but in the long run we did ourselves infinitely more harm and him good, by enlisting the feeling of the neutral in favour of the enemy. In the late war France made little use of her Navy—which, indeed, he believed, was not in a very efficient state—but she had the command of the sea, and but for this Declaration she would have been entitled to search our enormous Mercantile Marine in order to discover the enemy's goods. Now, he believed that would have made our neutrality perfectly impossible. It would have created an irritation in this country, and, rightly or wrongly, we should have resented it to the greatest degree. With our enormous military marine, moreover, we had the power of instituting an effective blockade, to which the right of blockade was specially confined. Without, however, arguing questions already settled, he would simply protest against the doctrine that we were at liberty, though we ourselves had been protesting against similar conduct, to say that whenever an international declaration by which we were bound in honour was inconvenient we could immediately withdraw from it.

LORD COLCHESTER said, he could not but think that the noble Earl (the Earl of Denbigh) had done good service to the country in bringing this question again into notice. He was as unwilling as anyone to propose the repudiation of treaties; but we had of late years seen that the most solemn international arrangements were not very long-lived, and that treaties regulating the most important concerns of Europe were in a few years set aside and disappeared. He was somewhat surprised when the noble Earl opposite (Earl Cowper) referred to the long series of treaties by which the right under discussion had been waived in former times. In all these treaties, with scarcely an exception, if we abandoned the principle of seizing enemies' goods in neutral ships, we claimed in return that of seizing neutral goods in enemies' ships—a very different thing from the unconditional surrender of our right at the Treaty of Paris. Usually any concession to which two Powers agreed as to the limitation of their rights in time of war, put each, at least as belligerents, on the same footing as his enemy. But here our obligation was to the neutral, not the belligerent. If he rightly understood the case, under the present law, if we were at war with America, who had not been a party to the Declaration, America could seize our goods in French or Russian bottoms, while we, bound by this Treaty, could not seize American property in the vessels of any nation which was a party to the Treaty. As to the argument drawn from irritation created in the mind of neutrals, much irritation was often created by the exercise of the right of blockade; but few persons considered, though it had been put forward in theory, that the right of blockade ought to be modified or abolished. But it was not only in the interest of England that that Treaty was open to exception. Mr. John Stuart Mill—certainly not a man wedded to ancient laws or opinions—stated a few years ago his opinion that it was most objectionable in the general interest of the freedom of the world. He saw that it was a measure weakening the force of naval Powers—a force seldom formidable to national independence—and thereby strengthening military Powers, whose force was often extremely formidable to the rights of others. We resisted the power of Napoleon I., because when he was all-powerful by land we were so at sea; when he was master of Europe we drove all French commerce from the ocean. But now, in a struggle with a military despot we should, fettered by that Declaration, possess no such advantage as in former times. He feared that under present circumstances England could not shake off the encumbrance of that obligation; but he trusted that if international treaties were once more to be modified—if other Powers desired to be relieved from any “of the treaty obligations binding on them,” we might endeavour to obtain a modification of an agreement, injurious, he thought, to the power of England, and injurious also to the highest interests of the world.

Lord Colchester

Petitions read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

HOUSE OF LORDS APPELLATE JURISDICTION BILL—(No. 147.)

(The Lord Westbury.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD WESTBURY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that the object was to put certain restrictions upon the right of appeal to their Lordships' House. The grounds on which he asked their Lordships to accede to the Motion were, first, to preserve the dignity of the House as a Court of Appeal, and, secondly, to repress unnecessary and vexatious litigation, and for the first purpose it proposed to take away the right in cases where the money sought to be recovered was of inconsiderable value, and for the second cases where the judgment of a Court of First Instance has been affirmed by the immediate Court of Appeal. Their Lordships would perhaps be surprised to hear that during the last four years the number of appeals from the Scotch Courts exceeded those from the Courts of England and Ireland together. Now Scotland was comparatively a poor country, with a population of only about one-tenth that of England and Ireland—showing that they must be eminently a litigious people, although they had the reputation of being a canny one. The number of appeals from the Scotch Courts during the period he referred to had been 119, whilst those from England and Ireland together were only 118. Of these 119 appeals would be found litigation of the most trifling, frivolous, and vexatious description—their Lordships were frequently called upon to decide appeals which related to matters of not greater importance than those which were daily decided by our County Courts. The annoyance of having to hear such cases had called forth repeated expressions of dissatisfaction from their Lordships—a feeling which was experienced by himself in an intensified degree, for it was monstrous to reflect that while there were about 400 cases of great magnitude for hearing before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the time of the Law Lords—the most important Judges of that Court—should be occupied by some trumpery litigation. He would give their Lordships one or two illustrations. In one case the matter in dispute was originally of the value of 5*s.*, but it was carried through the whole range of the Scotch Courts, and finally came before their Lordships, the last appeal, involving a cost of between £700 and £800. In another case the owner of a sheep sought compensation from the owner of a dog for injury caused to his sheep by the latter. The owner of the dog contended that the dog was sufficiently harmless and inoffensive, and that the sheep must have been at fault. The case was submitted in turn to the Sheriff's Substitute, to the Sheriff's Deputy, and Lord Ordinary, and ultimately came to their Lordships' House, where the litigants must have expended at least £800 over a sheep whose carcass could have been purchased for 40*s.* The next case in the Reports to which he referred was of a similar character. Its original value was only £80, yet it had been carried through every Court, and finally brought up to waste their Lordships' time. It really was a lamentable thing that such enormous expenses should be incurred in reference to such a matter. Such things as these would excite their indignation but for the fact that they occurred day by day. In a case where the cause of action was almost equally trifling, his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack had thus expressed himself—

"My Lords, that your Lordships' time should have been occupied, to the great detriment of other suitors, with such a case as the present is, perhaps, one of the least grievances of a litigation which has been going on now for about seven years and a-half. I can, therefore, my Lords, only say, that this lady is greatly to be pitied for the course into which she has been dragged, evidently without any consciousness on her part of the extreme folly of these proceedings. We can do nothing else than reverse the decision which has been come to by the Inner Division of the Court of Session."

In another case the property contested was not worth more than 5*s.* intrinsically. The matter was argued at great length, and was productive of infinite expense and misery before a determination of the suit was arrived at. He appealed to his noble and learned Friends in the House whether these cases were not a fair specimen of a great portion of the litigation which came before them? Surely, then, it was right that their Lordships should come to the rescue of their own tribunal, and emancipate it from being concerned in the determination of such trifling matters. Their Lordships' time was of infinite value in determining the most important appeals from the most distant portions of the Empire, and far too valuable to be wasted on trifling appeals from Scotland. At all events, some relation ought to be preserved between the value of the property in dispute and the expenses of the appeal. Appeals in the Court of Equity were limited to any time within two years; but upon Writs of Error they allowed appeals for an indefinite term—for he knew of no limitation except that imposed by the Statute of William III. In cases where two years were allowed, to say whether there should be an appeal, two years more would probably elapse before it was decided, so that all that length of time would be allowed for the incurring of expense and for the growth of the worst feelings which were excited by litigation. The fees of their Lordships' House, he was happy to say, were very moderate; but the expenses incurred in litigation outside the House were necessarily very considerable. There must be first a petition, then the case must be prepared for their Lordships' House, and large fees to counsel were usually given. The case must be printed, and a certain number of copies furnished—a proceeding which in itself seldom cost less than £100. Then there was the preparation of the appeal, the fees to counsel, and the charges for the attendance of solicitors. He thought that if they had a tribunal, an appeal to which involved charges such as these, such an appeal should be reserved for cases of the greatest importance; and this would have the indirect effect of preventing a losing party to a suit revenging himself upon his adversary by carrying his case to the last Court of Appeal. Upon these grounds he thought that their Lordships would agree with him that some limit should be placed upon appeals, the effect of doing which would be to relieve their Lordships from a considerable part of their present duties, and would enable them to spare from time to time one of the Law Lords to assist the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the decision of important points of law. He therefore proposed that it shall not be lawful to appeal to the House of Lords from the judgment of any Court of Law or Equity in England, Scotland, and Ireland, in cases where the property claimed or the title to be decided does not exceed the sum of £1,000. There were exemptions to this enactment, the propriety of which would be obvious—namely, when the judgment is in a suit brought to try a title to any real estate, or incorporeal hereditament, of greater principal value than £1,000; when the Judge certifies that some important question of law is involved; cases of divorce and judicial separation, and cases of legitimacy. He proposed further that where a judgment of the Court of Common Law has been affirmed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, or of the Courts of Equity, by the Court of Appeal in Chancery, or of the Courts of the First Instance in Ireland or Scotland by the proper Courts of Appeal, there shall be no further appeal to the House of Lords, except in cases where the Court which had determined the appeal from the Court below should give leave for a further appeal. He thought that these restrictions would prevent a great number of idle and useless appeals from coming before them; and they would also impose some restriction upon rich men who might desire to carry their causes to a variety of tribunals, the expense of which might be a mere nothing to them, but ruin to their opponents. It had been said by someone that law was a luxury—and a luxury it undoubtedly was if one had to pay for it the large sums he had mentioned—but as a luxury it should be restrained by sumptuary laws, by laws judiciously founded on considerations of the public good and general expedience. He should observe that the whole language of the Bill applied only to civil cases. It would be desirable to define what was meant in the Bill by the word “affirm,” because whilst a decision might be affirmed in substance, there might be some alteration of the language or some added condition. He would insert some words to prevent ambiguity arising upon this head. If their Lordships should think that this was a matter of too much importance to be committed to the discretion of a private Member, he should be content if their Lordships would give the Bill a second reading, with a view to a careful consideration of the whole subject, so that whatever legislation might be found expedient might be proceeded with next Session.

Moved. “That the Bill be now read 2^d.”
—(The Lord Westbury.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, his noble and learned Friend needed no apology for bringing this subject forward, as the evil sought to be remedied by the Bill had undoubtedly become extremely great. He was afraid, moreover, that it was not the only evil connected with their Lordships’ jurisdiction—other important remedies ought to be applied to grievances with reference to the hearing of appeals, and, therefore, he was glad that his noble and learned Friend had brought forward this Bill rather as a subject of discussion than with a view of passing it during the present Session. It was certainly desirable that professional and general opinion should be brought to bear on the subject. For his own part he thought there could be no reasonable objection to that portion of the measure which related to the limit of amount—indeed, his noble and learned Friend had scarcely stated the case with so much fullness as he might have done, being, no doubt, desirous not to protract the discussion. On three consecutive occasions—unless he was much mistaken—the House was occupied with three appeals from Scotland of the most trifling character—one being that to which his noble and learned Friend had referred, and was founded on the singular grievance that a man had, as alleged by the appellant, one sale on his premises and no more; another being a dispute about a few perches of land of no particular value in an agricultural district; and a third, which, though it related to a legacy of £600, was so protracted in consequence of the mass of evidence adduced as to the state of the testator’s mind, and which filled two enormously thick volumes, that the cost must have amounted at least to £1,400 or £1,500. It would, in his judgment, contribute to the welfare of all suitors if a reasonable limit of amount were imposed in regard to carrying cases to the Court of ultimate Appeal. In a country like this, where legal tribunals were so numerous, a Court of ultimate Appeal was necessary in order that the law might be made fixed and certain; but owing to a variety of causes, into which he need not now enter, the present machine was far too cumbrous and expensive to discharge the ordinary duties of determining from time to time the conflicts that arose between private parties where no great questions of right were in dispute, or points of law which it was necessary to settle for the benefit of the general community. He might remark, in passing, that in County Court and Bankruptcy cases, as well as those under the Winding-up Acts, there was a limit on appeals in regard both to amount and time. This was justifiable on principle; and it would be desirable to apply similar regulations to appeals to the House of Lords. In regard to the second part of the Bill, however, he did not entertain so favourable an opinion. If an intermediate appeal were allowed at all, he doubted whether it would be expedient to say that when a Court of Appeal had affirmed the decision of the Court of First Instance there should be no further appeal except with the leave of the Court which last determined the case. He thought this would give rise to inconvenience where the Courts below had differed in their judgments, or where the Judges of the intermediate Court had differed among themselves. There were no less than three tribunals at common law which might take different views of a subject, and in Chancery there might be appeals from one Judge to another single Judge; and satisfaction would not be obtained unless there was the right to a still further appeal. There were instances of the decision of the Court below, although confirmed by the intermediate Court of Appeal, being over-ruled by the House of Lords, and the Judges had afterwards, moreover, acquiesced in the soundness of their Lordships' decision. Then it was worthy of consideration whether the time for appealing ought not to be abridged, and also whether a suitor in the House of Lords ought to be allowed to conduct his own case. Much time was usually wasted by suitors who pleaded their own cases, and great injury was done to themselves. Such persons took a prejudiced and sanguine view of their own cases, and were often induced to come to their Lordships' House, although they would probably refrain from doing so if they obtained the advice of an intelligent solicitor. One gentleman, the author of several able novels, successfully pleaded his own cause; but with this solitary exception he could not remember a single case of a suitor who pleaded for himself gaining the victory. Their Lordships sitting as a Court of ultimate Appeal, had a right to be assisted by counsel, and to have the cases brought before them argued in the best possible manner. In the last place—and it was a matter of the very highest importance—an appeal to the highest Court should be as much as possible confined to matters of law, just as an appeal to a superior Court of Common Law was when the facts of the case had been decided by a jury. Even on the Motion for a new trial, the facts were dealt with only as they bore upon the question whether there ought to be a new trial or not. Means could be devised by which the facts could be separated from the law and decided by the Court below, and the highest Court left to adjudicate on the law alone. While he was glad that the noble and learned Lord did not mean to press the Bill this Session, he certainly approved cordially the principle of the first part of it.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he was glad there was nothing in the appeal business of the House of Lords which rendered the passing of this Bill an urgent matter, for the House had now entered upon the causes which had been set down this year, and it was possible that the list might be disposed of before the House rose for the Recess. He admitted that it was important to prevent, if possible, frivolous and vexatious appeals, not only for the sake of maintaining the dignity of the House, but also to save litigants themselves from ruinous expenses. He entertained a doubt, however, whether the best way of preventing these appeals was to fix a pecuniary limit, below which it should not be competent to appeal. At all events, if such a principle were adopted, great care must be taken not to fix the sum too high; because, while £1,000 or £500 might be an insignificant sum to one person, the principle involved might be important to another, and the Courts might have decided against him upon a question of law upon which probably there might be a divergence of opinion in the profession. In such a case it might be wrong to deny the opportunity of an appeal by fixing an unchangeable pecuniary limit. It was also important to take care that cases of great importance were not prevented reaching the House; and by way of illustration he would instance an insurance case, in which an action was brought upon a policy against an underwriter, who was only one of several responsible for the total amount insured, the aggregate of which might be several thousand pounds. Before 1747 a person appealing to this House was bound to find proper security; but in that year the requirement was abolished by Order, and a person was able to appeal upon entering into his own recognizances. It seemed to be the object of that rule not to check appeals, but to facilitate them by increasing the opportunities for entering them.

LORD WESTBURY said, that security might be taken for costs.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, only the security of the appellant himself, which might be of no value; but he only mentioned the matter as one for further consideration. As to preventing an appeal to this House in a case in which the judgment of an inferior Court had been already affirmed by a Court of Appeal, the Court of Exchequer Chamber was a Court of Appeal from the superior Courts, and it often happened there that judgments were affirmed by slender majorities—sometimes by a majority of one; and was it to be supposed that in such a case an appeal to this House was to be impossible? The other day there was an appeal to that Court from the Court of Queen's Bench; it was an action by a shipowner against the consignee of certain goods; there were three claims—for demurrage, freight, and detention. The Court of Queen's Bench decided in favour of the first claim, and against the second and the third. The Judges of the Exchequer Chamber were divided upon each of the three claims. In such a case as a divergence of the judgments between two such Courts, an appeal to this House ought not to be denied. The

Lord Chelmsford

Scotch Courts seemed to have been the corpus vile for which the experiment was to be made; and in the Scotch Courts there were frequently similar differences of opinion. Perhaps it would be right to say that where the judgment of the Court below was unanimously approved by the judgment of the Court of Appeal, there should be no further appeal to this House.

LORD COLONSAY said, that while the protection of life and property and the redress of wrongs was the great end and purpose not only of Courts of Law, but of civil government, it was right to limit the range and cost of litigation, regard being had to the nature or value of the matter in dispute. The reasons that had been assigned for such limitation were sound, and the sum to be fixed upon was a matter of detail. The Scotch were familiar with the principle, which was applied to limit appeals from their County Courts, and the limitation had given such general satisfaction that it had been proposed to extend it, and a Commission had endorsed the recommendation. But part of the proposal in this Bill was so doubtful and hazardous that more time ought to be afforded for consideration; at present there were great doubts as to its expediency. That the number of appeals from Scotland was so large had been remarked upon as singular, considering the thrifty and patient character of the people of that country; but he thought this was explained by another trait in their character—namely, that while they were not more given to commence litigation than the people of England, yet when they engaged in a conflict of any kind whatever, they would not yield so long as they thought there was the slightest chance of success.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly.

VACCINATION.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

LORD BUCKHURST, in moving for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the present state of the law as regards Vaccination, said, that the Return which had recently been presented to Parliament showed a very unsatisfactory state of things, inasmuch as the number of children vaccinated was not nearly so large as the number of births. Certain persons, he was aware, objected to vaccination, but they were so few that the Return could hardly be influenced by them, for he believed that the good sense of the public generally would overcome their opposition. He attributed the discrepancy between the number of children born to those vaccinated to the absence of a proper number of public vaccinators; to the fact that in large parishes there were not sufficient vaccinating stations; and to private medical practitioners not being compelled to send to the registrar a return of the children whom they vaccinated. Amendment was required in these matters, and he was of opinion that many children were un-vaccinated not so much from prejudice on the part of parents, as owing to the want of opportunity.

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the present state of the law as regards Vaccination, with reference to the causes which operate in preventing the carrying out an efficient system of Vaccination."—(The Lord Buckhurst.)

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, he did not wonder at the noble Lord having turned his attention to this subject, considering that the Metropolis was now suffering so much from that great scourge, small-pox; but he ventured to suggest to him that it would not be desirable to undertake at the present period of the Session the inquiry by a Select Committee which he had proposed. Questions connected with that subject had been inquired into by a Select Committee of the other House, whose Report, he believed, had been published, although the evidence it had taken had not yet been made public. Upon that Report a Bill had been founded and introduced into the other House by the Vice President of the Privy Council, and that Bill, he trusted, would, in due course, come up to their Lordships. The Bill dealt, at all events, with one of the questions on which the noble Lord had touched—namely, that of securing throughout the country the appointment of inspectors of vaccination, who should ascertain the manner in which the law was carried out. At present, Boards of Guardians had the option of appointing or not appointing such officers, and in very many cases the due appointment of them had been neglected. The Bill to which he had referred would meet that state of things by making obligatory that which was now voluntary. No doubt it was desirable and necessary that an adequate number of public vaccinators should exist throughout the country, and that every facility should be afforded for vaccination by establishing a sufficient number of vaccinating stations; subject, however, to this consideration, that it was not always possible to secure a proper supply of really good vaccinating matter for a very large number of stations. For efficient vaccination they must have good vaccinating matter, obtained from healthy children; and they could not insure the quality of the vaccinating matter employed if they had too many stations. Consequently the number of the stations had to be governed by a double consideration—namely, the amount of population and the possibility of securing a supply of good matter. The object of the Privy Council was to see vaccination carried out in the most efficient manner, and it was their earnest desire that the utmost facility, consistently with insuring a supply of good matter, should be given to the public for having their children vaccinated. He would suggest to the noble Lord that he should postpone his Motion until the Bill on that subject came up from the other House, when their Lordships could fully discuss the question; and then, if the measure did not appear to the noble Lord satisfactorily to meet the case, it would be open to him to propose any Amendments in it which he thought necessary. That would be a better course for securing early legislation on that subject than the proposal of a second Inquiry by a second Committee at that period of the Session; and as he and the noble Lord had exactly the same objects in view he trusted that the Motion would not be pressed.

LORD BUCKHURST said, that after the explanation just given, he had no hesitation in withdrawing his Motion.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock,
'till To-morrow, half past
Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 19th June, 1871.

MINUTES. — SELECT COMMITTEE — Diplomatic and Consular Services, Mr. Strutt advised.

Twenty-seventh Report—Public Petitions.

SUPPLY — considered in Committee — Resolutions [June 16] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS — First Reading — Pharmacy * [206].

Second Reading—Public Health (Scotland) Supplemental * [189]; Glasgow Boundary * [193]; Sasines Register (Scotland) * [199]; Brixton Prison * [177]; Chain Cables and Anchors * [201].

Second Reading—Referred to Select Committee—Dean Forest and Hundred of St. Briavels * [190].

Committee — Report — Army Regulation [30]; Local Government Supplemental (No. 4) * [187]; Sewage Utilisation Supplemental * [186]; Education (Scotland) * [17-295]; Kingholm District Boundary * [185]; Canada * [192]; Ecclesiastical Dilapidations (re-comm.) * [202].

Considered as amended — House of Commons (Witnesses) * [156]; Metropolitan Board of Works (Loans) * [149].

Third Reading—Life Assurance Companies Act (1870) Amendment * [183], and passed.

Withdrawn—Merchant Shipping * [15].

SUNDAY TRADING—THE ACT
92 CHARLES II., c. 7.—QUESTIONS.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, considering the use that is being made of the Act 29 Charles 2, c. 7, and the difficulty in the present state of Public Business of getting an opportunity for a fair discussion of the subject, the Government will bring in a Bill to suspend for one year the operation of the said Act?

MR. BAINES asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the suspension of the Act 29 Charles 2, c. 7, without any other Law being substituted for it, will not take away the legal protection which labour now enjoys for a weekly day of rest, as well as the legal recognition of the Lord's Day for the purposes of religious worship?

MR. DIMSDALE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will undertake, early in the next Session of Parliament, to introduce a Bill for the regulation and modification of Sunday trading?

MR. BRUCE: I think, Sir, that the interpretation put on the statute by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds is the correct one—that the only legal recognition of the right of abstinence from work on Sundays rests upon the Act of Charles II. Considering the very divided opinion of the country on this question, I certainly am not prepared to introduce a Bill to suspend the operation of this Act, as I believe that such a proceeding would be objectionable in itself, and would not receive the support of the House. With respect to the other Question, I have repeatedly supported in this House anything that appeared to me to have for its object a reasonable modification of the existing law. Last year a Bill came down which I think had passed without a division from the House of Lords, and I gave it my support in this House. It had been objected to previous Bills on this subject that inasmuch as the mischief complained of existed only in London the Bill should apply only to the Metropolis, and the last Bill was altered accordingly. It was then objected that a Bill of such importance ought not to have reference to the Metropolis only, but ought to deal with the whole of the country, and the measure was rejected by this House. I quite admit the imperfections of the present Act—that there are portions of it that are not enforceable, and I regret exceedingly the manner in which certain over-zealous persons are enforcing it. A complete remedy is a matter of extreme difficulty, and I am bound to say that I am not at this moment prepared to suggest any remedy that I think would meet with the acceptance of the House. All I can say is that this question does deserve the attention of Government and of Parliament; but I cannot undertake to give a positive assurance that I will introduce a Bill on the subject next Session.

CHINA—COOLIE EMIGRATION—CASE OF THE COOLIE KWOK-A-SING.

QUESTION.

SIR JAMES LAWRENCE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If his attention has been called to a statement in the "China Mail," that evidence had been given before the Chief Justice of Hong Kong, of Chinese having been kidnapped and shipped at Macao to be sent to Peru as slaves, and that a kidnapped coolie named Kwok-a-Sing had with others risen against and killed the captain of a French vessel who was about to enslave him; and, having escaped to Hong Kong, his rendition had been demanded by the Viceroy of Canton, which the Chief Justice after hearing the evidence refused, and ordered the release of the man from custody, saying that he had committed no offence against the Laws of England; and, whether, notwithstanding this decision, Kwok-a-Sing had been again arrested upon a warrant issued by the Governor of Hong Kong?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: Sir, the hon. Gentleman has called attention to a subject of considerable importance. It involves a legal question which I am not competent to solve; but I will state to the House the bare facts of the case. In January last a Chinese coolie was arrested at Hong Kong, charged with piracy and murder committed on board a French vessel, La Nouvelle Penelope. This vessel had been employed in what is called the Coolie Immigration Service, and had on board several hundred coolies, shipped at the Chinese port of Macao, of whom it was alleged about 100 had been kidnapped. It was not pretended that the prisoner was kidnapped—for, in fact, he pleaded an alibi—but was recognized as one of the ringleaders of the party which overpowered the crew of the vessel and murdered the captain and eight seamen. The Chief Justice of Hong Kong directed this man to be discharged upon a writ of Habeas Corpus, the main ground of his decision being that persons about to be made slaves had a right to recover their liberty if they could, and that in so doing he had committed no offence over which the Courts of Hong Kong had jurisdiction. The Governor, however, upon an information for piracy laid by the Attorney General under an Ordinance in force in the colony, ordered his re-arrest and committal for trial, and the Chief Justice again ordered his discharge. Under these circumstances, the Governor telegraphed home, the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown has been taken, and that opinion is to the effect that the crime charged against the prisoner is a crime against the Common Law of Nations, and that he was rightfully arrested, and should be brought to trial for the same.

CHINA—COOLIE EMIGRATION.

QUESTION.

SIR JAMES LAWRENCE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any steps have been taken by Her Majesty's Government to ascertain the correctness of the statement that large numbers of Chinese have been shipped against their will from the port of Macao, and treated as slaves, on board vessels bearing the French and Portuguese flags; and if any communications have been made to the French and Portuguese Governments upon this revival in the Pacific of the Slave Trade; and, if he will lay before the House any Correspondence that may have taken place upon the subject?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Reports have Sir, at different times reached Her Majesty's Government of irregular practices at Macao in regard to the collection and shipment of coolies, and they have brought the same under the notice of the Portuguese Government, who have taken steps through the Governor of Macao for their correction, by framing a code of regulations for the engagement and shipment of coolies, which, it is to be hoped, may prevent the repetition of such abuses. With respect to the French Government, no recent communications have passed on the subject of coolie emigration. With regard to the Correspondence referred to by the hon. Baronet, such portions of it shall be presented as will not involve any breach of official or international etiquette.

ARMY—NON-PURCHASE CORPS.

QUESTION.

MAJOR ARBUTHNOT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the sums annually voted to secure retirement and promotion in the Non-purchase Corps, and the amount of promotion thus obtained, do or do not afford a sufficient basis upon which to form an approximate estimate as to the cost which the Country will have to bear, after the abolition of purchase, in order to secure such a flow of promotion as is indispensable to efficiency; and, if not, whether the reason is that the sums voted for the Non-purchase Corps have been found wholly inadequate to secure an amount of promotion at all equal to that which was obtained in Purchase Regiments?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, this is a question inviting an expression of opinion, not a statement of some fact of which the questioner is ignorant. The general opinion, I believe, and certainly my own, is that it will not be safe to argue from the scientific corps to the probable current of promotion in Line regiments.

ARMY—ROYAL MILITARY ACADEMY, WOOLWICH.—QUESTION.

MAJOR CARTWRIGHT asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will state the reason why Candidates for admission to the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, numbering about 150, are for the first time to be sent down to undergo their medical examination at Woolwich on Monday July 3rd, instead of as heretofore being medically examined at Burlington House, where their general examination will be conducted on the nine subsequent days; and, whether it would not be more convenient for the Medical Officers to attend at Burlington House for this purpose, than that the 150 Candidates should be sent down to Woolwich?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the arrangement was made by the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief on the suggestion of Sir Lintorn Simmons, concurred in by the Director General of the Army Medical Department, and the Director General of Military Education.

SCOTLAND—QUEEN'S PLATES.
QUESTION.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Supplementary Estimate of the sum necessary to provide for the Queen's Plates that were annually until last year voted for Scotland, seeing that this House has on a Division, by a considerable majority, voted the sum of £1,562 for Queen's Plates in Ireland?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the Government have not formed any intention of laying a Supplementary Estimate on the Table for Queen's Plates for Scotland, in consequence of the Vote recently taken for Queen's Plates for Ireland. The Vote for Queen's Plates for Scotland was proposed regularly by the Government to the House, but was withdrawn upon the suggestion of a number of Scotch Members in the presence of a number of other Scotch Members, the whole of them apparently desiring that it should be done. Nor was there any condition made that the same course should be taken with respect to Ireland. Under these circumstances, it would be premature to say that the Government have come to any such conclusion as the hon. Baronet suggests. The matter, I think, is one in which the House would be inclined to show a deference to the prevailing feeling of Scotch Members if there be a prevailing feeling on the subject.

MR. ROBERTSON begged to give Notice that he would on an early day move a Resolution that the Queen's Plates taken away from Scotland should be restored and continued as long as Queen's Plates were given for England and Ireland.

CONVENTUAL AND MONASTIC INSTITUTIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE wished to ask the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone, with reference to the proposal which he made the other day to discharge his hon. and learned Friend from further attendance on the Committee on Conventual and Monastic Institutions, Whether he had ever consented to serve on the Committee this Session; and, secondly, whether he (Mr. Newdegate) had not the full consent of his hon. and learned Friend for moving for the removal of his name from the List of the Committee?

MR. T. CHAMBERS replied, in the first place, that he had not consented to serve on the re-appointed Committee, and he had told his right hon. Friend the Chairman of the Committee so; and, secondly, his hon. Friend (Mr. Newdegate) had had his full authority to move that his name be taken off the List. In point of fact, it was impossible for him to attend.

IRELAND—ROBBERY OF MILITIA ARMS AT MALLOW.—QUESTION.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, a paragraph had appeared in the leading journal that morning, stating that the Militia barracks at Mallow had been attacked by Fenians, and a large quantity of arms taken away. He wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether any information has reached the Government on the subject?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have received, Sir, from the Lord Lieutenant copies of the telegraphic despatches forwarded to him on the matter to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman has referred. It appears that the Militia storehouse at Mallow was broken into, and 100 stand of arms taken, out of which more than 60 were recovered. It is stated that the persons who entered the storehouse were pursued, and some shots fired. I believe that one prisoner was taken. The telegram I have received states that the Militia are in no way implicated in the matter.

ARMY REGULATION BILL—[BILL 39.]

(Mr. Secretary Cardwell, Sir Henry Knight Storks, Captain Vivian, The Judge Advocate.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 15th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. W. M. TORRENS rose to move the addition of the clause regarding enlistment, which stood upon the Notice Paper in his name. He wished the House to declare by statute—

“That no person hereafter enlisted as a soldier in any regiment of cavalry or infantry of the Line shall be called upon to serve Her Majesty out of the United Kingdom until he shall have attained the age of twenty years.”

He should have preferred moving the insertion of these words as an addition to the 6th clause of the Bill, which, from the outset, had engaged the attention of every thoughtful man, because it was the only one of the 36 clauses proposed by the Government which had relation to the great body of the Army. Questions concerning the rights and wrongs of the officers had engaged the attention of the House in the first instance. Naturally so; for the officers had been truly said to be the heart and spirit of the Army. But when these had had full consideration, it was only reasonable that some thought should be taken deliberately and seriously for the condition, capacity, and character of the rank and file. The 6th clause, however, having been withdrawn, nothing remained for him but to raise the question in the manner he now proposed. He would, in the spirit of candid and earnest remonstrance, ask Ministers to consider the position in which they stood. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War developing the plans of the Government with respect to Army reform was not addressed to the House upon a Motion for leave to bring in a Bill, but when moving the Army Estimates, which exceeded those of last year by £2,800,000. The Ministerial project of military reorganization, as then expounded, was the consideration offered for this vast increase of national burdens. The Government had drawn upon their confidence, and the House had accepted the Bill. No division took place on the second reading. Modifications of detail were left open for discussion, as well as periods of payment, and the ways and means whence the funds should be drawn. All these questions had been debated, and nearly every point had been ruled in favour of the Government. The whole patronage of the Army was about to be transferred to them from the neutral trusteeship in a Commander-in-Chief established by Mr. Pitt, at the instance and with the sanction of Mr. Fox, and which had subsisted for well nigh 80 years. The property qualification for commissions was to be abolished without stipulation or condition of any kind, and the Government claimed that the whole power of selection should be henceforth placed at their disposal. The direction and control of the Militia, which in one shape or other had for centuries belonged to local authority—wisely, as Bacon, Pym, Somers, Walpole, Fox, and Russell thought—was henceforth to be concentrated in the hands of the Executive. The Government had not only made sure of the money immediately required, but they proposed to commit Parliament to an expenditure in future years of many millions. A material part of the consideration held forth to us for all this transfer of power and concession of supplies was the promise that we should have not only a better Army than we had now, but an Army so complete and so reliable that, not merely danger, but any misgiving as to danger from invasion should once and for ever be extinguished. The character of the Army was to be uplifted, the constitution of the Army was to be consolidated, and the complement of Regular troops was to be completed for a force of about 200,000 men. When Ministers offered to provide this great array, the House supposed they spoke of men. The House agreed to the price, but took for granted that the goods would be of standard weight, and the article up to sample. Would it be wise, decorous, or just, to seem to withhold any part of the consideration by tendering which the Government had obtained such unprecedented grants of power, patronage, and pay? Having made the transfer, it was their duty, as guardians of the property and lives of the people, to stipulate for something on their behalf; and, in his opinion, it would be a great and valuable consideration if they could say that the greatest blot on our military system, in a national point of view, was wiped out for ever, and that the lives of the youth of the nation should in future be safe from a system which had been branded with every term of obloquy and reprobation. He would consider the matter in a military point of view, a medical point of view, and in a social point of view. Some guarantee for a better system of enlistment; some security that the condition of the private soldier should be improved, was surely no unfitting stipulation for the House of Commons to make on behalf of the people. The question of recruiting, so far from being a subordinate or incidental portion of the general question, was, he contended, that which went to the very quick of Army reform. But Ministers having withdrawn their only enlistment clause, there remained no other course for Parliament to adopt than that which he respectfully submitted to the Committee — namely, the addition of a new clause, forbidding in future the sending of youths at an immature age to serve as soldiers abroad. The evils of our enlistment system confessedly were not new. In a letter of the Duke of Wellington, in 1811, to an honoured kinsman of his (Sir Henry Torrens), who then held the post of Military Secretary to the Commander-in-Chief, there were these words—"The Government have never taken a comprehensive view of the subject of recruiting." Those words, 60 years old, might have been repeated with truth every day since then. When they were obliged suddenly to send an Army to the Crimea the adequacy of our system of enlistment was put to the proof, and its failure did not depend upon the ipse dixit of a civilian like himself, for they had the opinions of the highest military authorities on the subject. Lord Hardinge, before the Sebastopol Committee in 1855, accounted for his inability as Commander-in-Chief to give more support to Lord Raglan in the Crimea, in terms not to be forgotten. He said—

Mr. W. M. Torrens

"Our peace establishment had been allowed to run so low that, after making the first effort, and sending out 25,000 men, we could do nothing more than forward young recruits. We made them pretty perfect in drill in a couple of months; but instead of sending out bone and muscle, they were, he might say, only gristle. When we came, in November and December, in the face of the winter, to send out these raw recruits, it was impossible to expect them to resist hard work and the inclemency of the weather so well as other and more seasoned men."

Lord Raglan, when informed by the Duke of Newcastle that he had 2,000 recruits ready to send to him, replied that—

"Those last sent were so young and unformed that they fell victims to disease, and were swept away like flies."

Sir De Lacy Evans, at the same time, wrote that the draughts sent to him were composed of men quite too young to bear the strain of the winter encampment and of the work of the trenches. Most of the distinguished men who held command in the Crimean struggle had passed away; but one remained whose jealousy for the honour of the country he had served so well, whose sympathy for the rank and file he had so often led in danger, and whose clear and calm discernment in all that related to military discipline had not been dimmed by years. Two days after the Notice of this Motion was given, Sir John Burgoyne wrote to him, saying—

"Your principle of preventing the employment of youths under 20 years of age on foreign service is both important and just."

He proceeded to point out the difficulty, which arose from the fact that inexperienced youths were more easily induced to enlist than men above 20 years, who knew the world, and who knew their own minds. But, far from shrinking from the difficulty, Sir John Burgoyne went on to show how it might be met successfully by letting enlistment be placed under a regulation that the recruit should not be called to serve abroad until he was 21—

"Each regiment should always have a battalion at home in which would be these youths in a state of progress with others older in the service. Such battalions would form valuable reserves from which to draught for the foreign."

Another friend of his, Sir Anthony Stransham, who had filled the post of Inspector General of Marines, had likewise favoured him with his judgment in this matter—

"I am clearly of opinion that the best article is always the cheapest. The boy soldier is not the useful article; 20 is the earliest age when the physique of the man is fully developed. Therefore, to obtain the most efficient article at the most economical cost, take the recruit at a more mature age, and so avoid the inevitable breakdown of the present race of recruits. It will be found better and cheaper to bid high for a sounder article. The prohibition of foreign service by boy-soldiers is of the first importance, and fixing the age at 20 is only a fair proposal."

He (Mr. Torrens) entirely concurred in the soundness of this opinion. He believed that parsimony in the choice of either men or munitions of war was a miserable and delusive economy. He believed that we lost shamefully a great deal of what we tried to save shabbily; and that even as a question of annual expenditure, it was bad financial policy to enlist weak boys instead of strong men. What would be thought of a Minister who came to Parliament with estimates framed for other items on the unworthy principle of trying to find the worst species of article, and defending its purchase because it was the lowest in price? Who would venture to justify the buying of sabres that would snap, and bayonets that would bend, merely because they were cheap? And the rule ought to be essentially the same against imperfect weapons and imperfect men. He had another letter from a distinguished general officer, Sir Charles Daubeney, with whom he had not the honour of being acquainted; and which, though addressed to a mutual friend, he had permission to read—

"I have had 30 consecutive years of regimental experience in all climates, hot, temperate, and cold, in quarters and in the field, and I am undoubtedly of opinion that no soldier is properly efficient until he is 20 years of age, and that he should not be taken away from his depot or training establishment until he has attained that age, and until he is fit to take his place in the ranks as a fighting soldier—that is to say, able to march 15 or 20 miles a-day, carrying, at the same time, the full equipment which every soldier must carry during a campaign, and fight a battle afterwards if necessary, and do this for weeks consecutively, in all weathers, roads or no roads, and frequently on short rations, without knocking up. Boys of 18 or 19 cannot do it. It is gross cruelty to require them to attempt it, and it is a fraud on the public to call them soldiers and lead the nation to believe that they have an efficient Army, when so large a portion of it is composed of youths hardly able to 'carry themselves for a 10 hours' march, much less able to go forth equipped as a soldier must be. . . . Such boys soon break down under the trial—they choke the hospitals, ruin their half-formed constitutions, and endanger the safety of an Army in the field not only by becoming non-effective at the precise moment when their services are most urgently wanted, but by hampering the resources of a general at a time when all his energies ought to be concentrated on some particular movement of the enemy. . . . It costs more to feed, carry and take care of one sick soldier than it does to maintain three healthy ones in the best possible fighting condition."

The late President of the College of Surgeons, Mr. Guthrie, who early in life had had great experience in the Peninsula, and who, as a writer on surgery, was of European fame, felt himself bound, in season and out of season, to press upon every Minister for War the hideous and hateful evils of premature enlistment. He failed to move the Department; and its neglect of his warnings and admonitions hurt him deeply. But he took a noble revenge. He never ceased to urge upon his pupils the duty of exposing the mischief and misery of that system, and of diffusing a knowledge of its danger and its shame. And there was now scarcely a man of character in the profession who would stand up and defend it. Professor Parkes, a member of the Medical Council of Education, who had had great experience in camp and hospital in India and the Crimea, in the latest edition of his well-known work on practical hygiene, thus speaks of the danger and loss of immature enlistment—"The age of 17 or 18 is too low. The youngest recruit should be 20 or 21." Dr. Parkes illustrated his views by appealing to the acknowledged fact that the process of ossification had not even begun to be completed at the age of 18. And that especially as regarded the ribs, spine, and limbs, the epiphyses were not united to the shaft of the bones till a much later period. These views were fully borne out by many other eminent medical authorities. Dr. Lyons, who reported to Government on the diseases of the Army in the Crimean camp, writes—

"The immature youths of 18 to 20 succumbed at once to the hardships of campaigning, or perished after operations performed for wounds. When examined after death the ends of the long bones of the legs and arms still showed the cartilaginous state incompletely knit."

Sir George Ballinghall, for many years Regius Professor of Surgery in Edinburgh, in a work of high authority laid down broadly the principle for which he was contending; and he might also cite the testimony of Dr. Beatson, of Netley, Dr. Muir, Inspector General of Hospitals at Calcutta, and Dr. Mouat, who had had great experience as a medical man in the barracks and the prisons of India to the same effect. In truth, he had sought in vain for any one dissentient of scientific or practical repute from the doctrine so many distinguished authorities had laid down. The Report of the Royal Commission in 1863, appointed to inquire into the health of the Army in India, of which Lord Derby was chairman, Sir Ranald Martin, Dr. Farr, Dr. Sutherland, and other eminent persons were members, recommended distinctly that no more recruits be sent to India, until they had completed their drill and had reached the age of 21. Eight years had come and gone since that advice was tendered to the Government, but it had not been taken. If we are asked to leave the matter to the War Department, we point to the fact and say, you have had the discretion and you have not used it; you have known the truth and you have not given heed to it. Official eyes you have had, but they seemed to see not; official ears you have had, but they seemed to hear not. What avails exposure or expostulation? Routine left to itself revolved on its own axis, and, obeying the law of its nature, moved round and round in the orbit of blunder. Three years later you had another Commission—that of Recruiting—presided over by another ex-Secretary of State. In their Report, which bore the signatures of Lord Dalhousie, the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), and many other persons of weight and character, the objections to early enlistment as stated by Sir James Gibson were embodied, and the means by which the ignorant and undiscerning were inveigled into entering a service for which they were physically unfit, was branded with reproach. The Report of 1866 stated that in 1844 the average of the rank and file under age was 25 per cent, and that in 1864 it was 22½ per cent; but, instead of continuing to mend our ways, we seem to have retrograded, and of late to be rapidly getting from bad to worse. A Return upon the Table showed that in the 54th Regiment the proportion was actually about 50 per cent, and if he was not inaccurately informed, he feared it would be found that other regiments now under orders for India, as regarded their component elements, were in no better plight. Was it not high time, then, for Parliament to interpose? Among the military maxims of Napoleon, the following was to be found:—"The first quality of a soldier is the ability to support fatigue and privation; physical courage is only the second." It might be said that this was the philosophy of Napoleon, but not his practice. Well, it was, indeed, true that in the period when too much triumph had made him dream that he had surmounted the ordinary liabilities of fortune, he did impress into his ranks youths who, when confronted with unlooked for resistance, proved wholly wanting; but the great things in his wonderful career were not accomplished by such means. It was with the Army which he had spent two whole years in organizing and training at Boulogne that he suddenly invaded South Germany and won Austerlitz. And when, after Moscow and Leipsic, he stood at bay against Confederate Europe in arms, an Empire, crown, and life all hung in the balance; and when a subservient Senate voted him for the campaign of 1814 280,000 men, M. Thiers describes in remarkable language his reluctance to call into the field the large proportion of these who were under age. He preferred to rely upon the military classes of 1811, 1812, and 1813, which had already furnished him such numerous contingents, at the risk of provoking an unpopularity he could ill afford, sooner than summon to the battle-field youths who were under age. Again, in 1815, on his return from Waterloo, he was urged to arm the youth of Paris. There was a graphic description by another French historian of his pacing alone the garden walks of the Elysée, and hearing the shouts of the populace, bidding him not despair, and offering to enlist in defence of the capital. But he refused, as we know, every suggestion of the kind. We had seen too recently what had come of the opposite course. Had anyone read the wise and courageous speech in the French Assembly of General Trochu without being convinced of the insensate folly of resorting to immature and undisciplined crowds in order to confront a drilled and adult Army. In Prussia it was a standing rule of her organization not to admit recruits under 20 years of age. The same rule obtained in Austria and Switzerland; and in Russia, where manhood was of tardier growth, the limit of admission was fixed at 21. Thus we had a concurrence of opinion and of practice which it would be idle to affect to disregard protecting the years of adolescence, and pointing out the duty which lay on us, as the supreme guardians of our people, not to permit them to be tempted or drawn into undertaking work to which they were unequal, and injuring rather than strengthening the defensive force of the country. Let them glance for a moment at the experience of the United States, and see what was done and what was thought of these things there. He had the work of Dr. Hammond, Surgeon General to the Army, which consisted of a number of Papers prepared by him for the Sanitary Commission of the Union. He says—"The recruit should be a full grown man, and not a boy. The most eligible age being from 20 to 25 years." In America, the Army was small in time of peace, but it was highly paid compared with ours. He had the opportunity recently of learning, from one who had served three years in the ranks, what the soldiers' condition and remuneration were. By law the age is not limited to 20 years; but in practice the great majority have arrived at the age of manhood before they are accepted as recruits. No difficulty is experienced in filling up vacancies in the ranks when they occurred; and why? Because the men were entitled to receive their pay without stoppages for the price of their food. Before the war the pay was at the rate of 12s. a-week. It was now nominally higher; but perhaps it might be taken as not really worth more, on account of the difference in the currency. The keep of the soldier cost the Government more, because the cost of living generally was higher than with us. But whatever it cost, the soldier had the pay earned without deductions upon that account, and hence it was that the service was not unpopular, and that even in a country where wages are so high and the openings for adventure much more numerous than here, adults were never wanting to enter the ranks. The Secretary for War had said that organization was the business of the Executive, and that it was not necessary, therefore, for Parliament to deliberate on many of the most important subjects which he had to decide. But the House of Commons would not easily be schooled into forgetting its oldest traditions. How its will was to be carried into effect was the proper function of the Executive; but what it would have carried into effect Parliament alone must judge. Let it not be said that the Horse Guards alone could decide on matters of discipline, and the War Office alone on matters of cost. Whenever such pretensions were raised they ought to be smitten down. The House of Commons were the guardians of the properties and lives of a nation, and that sacred trust they cannot delegate and will not devolve on Ministers, however worthy or able. He was of the Parliament of 1865, and voted with his gallant Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway) against the protests of the War Office and the Horse Guards, that corporal punishment should cease. They were told that discipline could not be maintained and that they must take the responsibility of mutiny and desertion. They were not scared by those threats, but voted the inhibition. Three days afterwards the Secretary for War and other right hon. Gentlemen who sat near him came down to the House and reversed their vote. But what happened? Why that the following Session his hon. Friend and himself came again, and by that time the impossibility had thawed into a possibility; and a General Election being at hand, they found a number of hon. Gentlemen convertible whom they could never convert before. Why was this? Because public opinion was with them, and public opinion was with them now. Public opinion would not allow them to go on, to use General Daubeney's words, "year after year shipping multitudes of children to the tropics to their inevitable destruction," for no better reason than that it had been the practice, it was still the practice, and that it would be less trouble to let the practice continue. The practical question then was, what could be done? He had not the presumption to offer a suggestion of his own; but he was deeply impressed by the concurrence of opinion on the part of men who possessed great experience in favour of one or other of two methods, each of which had its advantages, and each of which, he was confidently assured, would secure, if cordially and energetically tried, the great end they all had in view. Sir John Burgoyne thought that each regiment should have a home battalion, consisting of young men who had their elementary duties of drill and discipline to learn, with whom should be associated a certain proportion of veterans, and from which, when they had reached the age of 21, they might be draughted with safety into the battalion liable for service abroad. There were obvious benefits connected with this distribution and arrangement which it was hardly necessary to point out. The youth of 19, instead of waiting or idling until he had reached the appointed time of eligibility for soldiership, would be, as now, admissible to wear his country's uniform; to learn what could not be learnt without continuous attention by any man, in any region of the world; and to look forward at no distant day to be called, not out of his regiment, but to join his elder companions, who should have a few months preceded him on active service abroad. He would, in short, be in a state of progress, bodily and mental; and a current of sympathy and ambition would be set up in the regiment from the day the recruit entered the training battalion to the day he entered the active battalion; and therein he would have tangibly before him the hope of recompense and return before he was outworn to take his place in the Reserve. There was another plan, which was recommended by the high authority of Lord Sandhurst. He would allow youths to be enlisted in the Militia, which, in some respects, would be identical with the home battalion, from which the corresponding regiment would draw its recruits when they reached the age of 20 years, and into which, after the six years' term with the colours, men would return to be enrolled as an efficient portion of the Reserve. There were differences of detail between the two schemes into which he would not enter; and it was very possible that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War might say that he could suggest a third which was neither one or the other, but which, in his opinion, would be something better than either. Then by all means let them have it. So that it accomplished the saving them the national reproach and peril of the present annual holocaust, the House of Commons would not be very hard to please about its nomenclature or configuration. His right hon. Friend could not, and would not, he was sure, say that what was desired could not be done; for he had already announced that he was disposed to move in the direction they required, and that, in some way or other unexplained, he was willing to try whether he could restrain the practice of sending children in uniforms to our tropical outposts. But let him not deceive himself with the notion that this great question, once raised, would ever be allowed to rest again, until the people of this country had got security for the total abolition of this reckless and ruinous malpractice. Were he an enemy of the right hon. Gentleman, what could he say more bitter against him than that, having the power and knowing the fact, he had allowed the evil to go on up to this time without any attempt to extinguish it? He would not do him such injustice, because he thoroughly believed that until Parliament interposed with a high hand its interdict, no Secretary of State would ever be able, even though he were willing, to bring this evil system to an end. It was very like what occurred regarding the abolition of slavery. Year after year the demand was made, the evil admitted, and benevolent promises given by Secretary after Secretary of State, that orders would be issued to lessen the mischief, and gradually to work the cure. But slavery would have gone on until this day, if the House of Commons had not resolved that it should be abolished once and for ever. He repeated what he had already said, and should never cease to say, until the truth was admitted and inscribed in the Statute Book—that we should get the proper men if we paid the proper price for them. Putting aside all considerations of health and availability for ordinary duty, and putting aside all considerations of cost and sickness, was it conceivable that we should be contented to rely on such materials for our Army, on whose conduct our existence as a nation must depend? Would they insure their houses or their lives with a company the half of whom they knew to be worth next to nothing? It could hardly be doubted that the current of public opinion had set in strongly and steadily in favour of a thorough change in this primary and essential element of military organization; and he trusted that the feeling of the House would be in unison with the feeling of the public at large, and that we might place the Army, as regarded the rank and file, gradually, but permanently, cautiously but irreversibly, upon a different and a better footing than that whereon it hitherto had stood. He thought the time had come when, if they wished to have a national Army, the stupidity and inexperience of youth, and the recklessness of ragamuffinry crimped in publichouses, should give way to the intelligent, loyal, useful, sound-hearted, and able-bodied men, who might be drawn from all sections of the industrious community. Let them, in this respect, be admonished by what Prussia, Switzerland, America, and France in her better days—days which he trusted would soon return again, had wisely and deliberately done. Let them trust the defence of the country to an Army which would be worthy of the nation, in sympathy with, and part and parcel of that ancient commonwealth for whose existence it was the pledge and guard. Then, indeed, they might care very little for the threats of foreign Powers; for with their Fleet for the first line of defence, and their Army for the second, their safety would be secured. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Clause.

[Committee—New Clause.

New Clause.

(Recruit to be twenty years of age.)

"No person enlisted as a soldier in any regiment of cavalry or of the line shall be called upon to serve Her Majesty out of the United Kingdom until he shall have attained the age of twenty years.—(Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens.)

MR. HOLMS said, he rose for the purpose of supporting the clause of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens); but as it limited only the age at which men should be enlisted for service out of the United Kingdom, he had ventured to add an Amendment, the effect of which was to limit the age of soldiers for home service to 19 years. He regarded this Amendment as a natural and necessary corollary to the clause of his hon. and learned Friend; and he was convinced that if enlistment was allowed to go on, under 20 years for foreign, and 19 years for home service, the Army would decline in power and strength, and they would have few deserving the name of men fit to go forth and do battle. But, both as regarded the proposition of his hon. and learned Friend and his own Amendment, it appeared to him that it was essentially necessary they should consider two points—two points which he thought ought to be placed before the Committee and the country fully and clearly. The first of the points was with respect to the present system of enlistment; and upon that he would venture to make to the House a few statements which might be novel, and would, he thought, be useful on that occasion. The second and all-important point was, how they could best obtain an Indian and colonial Army, perfectly distinct and separate on the one hand, and a home Army perfectly distinct and separate on the other, and yet both be blended together, maintaining that harmony of working which was necessary in a complete military organization. Now, as regarded the first important question to which he had alluded, he would wish to draw the attention of the House to some facts bearing on the more prominent features of the present system of recruiting. But before dealing with that portion of his subject, he wished to point out some facts in relation to another department, which, he was sorry to say, was also important—namely, the running-away department. They had in their recruiting system three departments: first, the department proper for recruiting, under the Horse Guards; secondly, this running-away department, under the War Office; and, thirdly, the department for discharging men, which is conducted by a Board of Commissioners at Chelsea. As regarded the running-away department, he found that whilst in the years 1867 and 1868 no less than 68,000 presented themselves for enlistment, of that number 18,000 were required to fill the places of those who had run away from the Army, and from recruits before final approval. Reducing it still more clearly, out of this total of 68,000 men, 42,360 passed and were accepted, but during the same period 14,250 ran away, or, in other words, deserted the Army; so that, in reality, every third man enlisted was required to make up the deficiency caused by desertion. Well, it appeared to him that, taking this circumstance into consideration, and having regard also to the fact that out of 6,000 men who annually deserted, 2,400 were recovered, and out of that number 146 had deserted twice, and 4 three times, how would it be possible to conduct any business in that country, where they had so many people determined not to serve them? But, worse than that, he found, in 1869, that whilst the number of recruits that passed as worthy to serve Her Majesty amounted to 11,089, they discharged that year 2,793 men as bad characters—men that they did not like; and that 4,122 ran away because they did not like them, so that they had nearly 7,000 to supply by fresh recruiting. That, in his opinion, made the service a complete sham. It was like trying to fill a bucket with a hole in its bottom: they would lose nearly as much as they gathered; and they were spending a great deal of money for nothing. He would venture to point out to the House these details, because it appeared to him that they were a good deal in the habit of discussing great principles alone; but details were to great principles precisely what pence were to pounds. He ought also to allude to the expense connected with the recovery of these men—£6 5s. per man, besides the time lost by the imprisonment. Well, it appeared to him not a little remarkable that this state of things could possibly exist, and he had made some inquiry himself with the view of solving the difficulty. He visited one of the recruiting depôts—a depôt the most important in this country, seeing that out of the 14,000 approved men who passed last year, over 7,000 passed through this particular depôt. That depôt was St. George's Barracks, behind the National Gallery, and he found there one apartment—a large apartment, very clean and well lighted no doubt—a dormitory. It was abundantly supplied with air—that was to say, there appeared to be an ample space per man, but the beds were of the most filthy and abominable description; and that was the place where recruits were first introduced. But that was passable compared with some other things that he saw there. When he went down to the day-room he found it was well lighted, but there was nothing in it except some tables and forms. The men were all hanging about; their clothes would be of first-rate service to a farmer for scaring away the crows; but here men had no newspaper, nor anything for them to read; nothing whatever to form the least inducement to them to stay even within the walls of this barrack. Then, he went to see the canteen—a small room comparatively, 19 feet long and 19 feet wide, but only 9 feet high; and although it was a glorious noon-day in March, this place was lighted with gas. It was divided in the centre, through which a kind of counter ran; behind it were several people supplying the recruits, and the other side was crammed full by men. He asked himself after seeing that—Is it any wonder that out of the number of recruits that come here, some, at least, should desire to run away? A little common sense would alter this; it was not a matter of statutory law; the difficulty lay elsewhere. This place was under the guardianship of the War Office, and he held that a place in such a state was not a credit to the War Office, nor any department connected with military affairs. But he said—as a Christian nation, would they believe it—that these men were asked not only to spend week-days, but Sundays there, and there was not a Bible nor any book, of a religious or any other description, to look at? They had plenty of churches near, but these men might or might not go to church, and it was not creditable to the nation that they should leave them in that condition, and he felt ashamed that it was so. He was glad to see that already, since his visit, a change had taken place, some officers having provided a few pictures, and some small books to read; but what he would ask was, whether, when men found they regarded them as lightly as that, it was consistent with common sense to expect that they would serve them faithfully? Well, he regarded that question of age as being of vast importance, and it was the groundwork of the clause of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Finsbury, as well as of his (Mr. Holms') Amendment. It appeared to him that it was essentially necessary that they should thoroughly and clearly understand the position of their recruiting system, both in relation to age and occupation, during, say, the past 10 years. Now, he found that for a period of nine years—from the years 1860 to 1868, inclusive—they had 182,500 recruits, and out of that number 69,500 were rejected. These men were—if the House would allow him he would give the ages, because it might be an advantage to be saved the trouble of obtaining them—under 17 years of age, 4,706; over 17 and not 18, 13,635; over 18 and not 19, 46,441; over 19 and not 20, 31,246; over 20 and not 21, 23,552; over 21 and not 22, 16,854; over 22 and not 23, 14,185; over 23 and not 24, 10,986; over 24 and not 25, 10,049; and over 25, 10,610. As to the occupation of these men, he found, roundly, that 105,000 belonged to the labouring class; of mechanics and artizans, 62,000; of shopmen, 14,000; and of professional men, 1,400. He had next to refer to the important point of rejection, and he begged the House to permit him to say this, that he spoke as an employer of labour, and looked upon it as a labour question—a question of some moment to them, seeing that they, as a nation, were progressing so steadily year by year, in the employment of men and women. From the years 1832 to 1841 the recruits rejected were at the rate of 298 per 1,000; from 1842 to 1851, 335 per 1,000—he regretted that he could not continue to quote the figures uniformly, but from 1860 to 1867, the rejections were 385 per 1,000, being an enormous increase. The reason why he fixed upon 19 years as the minimum age for men intended for home service was because he found that the number of rejections was far greater in proportion with young men than with men of more mature years. He had been furnished with a paper for January, and he found that out of 1,016 men enlisted, the percentage of rejections under 19 was 27; from 19 to 20, 24½ per cent; from 20 to 23—the age at which the Prussians take men, and wisely as he thought—a little under 19 per cent, showing that men of younger years were less fit for service. He would like to make another statement which had made an impression upon his mind, and that was as regarded the age of the men of their Army in 1868. In that year they seemed to have had 70,000 men on home service, only 12,800 of whom were less than 20 years old; whilst in India they had 46,000, 2,250 of whom were below 20. That was a contrast compared with the state of the 54th Regiment, which went out to India a short time since, and more than one-half of which was declared to be composed of men under 20. And now he would pass on to the next and all-important subject—and until they had solved the difficulty he did not see how they could hope to obtain recruits with facility—he alluded to the problem—How were they to have an Army for India and the colonies which should be separate and distinct from the Army for home service, and yet be blended with it? But before speaking upon that, he was obliged to point out difficulties which had been forcibly adverted to by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War—namely, first, that it would not do to have an Army in India and the colonies perfectly distinct from that for home service, because then the Indian Army would become a class; secondly, that it was necessary to have the men serve the Queen elsewhere, if required; and, thirdly, that the officers should be permitted to have home as well as Indian service. Speaking as a business man he thought those difficulties might be overcome, and in this manner—in the place of existing regulations, they should have in their regiments three battalions, one of which should be for service for India and the colonies. Six years would, perhaps, be the appropriate period of enlistment, as medical men had declared that five years was sufficiently long for a man to serve in India, the remaining twelve-months being set apart for going out and returning. The other two battalions should be for home service; they should be enlisted for any period of time they might consider appropriate, and, perhaps, it would not be longer than three years. They would then have one battalion continuously for India and two battalions for home service, and the officers might still exchange and interchange just as they pleased. Now, if his Amendment were carried, limiting the age for home service to 19, soldiers could remain with their battalions in the United Kingdom for a year, and then, if they chose, volunteer for India. That could not, in his humble judgment, interfere in any way with the system of short service; and as to India, they had never had any difficulty in obtaining men to go there. Now he came to the last two questions he had to ask: the first was—What did they want; and the second—How might they obtain what they want? It appeared that they wanted 85,000 men for India and the colonies. At present, they had 62,000 men in India, and 25,000 in the colonies; but by the policy initiated by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, the number for the colonies would be reduced. Then they wanted for home service a standing Army of 70,000 men, and a Reserve Army of 100,000. If they had Armies of that extent, and of the age his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Finsbury desired, as well as being well trained and disciplined, they would have a force sufficiently powerful for their requirements—larger than at present by 60,000 men; and, from its composition, greatly cheaper. Their Army would be composed of men from 19 to 28 years of age. And he would beg here to make a remark which he thought was essentially necessary at that moment. It was this—that there appeared to be a great deal of misunderstanding as to what the Prussian Army really was—and it was that Army which was specially recommended to their notice. He had seen it stated that the battles lately won by Prussia had been won by men between 20 and 23, but he ventured to say it was no such thing. The real Prussian Army—the Army sent to the field of battle, consisted of men from 20 to 28. Many men said they had seen the regiments at drill, and that the soldiers were of the former age. That was true in time of peace; but let the tocsin of war be sounded, and then they would see an Army composed of men from 20 to 28; and that was the kind of Army they would have to encounter were a misunderstanding to be created with Prussia. Speaking of our Reserves, he was one of those who were greatly in favour of having a Reserve as early as possible, because upon that alone could they found their hopes of efficiency and economy. It was a matter of grave consideration in that country, what their Reserve was to be after they had got it. Did they call it a Reserve when they gave a man a ticket as a Reserve man? What he called a Reserve was men upon whom they could depend in time of need, and upon whom they could lay their hand at any time; and until they had a system of that character, they would not have anything deserving the name of a Reserve. Now he came to the question,

[Committee—New Clause.]

[Committee—New Clause.]

Mr. Holmes

How to obtain it?—and he had to speak still as an employer of labour, that being in one aspect a great labour question. First of all, they must treat the men better when they got them. When they introduced them, let the recruiting depôt be of that character that when they went forth themselves they would be their best recruiting sergeants, and that was the only rational way by which they could obtain men worth having. But they must also raise the price. Without an hour's hesitation, they must give 1s. 6d. instead of 1s. 2d. per day; and moreover, as regarded their Reserves, in place of 4d. give them 6d., and only keep them six years, and then they would get such a number of men, and pass them so quickly through into civil life again, that a foreign foe landing in this country would find that it had got in the midst of an hornet's nest. Well, then, having raised their wages, and treated them in a better way, carry out what the Government had already commenced, make the profession something more honourable by giving the men, after they were discharged, Civil Service employment. Do not give them Post Office or such like occupation until they had passed through the Reserve; but if they did so, then Army men would become equally as valuable a corps as the Commissionaires had done, and people in private life would be glad to employ them. If the profession became more honourable, and they accepted them in their service, they would give them a name and standing which would enable them to be well employed afterwards. Now, they must not forget that they were in a changed position to what they used to be. Since 1855—since the stamp duty had been taken off the Press—the veil had been lifted that used to stand between different classes of men; that veil had been lifted up never to be interposed again. They now saw and know everything, and unless they offered good terms they would not come to serve them; and he hoped they would allow little delay to take place, when common sense pointed out that the market was not in such a state that they could easily obtain men. As regarded the officers in charge of recruits, it appeared to him that they would be still called upon to do that duty which they had not done thoroughly in the past. He spoke with the greatest friendliness of officers of the British Army, for he felt grateful to them for the kindness with which they had treated him; but he would venture to say that they might expect from them that there would be better manufacturers of soldiers in the future. He trusted the day was gone by for discussing whether a man could be made a good soldier in three years. They had seen that the Prussians could win victories, although their men only received that period of training, and there was not the slightest reason why the same should not be the case in England. But in a moral sense, and for the welfare of the nation, he was inclined to think it was all-important they should not keep men away from their trade and calling for more than three years. A broken bone, if set quickly, again united and was as strong as ever; but if long kept apart, to reunite it became impossible. So it was with a man, if they kept him away from his trade or calling for, say, three years, he would probably resume work with aptitude and readiness; but if he did not resume within a reasonable time, he never became so good a tradesman as he was before. And now he ought not to occupy the attention of the House for a longer period, he had only one word more to say, and that was that he sincerely trusted that that discussion to-night would have for its effect the introduction of a very comprehensive scheme, such as the country would appreciate. The Duke of Wellington once said—"I am aware that it is intolerable for the British Parliament to consider in time of peace what is necessary in time of war." He hoped those words would be of use and warning to them, and that they would take care, after the terrible events that had recently darkened Europe, to set their House thoroughly in order. The Amendment of which he had given Notice was—

"And no person shall be enlisted as a soldier for home service who is under nineteen years of age;"

but he understood that he had not the power to move it at the present time.

VISCOUNT MAHON said, he approved of the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens), and hoped the Government would be disposed to meet the Committee in that matter, because it was stated in "another place" that the subject of recruiting for India had been taken into consideration by them, and that they proposed to offer a bounty of one guinea to each man over the age of 22 years who volunteered to go out there. For another reason he trusted that the Government would accede to the reasonable demand of the Amendment, because soldiers under 20 years of age were not physically able to bear the fatigue of foreign service, and were frequently after a short period of service sent home invalided. From an able analysis by Lieutenant G. Talbot, of the Prussian dragoons, it appeared that the average age at which men entered the Prussian service was 20½ years, and that a great proportion of them were, in certain cases, allowed to remain away another year. Taking that into consideration, he thought it need not be said that there was any great difficulty about this matter, for the Government would find on going into the subject that they could easily find a supply of men 20 years old to serve in the Army. The result of recruiting in London he found was not adequate to our requirements, numbering as they did only 15 a month since the 1st of January last, of whom many did not join their regiments. The easiest mode of increasing the strength of our Army would be to obtain volunteers from the Militia, the commanding officers of which force ought to be prohibited from detaining men who were willing to join the Regular forces. According to the Report of the Inspector General of Recruiting, this leave had sometimes been withheld. It was a good thing to abolish bounty, but to abolish pensions was a very different affair, for they would find that really serviceable men would not enlist unless the prospect of a small pension were held out to them.

SIR HENRY STORKS said, the proposition of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens) was one of great interest and of very great importance. The Government entirely concurred in the principle laid down by his hon. and learned Friend, and they would have supported him if he had brought forward his proposition in the form of an Address, praying that, as far as practicable, troops should not be sent abroad under 20 years of age: but when his hon. and learned Friend wished by statutory enactment to oblige the Government not to send troops abroad under that age, the question assumed a very different shape. His hon. and learned Friend, in introducing this subject, had touched upon one of the most difficult problems connected with military administration. That problem was rendered more difficult of solution in this country by two causes—first, compulsory service or conscription for the Regular Army was impossible; and, secondly, very peculiar and varied services were required from the British Army. As to the system of conscription, or compulsory service, he believed there was no hon. Member, or at least very few, on either side of the House, who did not concur with him (Sir Henry Storks) in the opinion that it would be positively impossible; but while saying that, he knew that the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire and some few others thought that if it could be made use of, it would be found of great service as a keystone for organization. [Lord ELCHO: For home service.] As a soldier, he should be but too glad to be able to go into the labour market and fill up the ranks of the Army with the most efficient men he could get; but when he considered the habits, feelings, and nature of Englishmen, he did not think it possible to carry out such a system. He doubted very much whether even if the Legislature passed a law to establish compulsory service, the Government would be able to carry such a law into effect. Then, as regarded the services that were required from the British Army, he held that there was no Army in the world from which services so varied and so distant, and duties of such great importance were demanded. He did not think he could better illustrate the sort of services required from the British Army than by referring to the last regiment in which he had the honour to serve. That regiment came home from India in 1836, after a service of more than 20 years. They came home a skeleton regiment, the greater number of the men having volunteered to remain in India. Those who came home were discharged as inefficient, and in the course of the summer of 1836 the regiment was recruited. The regiment in 1840 went to the Mediterranean, after having had 11 moves, to say nothing of the moves of detachments in the United Kingdom, principally in Ireland. The regiment was in the Mediterranean till 1845, having served in the Ionian Islands and Gibraltar. In 1846 they went to Jamaica; in 1848 they went to Halifax, Nova Scotia; in 1851 they returned to England; and in 1854 they joined the Army in the Crimea, for the Crimean Expedition. In July, 1856, they returned to England after the Crimean War was at an end. In August, 1857, they embarked for India, and were there still. That was a specimen of the ordinary service required from a regiment of the Line. But by the wise policy of Her Majesty's Government foreign stations were reduced, and services so excessive were not perhaps now demanded from the Army. Bad stations in the West Indies had been abolished, and our troops had been entirely withdrawn from the Australian colonies. A Return for 1862 showed that in that year we had 47 regiments of Infantry in the colonies and 56 in India; whereas in 1871 there were only 22 in the colonies and 50 in India, making in all 72 abroad. In fact, only stations of position were now kept up. The Indian service, too, had been very much modified—first, by facility of communication, and, secondly, by the introduction of railways in India. Troops instead of going round the Cape now went by the Suez Canal and the Red Sea at the best season of the year, and when they arrived in India they were sent, as far as practicable, by means of railroads to their stations. Such a circumstance could not happen now as that related lately, of a body of 137 men landing in India, only 30 of whom joined the regiment at its station. It was not so much their youth that unfitted men for the Indian service, as their not having the requisite physique resulting from good feeding and training, and regular habits. In fact, no one should be sent to India until his constitution had been entirely proved. No doubt, it would be very desirable to enlist no men but sound men, fully developed in a physical point of view; but he held that in this country that was a thing almost impossible. Such a thing could be done in a country where there was conscription, and they could go to the labour market and take such men as they required; but in a country where they had voluntary enlistment they had really to take the men more or less as they could get them. The real difficulty was to catch men for the purpose of joining the Army about 20 years of age, for they were then generally engaged in some trade or calling, and were not very eligible for recruits. It had been suggested that they should offer better terms when they went to the labour market for men. If that was to be done by bounty, he doubted whether it would have the desired effect, for everybody knew that the system of bounty had been a fertile source of fraud and desertion. His right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War had abolished the system of bounty, and he was happy to say that its abolition had been attended with most excellent results. With regard to extra pay, he believed there was no hon. Gentleman of the military profession in that House who would not be of opinion that if extra pay were given to soldiers it must be done with great caution. Extra pay had not been attended with the good results that had been anticipated. There was another proposal, which had been warmly advocated some time ago by a friend of his, the late Mr. Godley—namely, to pay a man a shilling a-day, and put by another shilling a-day, so as to form a fund to be given to him on his discharge. But all who had anything to do with soldiers would agree with him that all dealings with them should be ready-money transactions. There was no class who were more suspicious, or who would be more cautious in entering into any engagement in which the pay was deferred. All the statistics with regard to recruiting were highly favourable. In time of peace there was no doubt that a young Army was an advantage. General Edwards had reported that the improvement in the physique of the recruits a short time after joining their regiments was wonderful, and officers were generally agreed on that point. The Returns for one year showed that there was an improvement in the average height of one inch; when measured across the chest, of two inches; in weight, of 16 lbs. With regard to the 60th Rifles, one battalion, the 4th, had been recruited in London, and the colonel had expressed himself perfectly satisfied with his regiment. The 54th had been also alluded to. He had lately an officer of that regiment in his rooms, who stated that he had no fault whatever to find with his recruits. [Colonel

[Committee—New Clause.]

. Sir Henry Storks

STUART KNOX: Did he say they were fit to go to India?] The officer stated the regiment had been medically inspected and approved. If the system of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War were in operation, allowing six years with the colours and six with the Reserves, and giving 25 per cent of old soldiers, in an emergency the Reserves would be ready to fill up the ranks of the Army, and there would be no need to go to the recruiting market. Let them take, for example, the augmentation of last year. Under the existing system they had to go to the recruiting market to raise the 20,000 they wanted; but if they had the Reserve, the Government would consider whether it was desirable to increase the Army by 20,000, or whether it would not be better to watch the course of events. Supposing that scheme were carried out, he would compare what would be the condition of the Army then with what it was at another period—for instance, 1866. In 1866 the infantry of the Army was constituted as regarded ages as follows per 1,000 men:—There were under 18 years of age 17·8; from 18 to 20, 114·6; from 20 to 25, 275·2; from 25 to 30, 356·2; and above 30, 236·2. Under the proposed system, when the Reserves would be called out for service, 1,000 infantry would consist of 145 from 18 to 20 years of age; of 278 from 20 to 25, of 464 from 25 to 30, and of 113 above 30. The Committee would not fail to observe that by the proposed system the numbered men above 30 years of age was only 113; while by the existing system the number of men above 30 years of age was 236. Allusion had been made to a General Order issued some time ago, as to which he would give a few explanations. The cause of that General Order was this—the peace establishment of many regiments being quite full, the Adjutant General reported that recruiting must be partially stopped. His right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War was very unwilling to check recruiting, and to obviate the difficulty which had arisen, a General Order was issued inviting men of not less than three years' service to go into the Reserve, in order to keep the numbers within the limit of the establishment. That General Order had been laid on the Table in "another place," and would be produced in that House, if it had not been laid on the Table already. The result had been that 22 sergeants, 186 corporals, and 2,462 out of 64,000 infantry had offered to join the Reserve. His right hon. Friend had since arranged that all the volunteers joining the first Army of Reserve, exclusive of bandsmen, should be allowed to do so at once. Measures had been taken to complete the regiments under orders for India and the Indian depôts, and men in all respects fit for Indian service, not under 22 years of age, were to be permitted to volunteer, with an allowance of a guinea. Care had also been taken not to send recruits to India under the age of 20; such recruits were to be transferred to the other battalions of their regiments if they were at home; and if being enlisted for general service under the powers given by the Act they would be transferred to other battalions, care would be taken to explain to them why the transfer had been made. He would venture to urge that it would be very questionable policy to tie the hands of the Government by legislative enactments, prohibiting under any circumstances the employment of Her Majesty's troops under 20 years of age out of the United Kingdom. Such a legislative enactment would be very hard even on the country. There were many men under 20 years of age who would be perfectly fit to serve abroad, probably more fit than many above 20. But the great thing was to insure that these men received a perfect medical inspection, and that none should be allowed to go to India or abroad unless pronounced to be fit by the proper medical authorities. It would be impossible to agree to the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend as it stood; but Her Majesty's Government would have readily concurred if he had moved, or would concur if he would still move, an Address praying that, as far as practicable, no recruits should be sent abroad under 20 years of age.

[Committee—New Clause.]

COLONEL NORTH said, that Her Majesty's Government had at last opened their eyes to the bad policy of enlisting very young soldiers, but they were indebted for that to the speech of a noble and gallant Lord "elsewhere" (Lord Sandhurst), who said that if their Armies were to consist of youths under 21 years of age, they were simply organizing defeat. Now, there was, he believed, no soldier who would not assent to that statement, and the noble and gallant Lord deserved, in his opinion, the thanks of the Army for having called attention to the subject. He would beg to point out to the Committee a very important omission from the statements made by the noble Lord the Under Secretary for War in the other House. The noble Lord had stated that the greatest care was taken that young men before they enlisted should have pointed out to them the advantages and disadvantages of the service they were about to enter. This, no doubt, was correct—but nothing was said about the stations to which they might be sent. This was a point of the greatest importance for a young man to know. He had that morning received a letter from a most distinguished officer, in which the writer stated that it was very sad to see the recruits who had lately gone out to India, a great many of them being under the age of 20, which meant that they were only 18 or 19. It was true that the Commander-in-Chief had given directions that everything possible was to be done for the men; but there was no accommodation at the hill stations for the number of boys who were sent out. He would simply observe, in conclusion, that it was impossible to tell how many hundreds of the young men who were to be embarked for India next September, under the auspices of the Government, would be marched, not to the hills, but to their graves. He (Colonel North) was sure that the speech of the noble Lord in "another place," to which he had referred, would receive consideration and attention, and he hoped it would not be lost on Her Majesty's Government, who he thought ought to have been aroused to the danger of the situation from the difficulties experienced during the Crimean War, arising in a great measure from the youthful age and consequent insufficient stamina of the reinforcements sent out to keep up the strength of the effective force in the field.

MAJOR DICKSON said, that although last year he was unable to impress his views upon the House, they were now held by no less an authority than The Times, which, in an article inserted last month, after enlarging upon the mischief to a standing Army by too rapidly passing men through its ranks, said—

Sir Henry Storks

"A Reserve Army is of great importance, but an active Army is of more importance still, and we should hope to see it always ranked first by our military authorities."

These were the principles he had always ventured to impress upon the House. The system of enlisting boys for short service was slowly but surely destroying the efficiency of the active Army of this country, and, if pursued, must, sooner or later, bring disaster to our arms and disgrace to the country. One evil was the want of adult soldiers of full age to send to India. He could imagine nothing more likely or even more certain to bring disaster to our arms than to send mere untrained, undisciplined boys to defend the territory of India. These youths would not only fall by numbers from the effects of climate, but would be unable to hold their own against the Sikhs, the Afghans, the Ghoorkas, and other hill tribes, who would look upon Englishmen as degenerating. Such a feeling would result in a loss of prestige, followed by a loss of territory. It was incredible that any Secretary of State or Commander-in-Chief should think of sending to India regiments composed of mere youths. But if even the clause now proposed were accepted, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would find it difficult, if not impossible, to carry it into effect. If boys were enlisted from 16 to 18 for active service, and then passed into the Reserve in three, or even six years' time, our active Army must be composed of mere youths, not yet physically developed, who had not had time to acquire habits of unquestioning discipline. Where was the Secretary of State to obtain men of the full age of 20 to maintain an Army of 60,000 men in India? If the Bill had really been one to re-organize the Army, amalgamating the Militia and the Regulars, there would have been no difficulty in getting rid of these young soldiers: but now he would have to transfer these youths to other regiments against their will and against the will of those regiments. Recent examples in France must show how dangerous it was to trust the honour or the territory of a country to young, untrained soldiers. Yet the right hon. Gentleman was doing that very thing. By the Short Enlistment Act the active Army would be composed of raw youths, with a doubtful Reserve behind—doubtful because one-third of them would probably not be forthcoming when wanted. It was our old soldiers who gave the English Army its high character in the Peninsular and in India. If the troops engaged in the Crimea had been composed of the mere striplings who were now in the ranks, we could not have boasted of the Alma; and Inkerman, instead of being a word of pride to Englishmen, would have been a disgrace and a reproach. He was disappointed that this Bill was not made more than in name an Army Regulation Bill. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would re-consider the Act of last Session, and that next year he would take the whole question of Army recruiting into his consideration, so that we might have an Army, which, if we were suddenly attacked, might maintain its high character and the honour of the country.

SIR WILLIAM RUSSELL said, he thought that the restriction involved in the proposed clause might be exceedingly embarrassing in case of war. If recruits were taken at 18 years of age and well fed until they were 20 years old, they would then be fitter for foreign service than if they were kept at home and badly fed until they were of the age of 20. He thought it would be well for the hon. and learned Member for Finsbury to accept the advice of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Surveyor General of Ordnance and withdraw his clause.

MR. OSBORNE: I confess it seems to me that the way in which this new clause has been met is satisfactory in some respects, but not altogether. The clause of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens), amid the weary waste of words that we have listened to in these debates, is to my mind the first gleam of anything like the re-organization of the Army that I have seen. It is the first intimation that any hon. Member has given that the rank and file is the most material part of the Army—its bone and sinew; in fact, that all consideration of its claims and requirements has hitherto been postponed to the wranglings over the pecuniary interests of the officers. For my own part, I confess that I am delighted to get away from that subject at all events; but I must say that I am equally disappointed with the speech made to-night—the official speech, redolent of tape of the reddest description—that has been delivered by my right hon. and gallant Friend the Surveyor General of Ordnance. What did he say? If a noble Lord in “another place”—who was sent to that “other place” in order to support this Bill—if he viewed with feelings of blank dismay the recruiting system for the rank and file of the British Army—what, I should like to know, will his feelings be, after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman on the Treasury bench? Was there, in that speech, any indication of a policy — of any better policy for the future, in order to put the Army on a more satisfactory footing? As far as I could discover, there was nothing but a recurrence to the old pigeon-holes of the Horse Guards; and although the right hon. Gentleman concurred in the alteration now proposed, he still defended the old system of recruiting. I did expect—and I have not yet abandoned the hope—that when the military man had failed the civilian Minister of War would give us his idea as to the degree of success that has been reached under the present system of recruiting. It is not sufficient to show to the House that the voluntary system gives us mere numbers. It does do that; but that is no criterion of what the Army is. What we require is a system that gives us not mere numerical quantity on paper, but quality in the field. Does our present system do that? Has the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Henry Storks), in those few words of his, given us any idea that the Government or the Horse Guards is in a position to comprehend the difficulties and the drawbacks incident to our present system of recruiting? I heard the speech of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman with blank dismay. How is our recruiting at present managed? We have seen lately a good many changes in the Orders of the Horse Guards on the subject. First, the service was for three years, now it is for six; the truth being that we are slowly forming a problematical Reserve at the expense of the standing Army. It is obvious that that is so, because the greater the demand for recruits, of course the greater will be the number of youths or “starvelings,” as they have been called, that fill the ranks of your Army. The effect of this policy is already evident. Only the other day you fixed upon three years as the time of service; but already you are obliged to double that period. [Mr. CARDWELL dissented.] Does not the right hon. Gentleman admit that? [Mr. CARDWELL: No.] The right hon. Gentleman gives no sign. I maintain that the fact is incontrovertible, that the present system of recruiting and of passing the men through the Army is exposing the country to the most frightful peril should war break out. You are continually imitating what you call the Prussian system in details, but you entirely forget one thing—that the keystone of that system is compulsory service, and it is of no sort of use imitating this slight detail of three years’ service unless you take the Prussian system in toto. Now, I think a great deal may be said for that system; but we are told that in England it is an impossibility. Of course, if the Government declares a thing to be “impossible,” it will be thought to be so. Now, I have no love for compulsory service; but this I will say—that if the present system of recruiting is maintained, and if a great European crisis happens, you will be compelled to come to compulsory service. We have heard something to-night of the Crimean Army, and how it broke down; but is my hon. Friend (Mr. Torrens) aware that the first Army, before it left our shores was in so unsatisfactory a condition that a great portion of it was weeded out and kept as a Reserve; that it did not sail until it had undergone complete medical inspection; and that a great portion of the men were withdrawn? And why was that? The present system of recruiting was the cause. Now, we have heard something of the pay of the soldier, and it has been said from the Treasury bench that that is not the way to popularize the Army. I think, and have always thought, that if you want to get good men you must give them good pay, and if you want to popularize the Army, the first step is to increase the pay of the soldier. We know that the wages of mechanics and skilled and unskilled labour of all kinds have been advancing for 20 years; whereas the pay of the soldier has advanced very slightly indeed—2*d.* per day has been, I think, the extreme advance within the last 10 years. How can you expect to get in this country the proper sort of men—“marvellous proper men,” as they used to be called in the old phrase—unless you pay them fairly?—the fact being that you now draft into your Army the sweepings of the streets of our towns and all the drunken and idle fellows of the country, or a great proportion of them. Will anyone pretend that the Army is now a popular institution? If a widow has a son who joins the ranks, does she not look upon him as utterly lost? When you talk of the treatment of the soldier, listen to the evidence of Colonel Cameron—one of the colonels quoted by the Treasury bench—who gives the case of one Samuel Corrigan, who served in three campaigns, was wounded severely several times, had the Turkish medal, had three clasps, and at last, on his retirement from the service, was allowed by his grateful country the sum of 6*d.* a-day to live on. Yet, when such are the rewards you hold out to gallantry and bravery, and the moral discipline and control requisite in a thorough soldier, you expect, nevertheless, that good and competent men will crowd into your ranks. Is it possible to popularize the Army on such pay? The only fault I find with the clause of my hon. and learned Friend is that it does not go far enough, because it only includes the regiments of the Line, and omits the Guards, the Engineers, and the Artillery. When I am told that the imposition of a restriction of this character in an Act of Parliament would embarrass the Government in case of war, I answer that nothing can be easier than to put in a clause giving discretionary powers to the Executive in cases of emergency; but it is beyond dispute that if we are to have a national Army we must destroy the present system of recruiting and substitute a better one. I really am surprised that hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury bench should pay so little attention to the Reports of their own officers. If ever there was a Report that ought to have opened the eyes of the Horse Guards it is that of Major Edwards for 1868-9, the Governor of the Military Prison of Fort Clarence. He states in that Report, that—

[Committee—New Clause.]

“While the pot-house system of recruiting is necessary, the lowest classes have to be inveigled into the ranks, and men of loose, unstable habits must, to a large extent, constitute the Army.”

And he gives the following extraordinary statistics:—In 1868, 25,600 convictions took place before Courts Martial; 8,762 soldiers were imprisoned in military prisons, and 1,774 were branded for desertion. Out of the average strength of 78,264 Regular soldiers in the United Kingdom in that year, 70,270 were treated in hospital, more than two-thirds of whom were treated for diseases contracted by youth, ignorance, and bad conduct. That was the state of the Army in 1868; and compare the statistics with those of the metropolitan police force in the same year, when out of about 8,000 men only 16 were charged with offences, and only two were imprisoned. If the metropolitan police were recruited as our Army is recruited, we should not be safe in our beds. I am disappointed at the way in which the Motion has been met, for it has been damned with faint praise. I know nothing of what the Government intend to do; but I think I know as much as they do themselves. Something has been said about the Army in India. I was one of the minority who always regretted that the local Army in India was destroyed. That was done in one of those panics to which we are too often subjected. It is impossible to keep up a proper supply of recruits in India under the present system, and without the adjunct of some local Army. When we are talking about recruiting in India, can there be a greater argument in favour of the present Motion than the Report of the Sanitary Commission on the state of the Army in India, which was presented to the War Office on July 8, 1870? Dr. Logan, the Director General of the Army Medical Department, says—

“I am fully of opinion that soldiers should not embark for service in India under 20 years of age, and that even immature men of 20 should be kept over to a later age.”

Dr. Beatson, Inspector General of Hospitals in India, says—

“One frequent cause of the high ratio of sickness and mortality among European troops in India is the large number of boys or growing lads sent out to fill the ranks.”

He mentions four regiments in India—the 92nd, the 1st battalion of the 6th, the 85th, and the 2nd battalion of the 60th—and says—

“Nearly one-fourth of the aggregate number consisted of lads under 20 years of age.”

This has been going on for some time, and it is only when the hon. and learned Member steps in and holds a pistol at the head of the Government that they say—“Do not make a statutory provision in the matter, but leave it to our discretion." Now, I have so little faith in the discretion of the present War Minister and his associates that I am not satisfied to leave the matter to their discretion. I believe they are well-meaning men; but the whole thing has got into such a muddle and a mess with the British Army—which is always in a rickety state—that if there were clouds on the Continent, the country would not submit to see the men now in office continue to rule the destinies of the country. The Royal Commission to which I have referred recommended that no recruit should be sent out until he was 21 years of age, or until he had completed his drill at home; but no steps were taken for carrying out that purpose, and now, in the month of June, 1871, the Government are so incapable of initiating the thing themselves, that they allow a private Member to bring it forward, and so endeavour to introduce this matter into a defunct Bill. I was going to say something else, but I remembered de mortuis, &c. It seems as if the Prussian estimate of the British Army is about to become true; it admits of but one solution—that of obliteration. As far as the recruiting system went I should be too happy if there was obliteration. I am confident that if you are to have a national Army and are to popularize it, it is not by so-called measures of reform, but by taking a broad, constitutional, just view of the constitution, wants, and condition, of the British soldier—not by trailing the red herring of the abolition of purchase, not by a Bill meant to catch the constituencies, but which I think has been a brutum fulmen even for that purpose.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, he rejoiced to hear the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Waterford (Mr. Osborne), because it had really done much to place fairly before the House and the country the important question which was incidentally raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens). He quite agreed that it would have been better if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Surveyor General of Ordnance had made a clearer and more distinct statement upon this question of enlistment and recruiting, which was now occupying the attention of the country. This was not a party question, and should be fairly and impartially debated, and he hoped they would have an assurance from the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the War Department that measures would be taken to secure a more efficient system of recruiting and enlistment than they now possessed. He had strenuously opposed the system of short enlistment brought forward last year, because he believed it would not add to our credit, or to the force of the country. He believed it would be found inefficient, and have the effect of weakening the Army, instead of strengthening it. The platform of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the War Department was short enlistment and a large number of men in the Reserves. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Financial Secretary of the War Office stated that in 10 or 12 years they would have as many as 170,000 men in the Reserves. Now, it had been proved by the documents issued from the War Office that the system of very short enlistment generally failed, and what the Army complained of was, that they never knew on what terms men were to be enlisted. Every day, if not oftener, alterations were made, and during the last few years there had been so many alterations that the market was perfectly bewildered by the different orders. How could they get good men under such a system? The Secretary of State ought to lay down some distinct and definite plan, saying how long a man should be enlisted for—7, 14, or 21 years. But when he said that a man should go six years into the Army and six years into the Reserve, he would signally fail in getting good men. If a man entered at 18 and left at 24, he was not likely to obtain the same class of employment as if he entered at 18 and left at 30 or 35, when he would be fit for some good employment, and not go back to the trade he had left. He would put an allegory to the right hon. Gentleman. Suppose the right hon. Gentleman, after one of the social gatherings at Oxford, when the conviviality was over, to retire from the room, and on reaching the street to see a flutter of ribbons, not from a bonnet, but from the cap of a recruiting sergeant. If he asked how things were going on, and if the Short Enlistment Act was taking with the young men, the answer would most probably be—"Not if I know it," meaning that it was not the sort of enlistment under which a man would engage. His hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury said no recruit should go to India or the colonies till he was 20 years of age; but the word "shall" might give rise to some difficulty. The most judicious mode of dealing with that question would be to move an Address to Her Majesty, praying that no soldier under 20 years of age should be sent out of the country; but that course should only be adopted on the distinct understanding that the Government would allow such a Motion to pass. The Government would have won for themselves greater confidence if they had refrained from sending abroad men of immature age. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) had an Amendment upon the Paper, to the effect that no man should be enlisted before he was 19 years of age; but the objection to that proposal was, that they must take the men when they could get them, and that it was easier to enlist men of 18 years of age than men of 19. If the men who were enlisted at 18 years of age, or even younger, were taken proper care of, were well fed, and not overladen with heavy knapsacks, they would make better soldiers eventually than the older men, who had probably led a disreputable and dissipated life, and only enlisted because they could get no other description of employment. The soldiers so trained would have got through the drudgery of their work at an early age, and by the time that they were 20 years of age they would have become practical soldiers, well acquainted with their professional duties, and proud of the service. There was one very important point that he approached with much pain, and that was, that if men were to be discharged at the age of 21, after only three years' drill, they would be filling their large towns with a mass of trained men who would become a very formidable element in the event of any disturbance arising. During the Chartist, and other disturbances, he had had the opportunity of seeing what men did on such occasions, and knew that if there were amongst them men who could organize them, they would be a more formidable and more dangerous mass to contend against. If, therefore, the short-service system were to be adopted, the recruits must be obtained from a higher class of society than that from which they were derived at present, and they must be paid on a higher scale. While admitting that a partial fusion of the Militia with the Line might be of advantage, he would point out the danger which would arise out of localizing the different regiments in particular districts—a course that would in all probability result in the men being demoralized to a certain extent by the hospitality they were likely to receive from their friends residing in the neighbourhood. He could see no objection to the Militia doing the recruiting work for the regiments when the Regular troops were abroad, and to a closer relation being established between the two forces. He should like to hear the opinion of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief and of the officers in command of regiments upon the subject of short enlistment, which he thought would be adverse to that system. While admitting the excellence of British soldiers, he thought that they could be improved by the fuller knowledge of their duties which they would acquire under a long-service system. He lamented that the right hon. Gentleman had been led to tamper with the existing regimental system, which had hitherto answered so admirably, in favour of a system of selection which had failed; but still he trusted that, under any circumstances, the new regimental system, whatever it might be, would never fail the country in time of need. Under these circumstances, he was most anxious that the House should be put in full possession of the intentions of the Government on this point, in order that the country might be able to judge of the efficacy of the proposed plan, and as to whether it afforded them the security which had been promised them in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War.

Mr. Osborne

COLONEL SYKES said, he had been much struck during the course of these debates with the almost universal condemnation that had been pronounced upon the constitution of the British Army. That constitution was the same now, both with regard to the physique and ages of the men, as it had been during the Peninsular and the Crimean Campaigns, when our Armies had fought admirably and victoriously—a tolerably strong proof that their organization was not very greatly in fault. What had failed during the Crimean War was departmental mismanagement at home, owing to which the supplies of stores fell short, shot and shell were placed upon packages of medicines, boots and shoes were sent to Balaclava, but were never landed, and hay was collected at one place in the Bosphorus and the machines for pressing it at another. With respect to bounty to recruits, he entirely concurred in its abolition. Bounty meant nothing more than a premium to desert. When a man got his money he went off to some other district to join a new regiment and he repeated that process. That accounted for desertions. As far as related to the age of recruits, during his long period of service in India, thousands of young cadets joined, whose ages varied from 16 to 18, and how little the climate affected them the slowness of promotion bore testimony. There was no doubt that it would be safer not to send recruits abroad before they reached the age of 20; but to embarrass the Government by inserting in the Bill the clause proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Finsbury would be an act of the highest impolicy. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would adopt the suggestion of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Surveyor General of the Ordnance.

SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD said, he thought it was of the highest political importance that our soldiers in India should be of a good and imposing physique. Our military strength in India rested not merely on numbers, but also on the great physical power and endurance of the British soldier. The impression of the people of India as to our military strength would be very much weakened if the regiments we sent to India were largely composed of such puny, weakly beings as he had seen collected at a recruiting dépôt not far from the House. He recollected that when the East India Company in 1858 sent levies of raw boys to India to form new regiments of infantry and cavalry, they were so diminutive and ill-shaped that Natives called them "dumpees," and said it was not with such soldiers that we fought on the Sutlej, and that with such soldiers they should like to have a contest with us again.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN, said, the question was, whether the proposition not to send out of this country soldiers under 20 years of age could be combined with a system of voluntary service. He implored the Committee to pause before they adopted a clause which would prevent the Government from sending out of the country under any circumstances men under 20 years of age. Not only would such a clause shackle the Government, but it would not accomplish the object which his hon. and learned Friend had in view, because in a dozen ways the law about the age of a man would be evaded. Take the case of a pressing demand for recruits for India. They knew very well how recruiting was conducted. The recruiting sergeant, under pressure, would get men of less than 20 years of age. What they wanted was a system whereby they would be sure that the men they sent out of the country were physically capable of performing the duties they had to perform in India, and that was not to be attained by a test of age, but by a test of physical capacity and experience.

Clause negatived.

LORD ELCHO said, he must deny that the opponents of the Bill had shown a want of appreciation for the greatness of the question involved in the Bill. He would be the last man to criticize with hostility any proposal of the Government to give to the country a real Army of Reserve, but he contended that the scheme of the Government would simply supply a Reserve of very young instead of experienced men. Hitherto they had been always deficient in a supply of men whenever an emergency arose, and the result was that they were compelled to have recourse to foreign mercenaries. At no time had they ever put in line more than 40,000 men, and their system had invariably failed and broken down whenever the test of war was applied to it. In 1855, with an established strength of 185,000, they had only 143,000 serving; in 1856, with an established strength of 205,000, only 155,000 were serving; and in 1858, with an established strength of 169,000, only 147,000 were serving. These were circumstances which justified the Government in seriously considering the propriety of forming an Army of Reserve, although their experience, as evidenced from the attempt of 1847, had not been satisfactory in its results. He did not object to the proposal that no soldier should be sent out of the country before he was 20 years of age, but he would hesitate before he gave his assent to a proposition that no recruit should be accepted before he was 20. He thoroughly repudiated the idea that he was in favour of conscription as stated by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Surveyor General of the Ordnance. All he believed was, that there should be a system of conscription for home service, for he was convinced that without it they would not be able to re-organize their military system. There should be compulsory service without substitutes of any kind. Lord Sandhurst in "another place" had denounced the regulations issued by the Secretary of State for War, and he (Lord Elcho) held in his hand a letter from the commander of the regiment now under orders for India, in which it was stated that if the Reserve scheme was carried out the regiments would be little better than recruiting depôts. The Government thought they could do away with pensions, and that they would find men willing to come and serve them for three years for 14*d.* a-day, and then go into the Reserve. Hitherto the recruiting system had been based upon the system of pensions, which he believed was sound. But if pensions were abandoned, they should have recourse to increase of pay.

Colonel Sykes

MR. CARDWELL: I do not rise to Order. But what is the Motion of the noble Lord?

LORD ELCHO: That no soldier shall be permitted to enter the Reserve force until he shall have completed his twenty-third year.

THE CHAIRMAN: I understood the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire rose to move the insertion after Clause 10 of the clause which stands in his name on the Notice Paper. The proper time for the noble Lord to move his Motion is after the new clauses on the Paper have been disposed of.

SIR WILLIAM RUSSELL, on rising to move the insertion of a new clause to fix the terms of enlistment, said, he wished to elicit from the Government a statement of their views as to the mode in which the strength and discipline of the Army were to be maintained in the future. In his opinion the three years' scheme had signally failed, and the only possible plan would be to constitute the Militia the foundation of the Army; indeed, the Militia would be sufficient for all practical purposes if England had not to look after India and her colonies. That being his view, the next point to be considered was, how nearly they could approach the best arrangement for a thoroughly efficient Militia viewed in a theoretical point of view, and at the same time establish a system which should be consistent with the wishes and habits of the people of this country. Theoretically, the best system would be that of enforcing three years' compulsory service, as was the case in Prussia; but as such a system would in this country be simply impracticable, he proposed that balloting should only be resorted to in order to complete the annual quota provided by Parliament for the general Militia, in cases where such quota could not be completed by voluntary enlistment. At the same time, he must express his personal opinion that by means of voluntary enlistment the necessary number of men would be raised. Taking, then, the Militia as the nucleus of the Army both for home and foreign service, it was important that the whole of the men should pass through one uniform training, and that the instructors should be competent to afford the necessary training in a space of time sufficiently short not to unfit the men for returning to their ordinary occupations in civil life. This object would be met by providing that the enlistment should be for a term of one year's service in the general Militia, this to be supplemented by five years' service in the regular Militia, of 14 days in each year, and 10 years in the First Militia Reserve, of 14 days in every second year. As he had said, the protection of India and the colonies alone necessitated a standing Army of long-service men, and he therefore proposed that men to serve in the Army should, after a year's service in the general Militia, be allowed voluntarily to enlist to serve for 12 years in the Army. Then, to meet the various necessities that must arise on a sudden declaration of war, he proposed that after this 12 years' term of service had been completed the men should remain for a further similar period in the First Army Reserve, to be called out in the event of war to complete their respective regiments from a peace to a war establishment. And as an inducement to men to enter the Reserve he desired that there should be held out to them, after 12 years' service, the certain prospect of obtaining such service in some one of the civil departments of the Government as should enable them to live. He hoped that Government would cease to treat the Militia unfairly, but would give them such chances and opportunities of embodiment as would enable them to show their true quality; and that if they rejected this scheme of Army organization, they would at least give some small intimation of what they were going to put forward as their basis. On the whole, he must say that as this country was not, in his opinion, so well prepared now to take the field as at the time of the Crimean War, the Government were bound to discontinue their appearance of trifling with the subject, and should at once put into motion measures which would perfect Army organization in the future. The hon. and gallant Member then moved the insertion of a new clause enacting the several particulars described in his speech.

[Committee—New Clause.]

MR. CARDWELL said, he agreed with many of the principles laid down by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Norwich (Sir William Russell), but did not think the House would consent to so wide a departure from the established institutions of the country as the proposition involved. The House, he believed, was prepared to follow a plan which, proceeding upon the existing institutions of the country, would combine together the Army, the Militia, and the other forces, whereas, if he understood rightly, his hon. and gallant Friend proposed to reduce very largely the amount of their infantry force, and substitute for it what he called a general Militia. That would be a body of 50,000 men, who were intended to form a general training school for all the Militia and the Regular forces of the country. It was proposed that through that body should be passed all the men serving either in the Army or the Militia; that they should have the choice of serving in either, but at the end of one year should pass onward to the one or the other; that that force should be raised by voluntary enlistment if that would do, and if not by compulsory service; and that it should be officered by officers of the Regular Army. He thought the principle which the House would prefer was rather the opposite one of making the Army a model for the Militia and Reserve forces, as adopted originally by Mr. Pitt and followed since. Besides that objection which he had stated, there were many practical difficulties in the way of carrying out his hon. and gallant Friend's scheme. He doubted whether anybody would voluntarily enlist without knowing whether he would eventually go into the Army or the Militia; and if a large majority of those who enlisted wished to serve in the Militia, there could be no reliance on recruits for the Army. Therefore they might go to a large expense without having any security as to what proportion of the body, for the maintenance of which it had been incurred, would enter the Army. Thus, in case of emergency, instead of having the 50,000 men divided into regiments who could be supplemented from the Reserves, they would have only a large body of recruits of less than 12 months' service. Besides, there would be a lack of local interest, and the officers being taken from the Army, the Militia officers would feel that they had been passed over. Upon the whole, then, he hoped that his hon. and gallant Friend would be satisfied with the plan the Government had proposed, which was that they should recruit for the Army separately from the Militia, and that arrangements should be made with regard to associating supernumeraries from regiments of the Line with the Militia, so that a military feeling and principle might be infused into all the defensive forces of the country. The regiments being localized and recruiting in their own districts, and the Militia training with the Regular Army, he thought the object which his hon. and gallant Friend had in view would be accomplished without making a violent change.

MR. M. CHAMBERS said, he was not convinced that the Amendment was wrong, because they ought to maintain in the future, as they had done in the past, a good Militia as a feeder to the Army; in fact, in past times it had always been termed the "nursery of the Army." He could remember the East Kent Militia furnishing a large number of volunteers for actual service, and nine-tenths of the Staffordshire Militia volunteering to join a battalion of the Guards in Holland. The Militia ought to be placed upon the same footing that it was in those times; but to do this efficiently they must avoid compulsory service. The speech of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) was one of the most practical speeches on the subject that he had ever heard from a man who did not belong to the Army. Let the rustics know that they would be well off, and they would never have any need of compulsion to make men enter their Army. The Militia ought to be made a great nursery for the Army, and that could be done by making the service attractive. The men should receive good pay; and it was not for only three or four weeks that they should be called out. To call them out for such a short time was not merely absurd, but worse—it was corrupting these unhappy ragged young men. Then what sort of regimentals were served out to them? Did hon. Gentlemen ever see a Militiaman with his regimentals on? Of all the exhibitions that a smart military man could see, the most grotesque was a Militiaman who had recently got on his regimentals. The authorities began by giving them a worse and coarser cloth of a dirty brickdust colour, so that they always appeared as though they had been parading or exercising in a brickfield, and the consequence was that no Militiaman was ever proud of his regimentals. That might appear a small matter, but it was in reality of no trifling importance so far as the feelings of those men were concerned. Besides giving the Militiaman good pay, they should let him see that by joining the Army his pay would be adequate, his position and prospects improved, and that after a certain period of service he would get a pension; then they would find the Militia would become of service to the country. But, so far as he had observed, there was no scheme for pension in the plan of the Government. It was quite inconsistent with their Constitution, except in very great emergencies, to compel anyone, however humble, to serve in a military force. The instant they said they would have a Ballot, that instant some persons would have a right to reply—"Very well; but everyone, high or low, rich or poor, must be exposed to it, and no man shall purchase a substitute." That was the test that would try the sincerity of the great persons who said—"We must resort to the Ballot."

Sir William Russell

CAPTAIN BEAUMONT said, he must regret that this should have been the first night on which an opportunity was given of really debating the question of Army organization. The longer the country considered the question the more confident did he feel that it would come to the conclusion that the Estimates for the Army would be increased when purchase was done away with. It would, in his opinion, have been far more satisfactory if the Government had come down to the House and laid before it a system of re-organization comprehensive as a whole, and which, further, would have had the effect of reducing the Estimates to a certain amount. Before the country had done with the system of purchase it would find that it would have to pay double the £8,000,000 which had been named as the cost of its abolition. The Government, he might add, had spoken of the question of re-organization as a matter the detail of which would be settled in the future. To that mode of proceeding he, for one, altogether demurred. The question of re-organization must, he contended, be dealt with in the first instance as a matter of principle, and it was impossible to consider details until the question of principle was decided; the views generally held divided themselves into three parts—first, those adopted in the War Office Bill of last year—practically to leave things as they were; secondly, the views of those who said the Militia, as a body, ought to be increased in efficiency; and thirdly, the view that he thought would recommend itself most strongly to the country, which was that every soldier should be a soldier in fact as well as in name, and he could be that only by passing through the ranks of the Regular Army. It was said, however, that to attain that object was extremely difficult, as it amounted to applying the Prussian system to this country without conscription. In his opinion it was possible to do so, and for this reason that they were fortunately blessed with so much wealth, that they could afford to pay money for the services of men such as no other nation could. The true course to take would be to give such attractions to the Army as would enable them to obtain men fit for the service, and as soon as that was done the introduction of the Prussian system—by which he meant passing all the men through the ranks of the Regular Army—might be accepted without recourse to conscription. As to the system of short service, it had not been fairly tried. The proper and cheapest way for the Government to proceed was, in his opinion, to trust for their defensive powers to a defensive force which would cost £15 a-man, rather than to a Regular Army which would cost £50 a-man. That he was, however, aware would involve a separate Army for India. He could not look upon the time which had been spent in discussing the Bill as wasted, and there was, he thought, a very strong relationship between the questions of purchase and re-organization. The principle of the abolition of purchase he accepted on the understanding that a comprehensive plan of re-organization would be introduced next Session. Indeed, he considered the Government were pledged to bring in then a real scheme of Army reform.

[Committee—New Clause.

LORD GARLIES said, he very much regretted that such a great question as that should have been brought forward in the middle of the dinner hour. He could not say that he went as far as his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Norwich (Sir William Russell) who had brought forward this Motion; but at the same time he thought that there was in this scheme the germs of what might be productive of great good to the country. He thought they were all agreed on the point that our military system would be the better for some re-organization. He had already recommended a scheme on this subject, and although he had received no support for it on his or the other side of the House, he was still vain enough to think not the less of it on that account. The misfortune of their military system now was, that there was too heterogeneous a scheme proposed by the Government for its regulation, and which failed to repair the great mistake committed in reducing the Army two years ago, before they had the nucleus of a Reserve force. The elements of their military system at present were, in his mind, sufficient — namely, the Regulars, the Militia, and the Volunteers. Now, he thought that the Militia force should not only be the nursery of the Line, but it should also be the receptacle of the Line, after the men had given a certain service in the latter. That was his former proposition, and, although it had not met with the support of the Committee, he was happy to see by an article in one of the leading journals of that morning that it now received some favour. ["Agreed, agreed!"] As the Government had thought proper to withdraw the enlistment portion of their scheme, he regretted that they did not bring forward some clauses having for their object to take advantage of the service of the men who had served for a certain time in the Army by embodying them in the Militia. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) had accused the party on the Opposition side of the House for the course they had taken against this Bill, and expressed his regret that they had not taken a similar course to that they had followed in respect to the Irish Church and the Irish Land Bills. He (Lord Garlies) would tell the hon. and learned Gentleman that the reason why they had not acted in a similar manner during the discussions upon the two measures alluded to was because the Government had kept nothing back when proposing their Irish Church and the Irish Land schemes. If the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not played the parts of Ananias and Sapphira in their Army Bill, they would not have received the persistent opposition which they encountered to their present proposal. As for himself (Lord Garlies) he should ever glory in the part which he had been allowed to take in respect to this Bill; and if an appeal were to be now made to the country he should with confidence rely for the continued support of his constituents on the persistent and uncompromising opposition which he had given to this measure of Her Majesty's Government.

Captain Beaumont

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to call attention to the somewhat peculiar position in which the Committee stood at that moment. The Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Norwich had special reference to the question of enlistment. He (Sir John Pakington) hoped he should not be considered out of Order if he asked the hon. and learned Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens) what course he intended to take in respect to his Amendment. The hon. and learned Member had brought forward a question of primary importance in regard to the organization of the Army. But, important as it was, the Government had given up one-half of their Bill, including the enlistment part, and still called their measure an Army Organization Bill.

MR. CARDWELL said, he wished to interrupt the right hon. Baronet, in order to remind him of the correct designation of the Bill. It was an Army Regulation Bill.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he was willing to adopt that designation, and to call it an Army Regulation Bill. But the most important subject connected with the measure was that of enlistment. Upon that particular subject there were originally clauses introduced into the Bill by the Government; but all those they had subsequently withdrawn, and as the Bill now stood, there was not one word in it touching upon that great question of how the Army was to be constituted, and how it was to be recruited. Under these circumstances the hon. and learned Member for Finsbury stepped in with his Amendment in order to supply this extraordinary defect in the Bill—that Amendment laying down a principle as to how the enlistment for their Army was to be regulated hereafter. In the course of the discussion which took place the plans of the Government were criticized with much severity. But the Secretary for War made no reply. The discussion closed without any explanation on the part of the Government, except that contained in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, who seemed to intimate the consent of the Government to the principle brought forward by a private Member, with a view to supply the deficiency in the Bill of the Government. Under these circumstances he hoped the hon. and gallant Member for Norwich would excuse him (Sir John Pakington) if he passed by for a moment his clause, for the purpose of asking the hon. and learned Member for Finsbury after what had passed on this important subject, and after the suggestion thrown out by the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, what course he intended to take under the peculiar circumstances of the question in reference to the Amendment which he had brought forward?

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must remind the right hon. Baronet that the question before the Committee then was the Amendment proposed by the hon. and gallant Member for Norwich, and not the proposed clause of the hon. and learned Member for Finsbury.

MAJOR WALKER said, he was quite willing to admit that the proposal to amalgamate the Militia with the Regular Army appeared at first sight to be one of great advantage. But on looking further into the proposal, there arose great difficulties in connection with it. The proposal of the hon. and gallant Member for Norwich (Sir William Russell) was one fraught with much difficulty, for this reason—the amount of the population who would be found willing to devote itself to active military life was very limited. The supply of recruits was not materially influenced at first by pecuniary considerations. He did not therefore think that the proposal would materially increase the number of recruits. He had advocated a reform of our system regarding the Reserve forces; but with all its defects he thought it was a powerful engine for maintaining the supplies for our Regular Army. The real strength of the Militia service had never yet been tested though it had been shown, during the Crimean and Indian Campaigns, how strong and useful a force it might become. The Volunteers, beyond doubt, had thrown it into the shade, from which he believed that it was now emerging, probably in consequence of the countenance and support of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War.

SIR WILLIAM RUSSELL said, that he had no desire to press the clause, as his principal object had been to bring the subject under the attention of the House. He hoped that by next Session the Government would be prepared to act on sound principles with regard to the subject.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD ELCHO said, that he should not now propose the clause that stood in his name; but on the Report he should propose as an Amendment, that no soldier should be allowed to enter the Reserve force until he had completed his twenty-third year.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON moved to insert a new Clause—(Militia places for arms, &c., not to be provided by justices of the peace.) He considered that as the Government had severed the connection between the Lords Lieutenant of counties and the Militia, it was fair that it should bear the burden of the expense of the military stores, which purpose he thought his proposition would effect, and thereby remove an element of discord from between the Justices of the Peace and the War Office. In the county of Middlesex the annual cost of the Militia storehouses was £2,000, and in Lancashire it was £1,383. It was desirable that all storehouses and barracks should be under one authority—namely, the War Office. Without further detaining the Committee he begged to move the clause of which he had given Notice.

[Committee—New Clause.]

New Clause (Militia places for arms, &c. not to be provided by justices of the peace,)—(Lord George Hamilton,)—brought up, and read the first time.

MR. F. STANLEY said, he should support the clause, which, he hoped, would receive the favourable consideration of the Government. At present, depôts of arms and stores were scattered over various parts of the country, and that would occasion much practical inconvenience if a concentration of troops should become necessary.

MR. CARDWELL said, that the point involved in the clause was pecuniarily a small one, yet it was well worthy of consideration; but in the present position of the whole question of local rating, he thought it undesirable to touch upon the mere fringe of it that was involved in the present proposal, and he hoped that the noble Lord would not object to allow it to stand over till the subject, as a whole, came to be considered by Parliament. He was not arguing against the proposal, but only reserved it for perfectly free and fair discussion at a future time.

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, he thought that they would never be in a stronger position to discuss this question than now, and he hoped that the clause of the noble Lord would be consented to by the House. The grievance of the Militia storehouses was that the burden of their maintenance was most unjust, and one that pressed heavily on the local rates, as the numerous Petitions that had been presented to Parliament proved. In Devonshire they had paid as much as £23,000 in the last 10 years for Militia storehouses, and at the rate of £1,000 per annum for the last three years. The Militia was to be a national force, and for that reason he trusted that the noble Lord would persevere with the clause.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he knew of no part of that Bill which better illustrated the embarrassing position in which the House was placed by the Bill than the very reasonable proposal which this clause contained. They had heard a great deal in the course of those discussions of the merits of the Prussian system, and they had been half given to understand that the Government had some idea of introducing that system to some extent into their new system for this country. Now, what was the primary characteristic of the Prussian system? That it was localized throughout. Whereas, the consequence of the proposals of the Government would be that the local connection of the Militia in its Staff and its elementary organization would be destroyed. If they passed through a Prussian district they would find that some one or other corps of the Prussian Army was raised specially from that district, and if they entered any of the principal towns or villages they would find the name of the corps, or of the regiment, with its Reserves of these posted up conspicuously; the officers of the corps were connected with the locality; each detachment in its respective locality had its own local commander over it, whether it was drawn into the active Army, or whether it formed a part of the Reserve. The great strength of the Prussian system consisted in this—that every locality had its own central military point, to which each branch of the local service could resort; whether it was to form part of the active Army or of the Reserves, the Landwehr or the Landsturm, all of which were locally connected with each other. Now, by that Bill of the Government, by thus severing the connection between the Militia and the Lords Lieutenant, who at present appointed the officers, they were asked to destroy the local influences which connected the Militia regiments with the several counties; throughout the whole of that measure the Government showed no regard whatever for locality in the arrangements, whether for the Militia or for the Regular Army; whilst, as he had said, localism was the very essence of the Prussian system, which had answered so well, and in praise of which they had heard so much in the course of those debates. If they would have a centralized administration, they ought to draw the funds for its maintenance from the central source—the public Revenue. The further they proceeded in carrying out the system of centralization, the less should the burden rest upon local taxation. He was quite confident that the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) represented the deliberate judgment of the ratepayers in what he had said. In the several counties they were all willing to assist in the provision of forces for the defence of the country; all were praying that the Government and Parliament, while respecting the local connection of the Militia, would take steps to improve and render efficient the discipline of that force; all were ready to contribute to that object; and he believed that nothing would be better calculated to improve the organization and spirit of the Army generally, than to attach to each particular county the regiment which bore its name for recruiting purposes, in the same manner as was done in Prussia. Nothing could be better than the establishment in England of the same relations between the Regular Army, the Militia, and the counties, on the same principle that in Prussia there existed a connection between each active regiment, each regiment of the Landwehr and of Landsturm with their particular district. Our ancient system was, in fact, analogous to that of Prussia; but if they were determined to break it up, if they were resolved, instead of imitating the German system, which had been so marvellously successful in the late war, to imitate the French, or create a mongrel system of their own, they could not be surprised if the counties—if the ratepayers of the counties—called upon them to undertake the expense of the system. Like the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon, then, he objected to the period of suspense which was suggested; if the Government were about to take out of the hands of the counties, and out of the hands of the Lords Lieutenant of counties, all control over the Militia, he was unwilling that any period should intervene during which, having deprived the Lords Lieutenant of counties of such control, the Government should continue to dip their fingers into the county purse. That appeared to him to be an attempt to disguise the amount of taxation, which by means of Imperial or local taxation the people of this country, and especially the owners of real property, were called upon to bear. He regretted, then, the course which the Government were pursuing, by the adoption of that system of centralization, without, as he considered, any corresponding advantage to discipline; and of that he was confident, that if the counties, through their Lords Lieutenant and Justices of the Peace, were to be deprived of all control over, and all share in providing for the defence of the country, they had a just claim to be relieved from the burden which the proposal of the Government would entail upon them.

Lord George Hamilton

MAJOR GENERAL SIR PERCY HERBERT said, there was a strong feeling that the Regular troops should be amalgamated to some extent with the Militia, and for that purpose barracks in every county would be necessary for the purpose of training the recruits of the Militia, and of getting rid of the odious system of billeting in publichouses. If that was admitted, it was discouraging to find that Her Majesty's Government, when the question of building barracks for the Militia was under consideration, proposed to defer the whole matter until they had legislated on the intricate subject of local taxation. He asked the Committee what chance there was of such legislation, and whether they did not think it trifling with the subject of Army regulation?

MR. HENLEY said, he hoped the Government would assent to the proposal of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton). The expenditure had during several years very much increased, and had given rise to much dissatisfaction, both in counties and in boroughs, because the counties first laid out the money, and then called on the cities and boroughs to contribute their quota, they having no voice in the matter. That was not a pleasant state of things. It was more than likely that the new arrangements would involve an increased expenditure. The county rates were levied on one species of property alone; but the general defence of the country rendered it a fair matter that this expenditure should be discharged out of the national funds, more especially when it was remembered that the charge was likely to increase. We had put the counties to vast expense for lunatic asylums and gaols. There were few counties that were not in debt for those purposes and for Militia barracks. He trusted that the Government would give this matter a favourable consideration, which would go far to remove some of the unpopularity of the measure.

[Committee—New Clause.]

MR. GLADSTONE said, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had not shown any indisposition to "look this question in the face," nor did he speak on the supposition of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes), that the question of local taxation would be indefinitely postponed. On the contrary, that was one of the questions to which Parliament was anxious to apply itself at a very early period; though, if the subject of local taxation were to be postponed for any length of time, it might be very fair to demand that this question should be dealt with by itself in a special measure. The Government objected to the proposal of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton), because it was not germane to the purpose of the Bill; but beyond that they had to consider whether this clause was sufficient for the purpose for which it was intended. To him it appeared that the clause did not deal adequately with the subject, for the contention of the noble Lord was that the charge for the Militia buildings should be transferred from the counties to the Consolidated Fund; yet that was not sufficiently met by the provisions of the clause, which absolved the Justices of the Peace from any obligation to provide buildings, but was ambiguous on the subject of maintaining existing ones, while it provided that those buildings should remain liable to the mortgage charges which had already been contracted. The clause, to be effectual, ought to provide for the transfer of the mortgage charges; but that could not be done by a stroke of the pen, and it was not in the power of the noble Lord to establish such a charge on the Consolidated Fund. That was a subject which would require much consideration; and, therefore, the Government thought the clause was premature in principle, as well as inadequate to carry out the object in view. The wiser course would be to refrain from introducing the clause into this Bill, reserving the right to have it dealt with in a special measure, after there had been an opportunity for considering the question of local taxation.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he thought the clause was not premature in principle, for it having already been decided to remove all power over the Militia to the Crown, the demand to transfer the expense to the national funds was a necessary and a just corollary. With respect to the objection of the Premier that the clause did not go far enough, he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that if this clause were read a second time it would be competent to the Government to amend or add to it with a view to carry out its principle. He could not concur in the argument that his noble Friend ought to withdraw this clause, because the Government promised that in a future Session there should be a measure for altering the law of local taxation. Were the Committee so well satisfied with the general principles of the measure which the Government had already brought forward on that subject, that they would be willing to postpone the question now before them until a remote period, when some uncertain legislation might be attempted? This proposal was not the mere fringe of local taxation, but related to the military expenditure of the country, and he hoped the Committee would take a legitimate opportunity to carry into effect a change which was rendered just and necessary by a previous clause in the Bill. For that reason he hoped his noble Friend would press his Motion to a division.

COLONEL GILPIN said, he should support the clause, holding that, as the Militia was about to be amalgamated with the Regular force, it was only just that this charge should be met out of Imperial resources, and that this was the proper time for dealing with the matter.

MR. BRISTOWE said, that although he agreed in its principle, he thought the clause would be singularly out of place in that Bill as it now stood.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he had not brought forward the clause with any wish to prejudge the question of local taxation, but because the subject of Militia storehouses was one legitimately connected with an Army Regulation Bill. In answer to the observations of the Prime Minister, he might say that his object in drawing the clause was to relieve Justices of the Peace of the obligation to provide Militia storehouses; and that accomplished, he would leave it to the Secretary of State, to whose functions it would properly belong, to make such other arrangements as might be necessary. By his clause no existing mortgage would be thrown on the Consolidated Fund.

Mr. Henley

COLONEL SYKES said, he must oppose the clause, as it would throw unexpectedly charges upon the Consolidated Fund which the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have to provide for.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he thought if the Government were going to undertake the expenditure of the money, they ought to be responsible for providing it, and was of opinion that they ought to accept the clause. He hoped, however, they would not do so, because there would be an additional ground of complaint whenever the subject of local taxation came under discussion.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause be read a second time."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 174; Noes 176: Majority 2.

COLONEL GILPIN asked whether the Prime Minister would, after that division, persist in his opposition to the clause?

MR. GLADSTONE asked whether the hon. and gallant Member was aware that he was in a minority, and that the clause was beyond his control?

COLONEL GILPIN suggested that it might be brought up on the Report.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the reason he had given was conclusive against that course, and he believed the hon. and gallant Gentleman would himself think so.

MR. HENLEY said, he hoped that the Government would take the matter into consideration and put it fairly at rest. This particular clause might not be altogether satisfactory, but the division indicated the feeling of the House upon the spirit of the clause pretty clearly.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he could not give any pledge with respect to the present Bill, but he was perfectly willing to consider the matter.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (VIOLENCE, THREATS, &c.) BILL.

LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

Lords Amendments considered.

Amendments, as far as the Amendment in page 2, line 11, read a second time, and agreed to.

MR. BRUCE said, only one of these Amendments was important. The House would remember that the great object of the Bill was to define the offences committed by any body of workmen more accurately than they were defined by the Act of George IV. The offence of molestation was a difficult one to define, but the principle adopted was that, under this head, there were offences which, without amounting to actual violence, were serious offences, exceeding the mere moral influence which one man might exert over another, even with reference to acts which society generally would not approve. The proposal of the Government was, that when one person with two or more others watched or beset a man's house, they should be subject to the penalties of the Act. The Amendment introduced in the other House left out the words "two or more," so that one man besetting or watching another with a view to coerce would now be subject to punishment. Now, he thought that Amendment infringed one of the main principles of the Bill. The Government held that in these trade disputes the masters might assert their rights and the workmen might assert theirs, inculcating their views or obtaining such information as they judged necessary, the law preventing anything like violence or intimidation. But the effect of the Amendment would be that any one man who stood at the door of any works for the purpose of ascertaining who were going to work there might be held to be there for the purpose of coercing other people. That was carrying the principle too far. As one person might be engaged in watching or seeking for information in a perfectly legitimate manner, he thought it would be better, instead of rejecting the Lords' Amendment, to amend it by inserting words providing that the commission of the offence referred to in the clause should be the act of more than one person before it became punishable. He therefore proposed to insert the words "with one or more persons."

Page 2, line 11, leave out "with two or more persons," the next Amendment, read a second time.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he wished to be understood to represent the interests of law and justice rather than the interest of any particular class in this matter. The question was one of moral or immoral persuasion, and he maintained that if the persuasion were immoral, it was quite as culpable for one person as it was for two. The man who, representing a large body of men, stood at the door of a manufactory, and said anything which had the effect of preventing a workman from going in to begin his labour there—anything which led him to suppose that serious detriment to his interests would ensue if he started work, such an intimidator was as much guilty and as punishable as if he were accompanied by a number of persons. He therefore contended that the Lords' Amendment was one founded on sound reason.

MR. MELLY said, these measures had been thankfully received throughout the country, and he hoped that in the interest of the persons concerned, the compromise of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would be approved by the House.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the question being, whether it was an offence for one person alone to watch another person, with a view to coerce him, it was clear if a workman did that he was guilty of molestation, for the discussion turned on the meaning of the word "molest." It was not simply a question as to one person or more watching, but the offence consisted in the intent to coerce; and such an offence was undoubtedly to be punished whatever might be the number of men offending, for the effect was just the same upon the mind of the workman watched. The Lords' Amendment ought not, therefore, to be amended.

MR. MONK said, he must suggest that in consequence of the form in which the Bill had been sent down from the other House it would be necessary, as a matter of Order, to disagree to the Lords' Amendment before the proposed compromise of the Home Secretary could be considered.

MR. SPEAKER stated that that view of the question of Order was correct.

MR. T. HUGHES said, he would remind the House that just as picketing existed among the workmen, black lists were resorted to by the masters, as was proved before the Trades Union Commission. ["No, no!"] Hon Gentlemen said "No;" but if the practice was not universal it was very general, and masters sent round the names of workmen, with the request that they should not be employed. That was a practice that no legislation could hinder, and as long as that was the case the workmen would feel deeply grieved if they were dealt with in any unequal spirit. The working men already did not consider these Bills a great boon, and any good they possessed would be frustrated if they were deprived of the power of resisting their employers in the case of a lock-out.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, his hon. and learned Friend who had just sat down (Mr. T. Hughes) was rather mistaken as to the point in dispute, for if his reasoning were correct, it would prove that the clause, instead of being amended, should be entirely omitted. The object of the clause was to defend not the capitalist, but the working men from their fellows who wanted to coerce them. If the clause was left in its original state coercion would never be prevented. The managers of trades unions were not wanting in acuteness. If it were illegal for three persons to carry on picketing there would never be more than two. If it were illegal for two, there would be only one. It was necessary, therefore, to prohibit it altogether, and if the Lords' Amendment was adopted, an effective check would be brought into operation.

MR. M'LAREN said, he quite approved of the Lords' Amendment, and he did so in the interests of the working men themselves. It seemed to be assumed that the trades unions were the entire people of England; but surely the non-unionists had a right to be protected, and it would be unfair to give the unionist an advantage over them.

LORD ELCHO said, he agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh. But he was also bound to confirm what was said by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. T. Hughes), that the evidence taken before the Commission proved that black lists were sometimes sent round, a practice which it would be desirable, if possible, to repress. He hoped the House would, in the interests not of capital, but of free labour, not allow picketing in any form, for what was termed the moral suasion of picketing meant nothing more nor less than the moral suasion of the sentry who stood at the door with a musket in his hand. At a meeting over which he presided, Mr. Lucraft stated that the proportion of unionists to non-unionists was as 1 to 17, and therefore the mass of the labour classes were not in trades unions, and it was the duty of that House to maintain freedom of labour by affirming the Lords' Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that because he considered the interests of all working men, and not merely of trades unions, quite as much as the noble Lord who had just spoken (Lord Elcho), he was anxious that the House should not accept the Lords' Amendment. He agreed that the actual trades unionists formed the small minority of working men, but a very large number of artisans sympathized with trades unionists, and many of them believed that it was by trades unions that they obtained protection in disputes between labour and capital; so that unjust or unfair legislation with regard to trades unions would be interpreted by the general body of working men as being antagonistic to themselves. He was interested in this subject not merely as a Member of the Government or of the House, but as a master manufacturer; and he believed nothing could be less to the interests of the latter than the adoption of that Amendment. The actual standing of a man where he had a right to stand was in itself an innocent act, and, therefore, they should not declare it illegal, because other acts might follow which ought to be put down with a strong hand. To take such a course would convey an impression that they were legislating for their own class; and, as the administration of the law would be mainly with the employers, he did not think those persons should be placed in the difficult position of interpreting the Amendment.

MR. HORNBY indignantly denied that the black lists were used by employers in Lancashire, as stated by the hon. and learned Member for Frome (Mr. T. Hughes).

MR. T. HUGHES said, he would undertake to bring the hon. Gentleman half a dozen "black lists" in the morning.

MR. MUNDELLA said, it was not in the textile trades, but in the building, engineering, and colliery businesses that black lists among employers had prevailed. If the trades unionists, 700,000 skilled labourers, were a minority; non-unionists stood behind them, supported them, and derived advantage from their organization; and the net total of 700,000 would not bear multiplication by 17 to arrive at the number of labourers, skilled and unskilled, which the country contained. By placing a man at the door of a factory unionists obtained information as to the extent to which they were being superseded, and that information was likely to lead them to give in. There could be no terrorism in one man looking in at a workshop; but he (Mr. Mundella) would, if possible, put a stop to the watching of private houses. The clause would be severe enough as the Home Secretary proposed to amend it.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, this question related principally to rattening such as was carried on in Sheffield; and was intended to stop the practice. He objected to one class of men preventing others from working at less prices than they worked for themselves.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, he must protest against the charge that had been made by the hon. and learned Member for Frome (Mr. T. Hughes), and the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), that black lists were confined to the building trade. He unhesitatingly stated that it was contrary to the fact. He never saw a black list, and he never knew a master in the trade who had seen one. It had never been charged by the workmen against the masters in the Metropolis that even such a thing had existed.

MR. HERMON said, he had but one object in view, and that was to do justice to both sides. He suggested that instead of rejecting the Lords' Amendment, they should accept it, upon the understanding that it should be made penal on the part of the manufacturers and employers of labour to use a black list. He would rather see two or three persons watching his premises than one person.

MR. J. B. POTTER said, the question was whether picketing could be effectually done with one man, and if so, it was equally injurious to the employer whether it was done by one or two. The question was whether the majority were to be tyrannized over by a minority. If the great majority of trades had a little more firmness and moral courage trades unions would soon cease to exist.

MR. ANDERSON said, there was great difficulty in proving the black list, but none in proving picketing. The House had already decided that two or more persons should be engaged in picketing to make it illegal, but the Lords had struck it out, and since then the working men had offered a compromise by its being confined to one or two.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM said, he must remind the House that they were then engaged in considering a very penal statute. It was not unfair to remind the House that the feeling likely to operate on hon. Members' speeches was rather the feeling of capitalists than of labour. The law was made by men whose sympathies were in that direction, and it would be enforced by men belonging to the same class. But they had to consider what would be the feeling of the class who would be affected by the law—the working classes, or, at least, the unionists.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY said, he would suggest that where the house of a workman was watched the offence should be completed by the act of one man; but that where the watching took place at a factory or workshop, the presence of two should be required to constitute the offence.

MR. C. TURNER said, that everyone acquainted with a manufacturing district knew that the object of picketing was to intimidate. He thought it was the duty of the House to prevent that criminal act.

MR. FIELDEN, as a large manufacturer and a member of a firm which had never had a dispute with its workmen, bore testimony to the tyranny exercised by workmen over their fellows, especially in respect of those rules by which the union obliged the masters to give to all workmen, competent as well as incompetent, the same wages.

MR. BRUCE, on the part of the Government, said, he would accept the suggestion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Recorder, that one person watching the dwelling of a workman should be a crime under the Act, but that at the doors of a manufactory the watch should consist of more than one to be penal.

Mr. J. B. Potter

MR. ILLINGWORTH hoped that the Lords' Amendment would be agreed to by the House.

Motion made, and Question, "That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendment," put, and agreed to.

MR. BRUCE then moved the Amendment which he had just described.

Consequential Amendment proposed,

To insert after the word "House," in page 2, line 12, the words "where such person resides, or the approach to such house, or if with one or more other persons he watch or beset the place where such person works or carries on business, or the approach to such place, or follow such person in a disorderly manner, in or through any street or road."—(Mr. Secretary Bruce.)

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 97; Noes 147: Majority 30.

Subsequent Amendments agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 20th June, 1871.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Life Assurance Companies Act (1870) Amendment* (195).

Second Reading—Oyster and Mussel Fisheries Supplemental (No. 2)* (183); Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 2)* (183); Metropolitan Commons Supplemental (No. 2)* (174); Land Drainage Supplemental* (175); Poor Law (Provisional Orders Confirmation)* (163); Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Supplemental* (172); Police Courts (Metropolis)* (125); Petroleum* (189).

Second Reading—Referred to Select Committee—Locomotives (180); Burial Grounds (181). Report—Betting (129); Gasworks Clauses Act (1847) Amendment (No. 2)* (192).

Third Reading—Charters (Colleges) (93); Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 1)* (127); Lunacy Regulation Amendment (171), and passed; Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, Amendment (193), debate adjourned.

LOCOMOTIVES BILL—(No. 130.)

(The Earl of Dunmore.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF DUNMORE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that the object of the measure was to consolidate the law regulating the use of locomotives on roads. For this purpose it proposed to repeal and to re-enact with modifications "The Locomotives Act, 1861" and "The Locomotives Act, 1865." The principal modifications were these. It substituted an entirely new scale of tolls to be taken after the passing of this Act; it established new regulations as to the weight and size of locomotives, the breadth of the wheels, and the weight to be placed on each pair; and it provided new rules for the manner of working locomotives on turnpike roads and highways. By the Act of 1865 it was provided that three persons should accompany every road steamer; that one of them should precede it by at least 60 yards, displaying a red flag; and that the speed should not exceed four miles an hour in the country, and two miles an hour in towns and villages. These restrictions were very inconvenient—the man with the red flag was a positive nuisance, frightening horses which might otherwise pass the steamer quietly. This Bill enacted that two persons should be required to work each locomotive, and if more than two waggons were attached, an additional person should be employed. The man with the red flag was abolished. The usual pace of drays and vans was three or four miles an hour, and the Bill proposed that locomotives should be allowed the pace of four miles in towns and villages and eight miles in the country. The present crawling pace generated an excess of steam in the boilers, the discharge of which occasioned much noise. In towns the local authorities would be able to impose what restrictions they chose on locomotives running within their area, and he did not suppose that the actual speed on country roads would exceed five or six miles. Traction engines had been much improved since the existing Acts were passed, and great benefit would accrue to traders and the public from their becoming a substitute for horse labour, which was very expensive.

Coalmasters, moreover, were sometimes unable to undertake contracts on account of the insufficient supply of railway trucks. In one case a coalowner lost a contract for 30,000 tons of coals for want of the assistance afforded by steam traction engines. It had been proved that steam omnibuses were practicable, an experiment made in Paris last year being highly successful. The engines there run at the rate of 10 miles an hour without occasioning any inconvenience. They had also been recently tried at Edinburgh, and with success; and they would open up communications with places at some distance from a railway, in cases where a branch line would be too costly to be remunerative.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Dunmore.)

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he was unwilling to oppose the second reading; but considering the important questions it involved, he would suggest that it should be referred to a Select Committee. He agreed with the noble Earl that the man with the red flag was more likely to frighten horses than to act as a safeguard. Captain Tyler, of the Board of Trade, had drawn up a Report on the subject which was generally favourable to the Bill, while recommending certain safeguards. The increased speed now proposed would greatly increase the number of locomotives; but many points would require consideration, such as the tolls, for these steamers caused damage to roads, and turnpikes were likely to be abolished. He therefore hoped the noble Earl would assent to his proposal.

LORD KINNAIRD urged the noble Earl to accept the suggestion. With regard to damage which steamers might do, his experience showed that their broad wheels rather tended to improve the roads over which they passed by acting as rollers; in fact, they did less damage than a horse.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, his experience was exactly the reverse of that of the noble Lord. He had often heard grievous complaints of the utter ruin traction engines wrought on the roads, though he admitted that the wheels might possibly be so adapted as to prevent the damage complained of.

EARL GREY supported the Bill, remarking that steam ploughs, which caused a much greater nuisance than road steamers, were subject to no restrictions. He looked forward to ploughs as well as carts and waggons being drawn by these steamers; and if the Bill, after reference to a Select Committee, did not pass this Session, he hoped the House would refuse to renew the existing Act.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and referred to a Select Committee.

And, on Thursday, June 22, the Lords following were named of the Committee:—

D. Northumberland.	L. Elphinstone.
E. Kellie.	L. Vernon.
E. Radnor.	L. Rossie.
E. Carnarvon.	L. Dunmore.
E. Grey.	L. Barrogill.
E. Morley.	L. Monck.

And, on June 23, The Earl Cowper and The Lord Ravensworth added.

BURIAL GROUNDS BILL—(No. 181.)

(The Earl Beauchamp.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

EARL BEAUCHAMP, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, he had introduced this Bill with the object of preventing those acerbities of feeling which too often arose between the Dissenters and the members of the Church of England at a moment when such feelings were peculiarly undesirable. On the one hand the Dissenters were apt to demand what they were not entitled to by law, and on the other the clergyman was too desirous of ignoring the rights to which his Dissenting brethren were undoubtedly entitled. It was the undoubted right of every parishioner to be buried in the parish churchyard. The Bill consisted of two provisions only. In the first place, it enacted that any parishioner not entitled to burial according to the rites of the Church of England may be interred in the churchyard of the parish without the Burial Service of the Church, provided notice shall have been given to the officiating minister of the parish. The other enactment was, that on the application of any three ratepayers within a Poor Law Union to the Secretary of State, the latter may require the Board of Guardians to provide one or more burial grounds for the burial of persons with rites and ceremonies other than those of the Church of England.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl Beauchamp.)

Earl Grey

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he must oppose the Bill, which appeared to have been very hastily drawn. The first clause enacted that any person not entitled to burial according to the rites of the Church of England might be buried in the churchyard, provided notice were given to the clergyman; but as the clergyman was to have no power of refusal, no purpose would be served by the notice. The 2nd clause would enable any three discontented ratepayers to induce the Home Secretary to compel a Board of Guardians, without consulting the ratepayers, to provide a burial ground, in which persons might be buried with rites and ceremonies other than those of the Church of England. No provision was made that the ratepayers should be consulted, as was the case in every other parochial proceeding—in fact, so far as the Bill went, they were to have no voice in the matter. He thought he had said enough to satisfy their Lordships that the Bill ought not to be read a second time.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY regretted to hear the noble Earl dispose of the Bill in so exceedingly summary a manner. No doubt the question it dealt with was one of serious difficulty. On the one hand there was the profound objection of the clergy of the Church of England—and, indeed, of the laity also—to services other than that of the Church of England within the churchyard; while, on the other hand, Dissenters in some places suffered under a practical grievance in not being allowed to bury their dead in the churchyard with their own services, while they were not provided with any other place where they could do so. It was a matter, therefore, of some importance to find a middle term between these exigencies, and to remedy a real grievance while avowing the embarrassment of protracted controversy. Therefore, he approved of the Bill generally; but the clauses required the addition of some safeguards by the Committee. As to the 1st, he was sure it was never intended to permit processions and orations within the churchyard; and as to the 2nd, he thought it would be sufficient to give authority, at the expense of those who desired it, to purchase under the Lands Clauses Act land for burial grounds in parishes where burial grounds for Dissenters could not be found without such power. In Committee the clauses might be altered so as to be acceptable to the Government; and, considering that they were not likely to settle the question themselves at present, it was scarcely right that they should so cavalierly refuse to entertain the Bill.

LORD PORTMAN objected to any measure which would increase local taxation, and especially to the proposition that any three ratepayers of the Union should be enabled to move the Secretary of State to impose such an expenditure on the Union. A Select Committee on the question might be desirable, or their Lordships might wait for a Bill to come up from the other House, where the matter had been much discussed.

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER agreed with the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) that this was a very grave question. It was much better that their Lordships should endeavour to adjust the question by independent action, meeting the reasonable object both of the Dissenters and of those who upheld the rights of the Church of England, than that they should wait for the Bill, which had been for a long time struggling to get through the other House, and which when it did come up might be found to contain provisions which could not be granted, but the rejection of which would be invidious. He agreed with the noble Marquess that some Bill should be introduced to meet the reasonable desires of Dissenters, and prevent that irritation which might be difficult to allay by legislation. It was a great hardship to those who dissented from the Church of England, and who objected to the services used by the Church over the dead, that they should be in any way compelled, as the condition of a parishioner's right to be buried in the churchyard, to have that service read at the burial. They ought to remove as much as possible everything which savoured of those unhappy divisions which at present existed. If he were a conscientious Dissenter, and disapproved of the Burial Service of the Church of England, he should feel it a hard thing to be obliged, on bearing the body of his child to its last resting place, to have a service read of which he disapproved, and which was repugnant to his feelings. The Dissenters had a real grievance, which it was the duty of Parliament to redress. On the other hand, to allow services to be read in the churchyard different to that of the Church of England would be an absolute violation of the principle of an Established Church, and would undoubtedly lead to the most painful opposition, hostility, and acerbity at the very moment when all parties should wish to exclude them. It would make the churchyard the arena of acrimonious contests, and would give persons who denied the existence of a future state the opportunity of declaring that the deceased had ceased to be, and that they did not indulge the vain dream of a resurrection. The noble Earl's Bill would not meet the difficulty, for Unions might extend over many miles, and Dissenters being frequently the poorest part of the population, it would not be right to tell them they could bury their dead in their own way at a place 12 miles off. Probably the best way of meeting the difficulty would be that the acquisition of separate grounds in parishes should be facilitated, and landowners whose estates were strictly entailed might be allowed on such and such terms to grant a small piece of ground for the use of Dissenting communities. This would be a great relief. He did not want to rigidly enforce the rules of the Church of England, but to make liberal allowance for those who did not wish for its service. He thought that when the deceased before death, or his friends after it, objected to the Church service, he should be entitled to honourable and reverential burial in the churchyard, with no service in the churchyard, after whatever service they pleased in their own place of worship before entering the churchyard. A Select Committee might devise a scheme which would prevent their Lordships being troubled another Session with a question likely to excite acrimonious feeling.

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, all he sought was to remove an admitted evil in the speediest and most satisfactory way possible. He had no objection to the reference of the Bill to a Select Committee.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, all their Lordships must desire that this question should be settled; but he doubted if the Bill would cure the evil it was intended to deal with. He thought the general feeling of their Lordships was that this Bill could not be accepted; but he hoped the Government would assent to the course proposed, in order that a measure might be devised which would remedy the existing grievance without being open to the objections to which the Bill was at present open.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he should be happy to assent to the proposal on the part of Her Majesty's Government, in the earnest hope that this question, which had given rise to such deep feeling, might be settled in some satisfactory manner.

LORD PORTMAN objected to the Bill being referred to a Select Committee.

THE EARL OF MORLEY explained that what he had meant to assent to was the reference of the subject, not of the Bill, to a Select Committee. The Government could not in any case be regarded as pledged to support the provisions of the Bill.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he thought it would be better to go to a Select Committee on the recital, whether it was expedient to amend the law of burial in England and Wales, and not hamper themselves with the clauses by reading the Bill a second time, but leave it to the Select Committee to devise a plan that might be acceptable to both sides of the House.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND, for the reasons given by the noble Duke (the Duke of Cleveland), hoped their Lordships would give the measure a second reading. As the noble Duke had said, their Lordships objected to both the two operative clauses of the Bill, and therefore there was nothing left to be laid before the Select Committee but the Preamble of the Bill—namely, "whereas it is expedient to amend the law of burials in England and Wales." Now, it was because he thought it was expedient to amend the law of burials that he wanted their Lordships to assent to the second reading. Unless they were agreed as far as that went, there would be nothing at all to go before a Select Committee.

EARL GRANVILLE believed there was a general agreement among their Lordships as to the object to be attained. It seemed to be thought that while that Bill was not one which the House should adopt, the question to which it related was one that it was desirable to endeavour to settle. The case might, perhaps, be met by referring the Bill at once to a Select Committee.

LORD REDESDALE said, the Bill could not be committed until it had been read the second time.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and referred to a Select Committee.

And, on Tuesday, June 27, the Lords following were named of the Committee:—

D. Somerset.	E. Morley.
D. Cleveland.	E. Beauchamp.
M. Salisbury.	V. Eversley.
M. Bristol.	L. Bp. Winchester.
E. Airlie.	L. Boyle.
E. Dartmouth.	L. Belper.
E. Carnarvon.	L. Lyveden.
E. Nelson.	L. Westbury.

CHARTERS (COLLEGES) BILL.—(No. 73.) (The Lord Privy Seal.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^d."
—(The Lord Privy Seal.)

LORD REDESDALE said, the Bill provided that in case of the grant of any charter for the foundation of any college or University, a copy of such charter shall be laid before Parliament for not less than 30 days before it was presented to Her Majesty for signature, and that during that period either House might present an Address to Her Majesty praying her to withhold her signature. Now, this was not only an invasion of the prerogative of the Crown, but was directly opposed to the grounds on which the Government resisted the Amendments of his noble Friend near him (the Marquess of Salisbury) on the University Tests Bill. He was surprised that any Government should have introduced such a measure as this.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX defended the Government in bringing in this Bill, pointing out that there was a great distinction between the proposal of the University Tests Bill and the principle of the present Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the state of legislation on this subject stood thus:—The fellows of colleges were considered sufficiently trustworthy to be entitled to alter or modify their charters to any extent without the consent of Parliament; but the Crown was thought so inferior to fellows of colleges, and so utterly untrustworthy, that securities were required in regard to the action of the Crown, which were considered superfluous and ridiculous in regard to the action of the colleges. This was a curious position to which the various exigencies of sectarian animosity had driven Her Majesty's Government. He sympathized with the Government in having to swallow so many contradictions; but that was one of the penalties attached to holding office by the consent of a somewhat unruly party. The present Bill was not only objectionable as derogating from the prerogative of the Crown, but as a singularly useless piece of legislation, the only result of which would be to make trustees more commonly used than charters.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, there was a wide difference between the case of the fellows of colleges under the University Tests Bill and the position of the Crown under this Bill. No analogy could be drawn between them.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 3^a accordingly with the Amendments, and passed, and sent to the Commons.

LUNACY REGULATION AMENDMENT
BILL—(No. 171.)—(The Lord Chancellor.)
THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^a."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD CAIRNS said, he looked upon the Bill as a somewhat dangerous measure, inasmuch as it would make a new class of persons the subjects of lunacy jurisdiction. It proposed that "persons of weak mind" should be brought within the jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor. The term "person of weak mind" was very vague and indefinite, and was not made much more certain by the definition. Neither was there any indication of who might originate proceedings in lunacy against a "person of weak mind." The Bill merely provided "that on a petition presented in a summary manner," the Lord Chancellor might make an order. This might lead to very improper proceedings. The jurisdiction which was to be created by the Bill was one altogether unknown in this country, and he trusted that his noble and learned Friend would pause before carrying into effect a measure of this nature.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was somewhat surprised at the objection raised by his noble and learned Friend, because until this moment he had not the slightest idea that his noble and learned Friend viewed the measure unfavourably. The provisions contained in the Bill were, he believed, much needed in those cases where a man, though not actually insane, was physically and mentally incapable of managing his own affairs; and as the powers conferred were surrounded by ample safeguards, he trusted that his noble and learned Friend would not press his objection.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 3^a accordingly, and passed, and sent to the Commons.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) ACT
(1870) AMENDMENT BILL.
(The Lord Cairns.)

(Nos. 185, 193.) THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^a."
—(The Lord Cairns.)

LORD GREVILLE said, the object of the measure was to resolve some doubts in regard to the Landlord and Tenant Act, which had been raised by a recent judgment of a Lord Justice of Appeal, and had been hastily introduced and pressed through its stages with great rapidity. But as there was an important point affecting the conveyance of property in regard to the Ulster custom, on which it was desirable to take legal opinion, he hoped the noble and learned Lord who had charge of the Bill (Lord Cairns) would postpone the third reading for a day or two.

LORD CAIRNS said, that under the circumstances stated he would not object to postpone the third reading.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE confessed to a feeling of anxiety from the course adopted with reference to this Bill. The Judges appointed to carry out the provisions of the Irish Land Act were not, as was the case with the other Judges, paid fixed salaries. Beyond question the Judges of this Court would carry out the law with the same independence as the other Judges of the land; yet as this state of things was calculated to create an impression in the public mind that they would lean to the wishes of the Government rather more than to the dictates of strict justice, he maintained that it ought to be corrected. The Bill, moreover, would leave the purchaser in doubt, and would place him in a worse position than the present owner. With regard to the power of advancing money to tenants to purchase their farms, he was of opinion that, instead of the power given under the 40th clause of the Land Act, it would be better to advance to tenants nine-tenths of the amounts necessary, and to limit the purchase to be given to 19 years. By this means the tenant would pay as interest the same amount he now paid in the form of rent, and every year he would approach more nearly the time when he would become the owner of the farm he occupied.

LORD CAIRNS suggested that the debate should be postponed until Friday next.

Further debate on the said Motion adjourned to Friday next.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

LORD BUCKHURST moved, That there be laid before the House a Copy of the List of Endowed Schools which it is proposed to include in the Scheme of the Endowed Schools Commissioners, to be submitted during the present year. Those schemes had so widely departed from what was contemplated that they had caused a wide-spread feeling of alarm. The large schools coming under the notice of the Commissioners might have ample time to consider their position when the scheme for their re-organization was submitted to them, and had the power of appealing. But the large number of small schools—those with incomes not exceeding £100 a-year—would have no appeal at all. It was in order that their Lordships might have information what schools the Commissioners proposed to deal with that he moved for this Return. Mr. Forster had stated in “another place” that he could point out several most excellent schools which were discovered in the course of their inquiry, and that objections to the Bill he was then about to introduce did not come from the bad, but from the good schools. “Now,” said Mr. Forster, “I wish to assure them it is not for the good schools the Bill is intended, though we cannot, of course, exempt such schools by name.”

Lord Oranmore and Browne

According to its Preamble the Endowed Schools Act was passed with the object of providing for the greater efficiency of schools, and of carrying into effect the main designs of the founders thereof by putting within the reach of all classes a liberal education. These, however, were not the principles on which the Commissioners proposed to act.

Moved that there be laid before this House, Copy of the List of Endowed Schools which it is proposed to include in the Scheme of the Endowed School Commissioners to be submitted during the present year.—(The Lord Buckhurst.)

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, their Lordships would see that it was impossible he could accede to the Motion, because, in the first place, there was, as a matter of fact, no list in existence of the endowed schools which it was proposed to include in the scheme of the Endowed Schools Commissioners to be submitted during the present year: and secondly, it would be impossible for the Endowed Schools Commissioners to say, either now or at the beginning of the Session, what were the schools in regard to which they proposed to frame schemes. That, indeed, would depend, among other things, whether the schemes were appealed against under the provisions of the Act: it would also depend on the length of time over which the correspondence between the Commissioners and the persons interested in the localities might extend. All the schemes were under the provisions of the Act, and as the Commissioners placed themselves in the fullest communication with all persons interested in the localities, it was impossible to say what length of time might elapse before the Commissioners were in a position to place any particular scheme on the Table of the House. Consequently, it would be an impossibility to make out such a list as the noble Lord (Lord Buckhurst) had moved for. The noble Lord had said that his main objection had reference to the danger to which small endowments were exposed. Now, he would remind their Lordships that under the provisions of the Act all schemes, whether relating to large or to small endowments, had to be laid before both Houses of Parliament. That which the persons interested in small endowments were deprived of, and which large endowments possessed, was the right of appeal in the shape in which it was given by the clauses of the Act; but every person interested in a small endowment, though he had not the right of appealing in the manner provided by the Act, had the most perfect right and opportunity of appealing in the ordinary, but not in the legal, sense of the word to the Education Department of the Privy Council. Neither his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) nor himself would dream for a moment of disregarding any such representation which might be made to them. Therefore, all that the small endowments were deprived of was the technical right of legal appeal:—which, he might remark, involved a considerable amount of expense. As all these schemes would lie on the Table of the House for 40 days, and as everybody interested in them would have a right to appeal personally to the Commissioners, then to the Education Department, and after that to every Member of this and of the other House of Parliament, he did not think any additional security would be afforded to them by the sort of anticipatory notice of the schemes which were being considered by the Commissioners. He wished to make one remark with respect to what fell from the noble Lord in reference to the operations of the Endowed Schools Commissioners. The noble Lord had said that the proceedings of the Commissioners were, in his opinion, inconsistent with the understanding on which the Endowed Schools Act was passed. It was impossible to reply to general objections of that kind; but if the noble Lord would, on the occasion of any particular scheme being considered in that House, repeat that statement, and prove its correctness in regard to that scheme, he should be perfectly prepared to discuss the question fairly with the noble Lord. He could only say that, whatever might be the individual opinions of the Commissioners, he was confident they felt it to be their bounden duty to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the Act of Parliament; and that where their opinions did not coincide with the Act they would, from their high character, carry out the wishes of the Legislature in preference to their own.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY thought that if the noble Earl (Earl de Grey and Ripon) had been in his place in that House some weeks ago, and not in America, he would not have thrown out the present challenge to his noble Friend. He (the Marquess of Salisbury) did state in that House that Mr. Forster had said that those schools which were not ill-managed endowments had nothing to fear from the operation of the Act; but it would, he believed, be very easy to show, on a future occasion, that endowments had been dealt with by the Endowed Schools Commissioners which did not come under the designation of ill-managed endowments. He did not rise for the purpose of provoking a discussion now, as that would be to anticipate the Notice he had placed on the Paper; but he wished to make an appeal to his noble Friend with regard to the notice given to these small endowments. It might seem very exacting to say so; but the truth was that the period of 40 days given by the Act to appeal to that House was practically in many cases very much abridged. In the first place, the Endowed Schools Commissioners laid schemes on the Table before they were in print, the result being that of the precious 40 days a considerable number passed away before the schemes became public and were brought under their Lordships' consideration. Thus the Emanuel School scheme was kept unprinted for eight days, during which time their Lordships did not know exactly what it was. This was one inconvenience, and there were other inconveniences attending the notice given to the Houses of Parliament. Indeed, it often was almost impossible for these small endowments to put themselves in motion till the time had passed when, according to the ordinary practice of the two Houses, a day could be named for discussion. Therefore, he thought it but fair that some notice should be given to the smaller endowments that they were in the list of proscriptions laid on the Table by the Endowed Schools Commissioners. If the Commissioners would make out a list of the endowments with which they intended to deal, and if his noble Friend would allow such list to be published, it would be a very considerable convenience. This was the suggestion he had to make as an alternative suggestion to that of his noble Friend who had brought forward the present Motion.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON promised to consider the suggestion respecting the printing of the schemes; and in regard to the other suggestion of the noble Marquess pointed out that every endowment had an individual notice of at least three months.

LORD LYTTELTON said, the schemes came in one by one, and it was impossible to state at what precise time a particular scheme would be laid before Parliament.

LORD BUCKHURST, in withdrawing his Motion, said, he thought a list of all the schools which were to come under consideration should be supplied.

LORD LYTTELTON said, a list would be found in the Report of the Endowed Schools Commissioners.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.—QUESTION.

LORD CAIRNS rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Why the date of the 9th April 1865, was inserted in the Washington Treaty as the limit of time for British claims; and what is to be done as to claims arising from occurrences after that date, and before the termination of the American Civil War. His Question had reference to claims other than the Alabama claims, to be made on the part of British subjects against the United States' Government. The limit of time within which they must have arisen was described in the Treaty in this way:—"The period between the 30th of April, 1861, and the 9th of April, 1865," and he wished to know why the latter date had been adopted. Several British subjects had communicated with him respecting the manner in which they were affected by the insertion of this date, and he would take as an example a British mercantile firm at New Orleans which closed their transactions at the beginning of the war and realized their funds. Owing to the inconvenience of remitting money in the ordinary way they invested their funds in cotton, to be shipped at the close of the war, which was the most convenient mode at that time of remitting money to this country. On the 11th of April, two days after the date fixed by the Treaty, their cotton was burnt; and they considered—whether rightly or wrongly he did not say—that they had a claim against the United States' Government which they would be entitled to make if it were not that they were precluded by the date named in the Treaty. He had vainly endeavoured to find out what could be the reason for fixing upon that date. The question arose, could it be that of the termination of the war?—but that could not be, because on the 26th of April, General Johnson, commanding the Confederate Army, entered into a convention with General Sherman, of the United States' Army, for the surrender, on certain conditions, of the Confederate forces; but these terms were repudiated by General Sherman's Government, and the consequence was the unconditional surrender of the Confederate Army. Therefore the operations of war were going on up to that date. There was no limit in point of time in reference to the Alabama claims, and we knew that, after the date mentioned, and after the surrender of the Confederate forces, ships in different parts of the world continued their operations, and it was suggested that they were guilty of piracy. At all events, every claim made in consequence of their acts might be put forward under this Treaty without limit. It seemed to him strange and unfair that British subjects should be limited to a date which was short of the conclusion of the war, and that, on the other hand, there should be no limit to the claims against us in respect of the Alabama. Under these circumstances, he should be glad to know how the limitation in the Treaty arose.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that the dates mentioned by the noble and learned Lord were fixed upon by his noble Friend (Earl De Grey and Ripon) and his brother Commissioners, and were approved by Her Majesty's Government, for these reasons. The Commissioners took the beginning of the war from the commencement of the bombardment of Fort Sumter, and the conclusion of the war from the surrender of General Lee, which put an end to the Confederate Government, and which was considered the final act of the war. If the persons referred to by the noble and learned Lord, from whom also he had received letters, had their cotton burnt a few days after the date named, they were not debarred from making their claim against the American Government. He could hardly conceive that the American Government would refuse to meet a claim of this kind; indeed, he should think that it would be regarded as much stronger than if it had arisen during the war. With regard to these claims generally there was an advantage on our side, for there was no debarring clause whatever with respect to British claims; but American claims were strictly confined to those arising out of the war.

Earl De Grey and Ripon

LORD CAIRNS inquired whether any communication would be made to the United States' Government with regard to claims of this character?

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON was understood to say that these claims, having arisen after the termination of the war, would fall under the ordinary conditions of peace; and as the Commission had decided in favour of such claims which arose during the war, and the United States' Government had agreed to the date taken as that of the termination of the war, he should think that these British subjects would be regarded as having a claim all the stronger because it had arisen after the termination of the war.

House adjourned at a quarter before Eight o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 20th June, 1871.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee—POST OFFICE SERVICES, REVENUE SERVICES, CIVIL SERVICES.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Municipal Corporations Acts (Ireland) Amendment*.

Ordered—First Reading—Public Libraries (Scotland) Act (1867) Amendment* [209].

Second Reading—Charities, &c. Exemption [23], put off; Registration of Births* [180]; Metropolitan Building Act (1855) Amendment* [200].

Report of Select Committee—Sequestration of Benefices* [No. 302]; Sequestration* [No. 303].

Committee—Report—Glasgow Boundary* [198]; Sasines Register (Scotland)* [199].

Third Reading—House of Commons (Witnesses)* [156]; Canada* [192]; Benefices Resignation* [174]; Metropolitan Board of Works (Loans)* [140], and passed.

Withdrawn—Dogs (No. 2)* [137].

The House met at Two of the clock.

CASE OF MRS. DEXTER.—QUESTION.

MR. E. TURNOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Mrs. Dexter, who was charged at the Westminster Police Court on 13th June with serving milk in her shop to customers while suffering herself from small-pox, and was acquitted by the police magistrate on the ground that the Act 29 and 30 Vic. c. 90, only applies to streets and public places; and, whether he would consider the expediency of extending the operation of the Act so as to include all cases of exposure of persons suffering from dangerous infectious diseases?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, it appeared to be true that a person named Dexter, who kept a milk-shop, was guilty of the imprudence of serving a customer while she herself was suffering from small-pox. The 35th section of the Sanitary Act of 1866 enacted that any person subject to a dangerous infectious disease who exposed himself without proper precaution in any public place, street, or public conveyance should be liable to the penalties imposed by the Act. The magistrate held—and he thought rightly held—that a shop was not a public place within the purview of the Act. But he thought the Act might be very usefully amended and enlarged so as to include shops.

DEPARTMENT OF WOODS AND FORESTS.—QUESTION.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What responsible Minister of the Crown is answerable to this House for the conduct of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests in the administration of the annual revenues of the Crown lands; and, whether a Report, addressed to the Treasury, dated June 8, 1871, and signed James K. Howard, purporting to define the function and duties of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, especially in respect of their relations to the House of Commons, is approved and sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have already stated, in answer to a Question, that I am the Minister responsible for the Woods and Forests in this House. With regard to the second part of the Question of the hon. Gentleman, we laid the Report on the Table because we thought it desirable that the House should have an authoritative explanation, from a person quite competent to give it and conversant with the subject, of the facts of the case, and the law, so far as it bears on the duty of the Office of Woods and Forests; and as far as I know—though I have not tested it minutely—that Report does contain a correct statement of the facts. There may be some corrections required, but I am not aware of any; and I repeat, that I believe it fully states the law as regards the Woods and Forests; and by laying it on the Table of the House the Government does, so far, no doubt, express its assent to the Report. As to any part of it dealing with the relations of the Department to this House, that is a matter, I imagine, rather ultra vires as regards the Department. Mr. Howard, though a great authority in his own Department, has no means of deciding what its relations are to this House, and on that point the Government must not be understood to give the Report their sanction.

UNITED STATES—COTTON CLAIMS. QUESTION.

MR. HOLT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, with reference to Cotton Claims under the Treaty of Washington, 1871, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to issue any regulations to govern proceedings by British merchants in support of their claims to compensation on account of property injured or destroyed in the late Civil War, or any notice specifying the time when such claims are to be preferred?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, notice will be issued in a few days for all British claimants to transmit to such person as shall be appointed to receive them, and of whose appointment notice will be given, particulars of their claims and evidence in support thereof. A further notice will be published when the Commissioners are appointed to produce their claims and evidence within six months. These notices will be as nearly as possible identical with those issued with reference to the Convention of 1853 with the United States.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

ARMY REGULATION BILL.—CLERKS OF LIEUTENANCY.—RESOLUTION.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in bringing forward the Motion of which he had given Notice—

"That it is expedient that compensation should be made to the Clerks of the General Meetings, or of the Lieutenancy of any county, riding, or place in the United Kingdom, for the loss of emoluments which they will sustain by reason of the enactment of the provisions of the Army Regulation Bill," observed that, although theoretically these clerks held office merely at the pleasure of the Lord Lieutenant, practically they held office for life; and taking the average, they held office for 18 years. Their emoluments consisted partly of salaries fixed by Parliament under various Militia and Volunteer Acts, and partly of fees on the granting of commissions. In no case did the emoluments exceed £122 per annum, which, taking into consideration the services rendered and the high character of the gentlemen who rendered them, could not be considered a very exorbitant rate of pay. Taking both sources of emoluments, he found that in the course of five years all the clerks of lieutenancy in England and Wales received only £8,100 per annum, which being divided by 59, the number of clerks, only gave to each £137 per annum. There had been some correspondence with the War Office on this subject, and in a Memorandum written by Lord Northbrook it was stated that Mr. Cardwell considered that in these cases the payments in question were made as a reasonable compensation for services rendered, and when those services ceased the payments would also cease. Now, that was totally opposed to the principle on which compensation for the abolition of offices and superannuations had been granted. He referred to the compensations granted under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 105, to officers whose interests were damaged by changes in the Court of Chancery; under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 126, to clerks of the peace; under 20 & 21 Vict., to proctors practising in the Probate Court; under the Irish Church Bill of last Session, to schoolmasters, clerks, sextons, and holders of other offices; and under a Treasury Minute of January last year, upon the abolition of the agencies in the Foreign Office, although in the latter case the office could not be said to be other than one of a private nature. He had asked that two-thirds of their salaries should be awarded to the clerks of lieutenancy as compensation on the abolition of their offices; but if that were thought too much he should be prepared to accept a little less. He would further say that as the majority of the parties affected were upwards of 50 years of age, the burden could not possibly be of long duration. The noble Lord concluded by moving his Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is not expedient that the Clerks of the General Meetings, or of the Lieutenancy of any county, riding, or place in the United Kingdom, should be deprived of their emoluments without compensation,"—(Lord George Hamilton),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

COLONEL FRENCH said, he hoped the Government would not entertain such a proposal. The officers in question were really of no use whatever. They held their situations at the mere will of Lords Lieutenant of counties, and in Ireland the expenditure was altogether useless. The situation appeared to be only an opportunity of giving a person £50 a-year for doing nothing.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the Government agreed very much in the view that had been taken by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who had last spoken (Colonel French), that the proposal of the noble Lord could not be complied with without violating the rules of the House. But, independently of that objection to the Amendment, the Government felt bound to oppose the proposition on its merits, inasmuch as the gentlemen in question were not the servants of the Crown; and they were also of opinion that the withdrawal of the emoluments they had lost did not entitle them to compensation. The most telling of the examples of compensation referred to by the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex was that of the compensation to the agents of the Foreign Office; but those gentlemen were servants of the Crown, and had received their emoluments by virtue of an Order of Council. The case of the officers of the Court of Chancery who were compensated was not an example to be imitated, as it had given rise to scandal, and was never referred to except as an example that the House of Commons ought to avoid following. But even in that case the compensation was not paid out of taxes, but out of funds belonging to the Court of Chancery. In the case of the Irish Church, again, the compensations under the Irish Church Act were paid out of the Irish Church property. The duties out of which the emoluments in question had been derived came casually to the gentlemen whom it was now sought to compensate under the operation of an Act of Parliament, and had been abolished by another Act of Parliament. Under these circumstances, the Government were not prepared to accede to the proposal of the noble Lord.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee)

(1.) £1,148,387, Post Office Packet Service; no part of which sum is to be applicable or applied in or towards making any payment in respect of any period subsequent to the 20th day of June 1863, to Mr. Joseph George Churchward, or to any person claiming through or under him by virtue of a certain Contract bearing date the 26th day of April 1859, made between the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Admiralty (for and on behalf of Her Majesty) of the first part, and the said Joseph George Churchward of the second part, or in or towards the satisfaction of any claim whatsoever of the said Joseph George Churchward, by virtue of that Contract, so far as relates to any period subsequent to the 20th day of June 1863.

(2.) £350,000, to complete the sum for the Post Office Telegraph Service.

(3.) £979,888, Revenue Departments (Customs).

(4.) £1,625,625, Inland Revenue Department.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the duties of the Receiver General of the Inland Revenue Department, and whether it was intended to put an end to that office? A somewhat similar office had been lately abolished, and he should like to know why that one was not dealt with in the same way.

MR. MACFIE said, he wished to know whether any progress had been made in consolidating the Inland Revenue with the Customs Department?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied that, after full inquiry, it had been resolved to retain the office of Receiver General of the Inland Revenue; but he could not state on what ground the decision had been formed. The amalgamation of the Inland Revenue with the Customs Department would not conduce to the public advantage, and therefore there was no intention on the part of the Government to effect a union between those Departments.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he would not say whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer was right or not; but he knew that the Receivership of the Board of Customs was abolished with great advantage to the public service, and he thought it might be possible to dispense with such an officer in the Board of Inland Revenue. In reference to another subject, which had been recently investigated by the Select Committee on Public Accounts, in consequence of what was called "the War Office Scandal"—namely, the allowances made by way of poundage to collectors and assessors of income tax—the Committee made two recommendations: one being that the arrangements for remunerating persons in the public Departments for this special service should be re-considered by the Treasury; and the other, that when public money was received by a person in those Departments beyond the salary of his office, the amount should appear in the Estimates. He should be glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman's opinions on these propositions.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought the recommendations of the Accounts Committee were perfectly just, and the Government would attend to them.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £2,470,355, Post Office.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK observed, that last Session and the Session before he submitted a point for the consideration of the Postmaster General as to the giving of more accommodation to the public for the posting of letters in the railway stations of the United Kingdom, and in Post Office railway vans. Last year the noble Lord then at the head of the Department (the Marquess of Hartington) made considerable concessions in the matter, but more accommodation was still required. The absence of letter-boxes for stations was a great disadvantage to persons travelling, and great delay occurred in consequence of letters not being sorted at the railway stations. It would not be right to make a Motion on the subject, without giving Notice, and he would only ask the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General whether some additional accommodation could not be afforded?

Sir Charles W. Dilke

MR. MONSELL said, his attention had been directed to the importance of affording larger facilities in this matter, and he had spoken about it to the officials at the Post Office. He would continue to give attention to the subject; but there were obvious difficulties in carrying out a satisfactory scheme, and he feared there would be much danger of letters posted in stations going to wrong places.

COLONEL SYKES said, the revenue from the Post Office was part and parcel of the permanent Revenue of the country, and whatever surplus was derived from the Post Office ought to be applied in remedying any deficiency in the means of obtaining letters.

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR mentioned that in France letter-boxes had been attached to the trains, so that letters need only be placed in them to be dispatched at once. He thought the difficulty suggested by the Postmaster General might be overcome by labelling letter-boxes in such a manner as to indicate the up and down service.

MR. BOWRING asked, when the new postal regulations would come into operation?

MR. MONSELL said, probably on the 1st of August, and, as considerable reductions would be made in the postal charges, no doubt the Revenue would be affected; but he trusted that correspondence would increase to such an extent in a short time as to make good the deficiency. These changes, however, would involve no increase of the present Estimates.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) £45,788, to complete the sum for the Superior Courts of Common Law in England.

(7.) £48,777, to complete the sum for the London Court of Bankruptcy.

(8.) £315,706, to complete the sum for the County Courts.

(9.) £69,477, to complete the sum for the Courts of Probate and Divorce and Matrimonial Causes in England.

(10.) £10,160, to complete the sum for the High Court of Admiralty.

(11.) £3,960, to complete the sum for the office of Land Registry.

MR. GOLDNEY called attention to the very unsatisfactory state of the office, and expressed the opinion that they were annually voting a sum of £5,000 for what was of very little benefit to the public.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that nothing but the state of Public Business prevented the Government from dealing with the matter at once.

Vote agreed to.

(12.) £15,226, to complete the sum for the Police Courts, London and Sheerness.

(13.) £154,470, to complete the sum for the Metropolitan Police.

MR. BOWRING asked, how the new system of supervision under the Habitual Criminals Act was working?

MR. BRUCE said, it was working very well, and had already been found very useful. The experiment was only in its infancy; but he believed, from the investigation he had made, that it was likely in time to contribute very considerably to the detection and punishment of crime.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE asked, whether it was intended to amend the Habitual Criminals Act, and to revert to the system of monthly reports of all convicts under inspection who changed their abode from one town to another?

MR. BRUCE said, the Government did intend to bring in a Bill on this subject; and so far as regarded convicts he should be disposed to recur to the former system of monthly reporting; but he doubted the expediency of extending such stringent regulations to persons simply under supervision.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK contended that it was not fair to compel persons simply committed for trial to sit for their portraits, so that the photographs might be sent to different parts of the country, even before the parties had been convicted. The law presumes a man is innocent until he is proved to be guilty.

COLONEL SYKES observed, that if the photographs were taken with the knowledge of the criminals, the latter might distort their faces in order to prevent a portrait being secured.

MR. BRUCE agreed that no one had a right to take the portrait of a man only committed for trial, and if that had been done it must have been with the consent of the man himself. With respect to the shrewd suggestion of the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Sykes), the warders who took the portraits were sufficiently skilled in photographs to avoid taking anything but the man's ordinary expression.

MR. DICKINSON said, he hoped the Home Secretary would not commit himself to the doctrine that under no circumstances should a prisoner's photograph be taken until after his trial, for the simple reason that many persons awaiting their trial had been previously convicted.

Vote agreed to.

(14.) £295,500, to complete the sum for Police Counties and Boroughs (England and Wales), and in Scotland agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £361,332, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, of the Superintendence of Convict Establishments, and for the Maintenance of Convicts in England and the Colonies."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS inquired whether the sum of £15,000, which appeared in the Estimate as "New Prison—Commencement of Buildings," had reference to Brixton Prison? in reference to the expenses of which a Motion was on the Order Book for that night. He thought that the whole of the expenditure for the completion of the prison should be made known before the work was commenced.

MR. BAXTER said, £15,000 would not, of course, cover anything like the expenses of that work, and therefore he had thought it right that the House should not be asked to spend anything until its opinion had been taken on the proposal. If the Bill passed, it would be necessary for Government to bring in a Supplementary Estimate. This, he thought, would be a proper proceeding, because it involved a large sum.

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH concurred that the whole cost of the work should be shown, and it seemed to him that the £15,000 had been put down for the Brixton Prison.

MR. WHEELHOUSE asked, whether it was intended to do away with the Milbank Prison altogether?

MR. BRUCE said, that successive Governments had had their attention called to the unfitness of Milbank for the purposes of a prison. It was ill-arranged; and on a careful estimate of the Director of Prisons last autumn, it appeared that the excess of cost in overlooking this prison as compared with other prisons was not less than £5,000 a-year. Government had accordingly determined to do away with the prison, and to put the prisoners elsewhere. Milbank was only partly applied to the accommodation of convict prisoners; it also received the military prisoners. In removing this prison, it would be necessary to make accommodation elsewhere, and it had been considered most convenient that the accommodation should be supplied partly by adding to the Brixton Prison, and partly by erecting a new prison. He had been under the impression last night, when he stated that the £15,000 in the Estimates had reference to Brixton; that sum, however, was required for the new prison, the site of which had not yet been decided upon. While certain other works were under consideration, it was considered wise not to determine the position of the future convict prison; and it was also considered prudent to delay the settlement of that point until some decision was come to by Government which would determine the remunerative occupation of the prisoners, as there was some hope that the authorities would be able to utilize the convict labour to effect some such national work as the fortification of their arsenals, or the defence of London. There were two circumstances which would lead to a very considerable increase in the number of the prisoners, although, on the other hand, the state of crime might be described as generally satisfactory; one was the absolute cessation of transportation abroad, and the other was the term of punishment inflicted on persons already convicted of felony. The increase which those two circumstances would cause rendered it necessary to look ahead for the next few years, with a view to the proper housing of the prisoners.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS wanted to know the whole amount of the Estimate in connection with this work, and also the probable cost of the new prison under the Brixton Bill, including the purchase of land.

MR. BRUCE replied that the cost would very much depend on the nature of the prison erected. If erected for the purpose of accommodating convicts engaged in some temporary work—say at Dover or Chatham—it would be less expensive than if it was to be erected for permanent purposes.

MR. CANDLISH said, it was apparent that the right hon. Gentleman had determined nothing. The site was not known to him, and its ultimate cost was not known to him. He thought a strong case was made out for postponing the Vote. It would be open to Government to proceed in the matter when their mind was made up.

MR. BRUCE said, it was absolutely necessary to provide increased accommodation for the increased number of prisoners during the coming year, and provision must be made not merely in reference to the wants of the moment but in regard to future wants, which could be estimated with tolerable accuracy. It was a matter of indifference to Government whether this Vote of £15,000 was taken now or postponed to some future time, so long as Government was able to carry out the works necessary for the public interest.

MR. CANDLISH said, he thought it only reasonable that the Committee should know the whole cost and the site of the buildings before voting the money.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, that the magistrates in the North of England had been considering how far there was any necessity for providing more convict prison room than actually existed. In Yorkshire there was a strong feeling in the mind of the magistrates that it was very undesirable to continue the Act which made it necessary, after a conviction for felony, to send to penal servitude for seven years. The justices would like to see their way to ordinary imprisonment being inflicted instead of penal servitude.

Mr. HERMON moved that the Vote be reduced by £15,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £346,332, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, of the Superintendence of Convict Establishments, and for the Maintenance of Convicts in England and the Colonies."—(Mr. Hermon.)

Mr. BAXTER said, that it was quite immaterial whether this sum was granted now or afterwards, and Government would accordingly agree to the Motion just made.

Mr. RYLANDS pointed out that there was nothing to show that the expenditure in Milbank was greater than in other prisons. Both at Chatham and Dartmoor many of the charges were higher than at Milbank.

Mr. BRUCE said, the circumstances of these prisons differed from those of Milbank, which was used partly as a prison for short sentences and partly for the first portion of sentences to penal servitude.

Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY said, that as the Home Secretary had sent a Circular to the managers of Industrial Schools stating that the Treasury Grants to those schools would be reduced, he desired to have some explanation on the matter. The proceeding appeared to have been rather abrupt, for the Circular Letter was dated the 27th of April, and the reduction was made on the 1st of May. The Treasury payment for children under 10 years of age was reduced nearly 40 per cent, and a similar reduction was made in the case of children over 15 years of age. The reason given for the reduction in respect to children under 10 years of age was that they were hardly capable of industrial training; and the reason assigned for the reduction in the case of children over 15 years of age was that keeping children too long in Industrial Schools was not favourable to their moral or physical development. He had letters in his possession contradicting the reasons assigned in both instances. Indeed, the experience of every Industrial School proved that if children of the class sent there did not begin their instruction at an early age, the purpose for which industrial schools were instituted would be frustrated. It was the neglected state of those children which mainly justified any Treasury aid at all for national education, and which led many to a desire for compulsory education. The Industrial Schools were already the receptacles of compulsory scholars. With regard to children over 15 years of age, he believed that the Circular Letter exhibited a prevalent mistake in the estimation of these schools, arising from their being treated, in consequence of their connection with the Home Office instead of the Education Department, like penal or pauper establishments, and not as schools. In an article on the subject of enlistment in the Army the leading journal on Saturday last adverted to the difficulty which was experienced in getting well-educated adults to that service. The Navy could take boys young—it would be expensive for the State to educate Army recruits till they were old enough for the service, and it would be well to see if we could not render the children educated at the public expense in those schools available for military purposes. In his opinion the present payment of 5s. per head was sufficient, and in some cases more than enough; but he thought that the right hon. Gentleman had made a mistake in proposing to reduce the proportion of the grant in the case of such boys under 10 years of age on the ground that they were too young to benefit by Industrial Schools; and in the case of the elder boys on the ground that they were old enough to earn their own living, ignoring the fact that they might be doing so in the school itself, or preparing to emigrate, or for special service. Under these circumstances, he begged to ask the right hon. Gentleman to explain the reasons which had induced him to propose these reductions?

ALDERMAN SIR DAVID SALOMONS said, he thought that these schools ought to have a wider scope given to them, and that the police should be instructed to keep a sharper eye on vagabond children.

Mr. BOWRING inquired, whether the sum taken in the present Estimates was based upon the old allowance of 5s. a-week, or upon the proposal contained in the right hon. Gentleman's Circular?

Mr. BAXTER replied that the Vote was based on the old allowance.

Mr. BRUCE said, that the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Charles Adderley) spoke with such authority upon this subject, he having spent the greater part of a most useful life in supporting every institution which tended to reduce crime, that he always differed from him with extreme reluctance. No doubt it was of national interest that these unhappy children should be turned into good citizens, instead of being allowed to become the pests of society; but, at the same time, it should be kept in mind that their cases were exceptional. He would not go so far as to apply to the directors of these institutions the saying of Talleyrand, with respect to fathers of families, "That they were capable of anything;" but, certainly, the tendency in Scotland and many parts of the country was to strain very much the machinery of the Industrial Schools Act, and to send to the schools established under it a vast number of children who had no right to be admitted into them, but who ought to be dealt with under the Poor Law. It had been in consequence of this tendency that the Government had found it necessary to determine that no children should be admitted into them who were under six years of age. The annual sum appropriated to the support of these schools had increased from £19,000 in 1865 to £115,000 in the present year, which showed the necessity which existed for placing some check upon the practice of relieving the local burdens by means of these schools at the expense of the Imperial funds. The tendency of these schools was to become more burdensome to the Imperial Revenue, and as he was most desirous that they should be supported by voluntary and local effort, he had determined to reduce the allowance for the children. With regard to the children between 15 and 16 years of age he thought he was justified in making a reduction, for the simple reason, which he thought no one would gainsay, that at that period of life a child could contribute something considerable towards its own support. However excellent the instruction might be it had a prejudicial effect on the character of the children, for nothing could replace the freedom which a child enjoyed in earning a livelihood beyond the walls of an institution. After very careful consideration and consultation with those who were well able to advise him on the matter, he issued a circular announcing the reduction in the allowance to those schools.

Mr. Bruce

Many expostulations against the reduction had reached the Government; but managers of several of the most important institutions in the country had expressed their approbation of that step, and mainly because there was a tendency in these schools to cease to be voluntary. At the same time, these were institutions of great national importance, and it would be necessary to watch most closely the effect of the change in them. Nothing could be further from his wish, or that of the Government, than to do anything detrimental to these institutions, which were doing so much good.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY wished to know how much the Government would save by this reduction, and whether the new system would be applied to Ireland? He feared that the consequence of reducing the grant would be to destroy some institutions that were of great advantage in Ireland.

MR. BRUCE said, that the reduction would not apply to the Irish Industrial Schools.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, he was inclined to think that the alteration in the amount of the grant was a step in the right direction; though no doubt some difficulty would be felt from the managers being too ready to rely upon Imperial funds instead of upon local rates and subscriptions. Too liberal an allowance would probably do more harm than good. A great deal of mischief would be done by anything that would have a tendency to cause the honest working man to neglect his children. There were constant complaints that a poor man could not bring up his children in the way in which children were educated at these institutions, and that there would be no chance for their being so brought up unless he should neglect them and turn them into the streets. It was very difficult to answer such allegations. The real excuse for spending public money upon these children was, that if they were let alone in their neglected state they would probably cause a good deal of evil to society at large. This end should always be kept in view, both in the quality of education given, and the selection of the children, so as to avoid giving a premium to the neglect of children, and more trouble should be taken for the same reason, to exact contributions from parents. The cases should be wholly exceptional. If there was a difficulty as to funds these cases would be properly selected; but if there were a large grant, the managers of the institutions would not be careful whom they admitted within their walls.

DR. BREWER said, he hoped it would be remembered that these Industrial Schools took the place of the prison. They were intended to supersede the necessity of imprisoning children for a greater or less time and exposing them to vicious associations. He did not think that they could draw any hard-and-fast line in respect to the age at which children should be received at or dismissed from school.

MR. CONOLLY said, he was glad to see the attention paid to reformatories in England, because he should on a future occasion bring to the notice of the House the success which had attended the Reformatory of Glencree, in Ireland, under the management of the monks. The proportion of boys reclaimed was 90 per cent, while in England, under the most favourable auspices, it was not more than 75 per cent. He would ask the Prime Minister for a small grant for the Reformatory.

MR. D. DALRYMPLE said, he saw in the Vote an item of £320 for the maintenance of criminal lunatics in private asylums. It was highly inexpedient that such lunatics should be confined in private asylums. There was a Bill in "another place" which proposed to transfer criminal lunatics in Scotland to chartered institutions. He hoped before another year some means would be taken to put a stop to this practice.

MR. M'LAREN said, that the managers of the chartered institutions in Scotland complained grievously of the Bill to which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bath had referred.

Question put, and agreed to.

(16.) £251,980, to complete the sum for the maintenance of Prisoners, Juvenile Offenders, and Criminal Lunatics.

(17.) £25,410, to complete the sum for Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum.

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH said, he would suggest that the Home Secretary should take into consideration a matter which had been pressed by him on successive Secretaries of State—namely, some arrangements for retaining at Broadmoor criminal lunatics of a dangerous character after the term of their sentence had expired. Under the Act of 1869 the Home Secretary had power to order their removal to the asylums of the county to which they belonged. There was no proper provision in the county asylums for lunatics of a dangerous class, and they might well be retained at Broadmoor at the expense of the county or borough to which they might be chargeable.

MR. GOLDSMID desired to call attention to the case of a person whose sentence had expired and who was sent to his county asylum from Dartmoor. Nearly all the time the medical officers were of opinion that the man was perfectly sane, and yet they were obliged to keep him. He was not sure that the medical superintendent was not liable to an action.

MR. BRUCE said, he thought if the sentence had expired and the man was sane those who detained him would be liable to an action. With regard to the general question, there was the greatest possible difficulty in providing at Broadmoor for the criminal lunatics sent there, and the managers were most desirous of transferring them to the counties chargeable with their support. There was, however, great force in the appeal of his hon. Friend, and he would undertake to see to it.

Vote agreed to.

(18.) £15,750, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Legal Charges in England.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE asked, how it happened that additional revising barristers were always wanted, and why the number of days during which they were required was always the same?

MR. BRUCE said, that was the best Estimate that could be made; he would not undertake to say all the money would be spent.

Vote agreed to.

(19.) £55,675, to complete the sum for Criminal Proceedings in Scotland.

(20.) £42,767, to complete the sum for Courts of Law and Justice in Scotland.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, that in Scotland there were Courts called Sheriffs' Courts; but though the office was one of very great importance—more important, in fact, than that of the Judges of the County Courts in England or Ireland—the sheriff himself did not discharge the duties of the Court, but they were discharged by an officer called the sheriff-substitute. Now it appeared, from what had taken place the other night, that this sheriff-substitute might himself appoint a deputy, of whom the Law Officers of the Crown might know nothing. What he (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) desired to know was, if it was true that the sheriff-substitute had the power to appoint any person as his deputy whom he thought proper, so long as he was a barrister of five years' standing? If such was the case, he thought it was an abuse which ought not to be allowed to continue. In England a County Court Judge could only have a deputy appointed by the Lord Chancellor, and there was the same practice in Ireland. In his opinion there ought to be some power conferred so that in Scotland the appointment of a sheriff-depute might be controlled and the sheriff-substitute might not be allowed to appoint whoever he liked. The power to appoint a sheriff-depute ought either to be in the hands of the Lord Advocate or one of the Judges.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the information on which his right hon. and learned Friend had made his statement was not altogether accurate. In the first place, he was wrong in his assumption that the duties of the Sheriff Court were performed by the sheriff-substitute and not by the sheriff. The office of sheriff was a very important one, and in many of the counties in Scotland the duties were very onerous. The sheriff had, by Act of Parliament and by the terms of his commission, power to appoint a substitute. It was a question whether the power to appoint a sheriff-substitute should continue as at present in the hands of the sheriff, or whether it might not conduce to the public service to transfer the patronage to the Crown. From the sheriff-substitute there was an appeal to the sheriff, and the appeals were very numerous. It was not accurate to suppose that the appointment of the sheriff-depute was made by the sheriff-substitute. There was very rarely occasion to make such an appointment at all; but when the occasion did arise, the appointment was made by the sheriff, and not by the sheriff-substitute. If the sheriff-substitute was ill or unable to attend to his duties from some temporary cause, a deputy was appointed by the sheriff. He did not think there was anything in the present state of matters to call for legislative interference—it might be worthy of consideration, but he had no proposal to submit.

Vote agreed to.

(21.) £22,740, to complete the sum for General Register House, Edinburgh.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that although this sum seemed a very considerable one, it would appear from the account that it was not a Vote of public money, the expenses of the department in question being more than sufficiently provided for by the receipts and fees. This subject had given rise to dissatisfaction, because the Scotch people felt that they were practically taxed for a larger amount than was sufficient to maintain the establishment. It was urged some time ago that it was quite impossible to introduce any reform of the Register House until all the registers were united, and power was given to the Treasury as soon as that should take place to apply a remedy to the state of things complained of. What was asked for was that the fees should be so reduced that after paying the expenses of the department there should be no surplus to go into the general Exchequer of the country. The public had a full right to the benefit of reduced fees if the receipts of the department would justify it. In his opinion the time had come when the Treasury ought to act upon the power which they had, and reduce the fees.

MR. M'LAREN asked what was the exact amount paid to the retired officers throughout Scotland, and whether the payments which had been made had been taken out of the fees? The expenditure of the present year was £30,200, while the receipts were £39,500, leaving a balance of £9,300, and there was a similar surplus last year. He feared that out of these balances had been paid the retiring allowances of those registrars whose offices had been brought to Edinburgh. If this was the case, the amount of the retiring allowances ought to be stated in the Estimates. As to the general balance, it was altogether wrong that it should go into the public purse. The Act of Parliament distinctly stated that the surplus was to be applied to the reduction of the fees, and no one could defend the appropriation of the money to any other purpose.

Sir Colman O'Loughlen

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN said, he quite agreed with the hon. Member for Edinburgh. It was unjust that the landed proprietors of Scotland should contribute in this way a large sum to the national Exchequer. It was the duty of the Government at once to reduce the fees.

THE LORD ADVOCATE agreed that the fees in this Court ought not to be a source of revenue, it having been provided by the Act of Parliament, passed three years ago, that they should be adjusted so as to meet the expenses of the department as nearly as could be calculated, and he regretted that hitherto no steps had been taken towards their reduction. He was informed by the Secretary to the Treasury that the retiring allowances were paid out of the general funds of the country, but no such account was kept as enabled him to set that amount against the other. The department was not under his control; but he would do all he could to have justice done.

MR. ANDERSON asked whether steps were being taken to avoid complaints about the backward state of business in the Register House?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was aware that such complaints had been made, and he was sorry to say not unreasonably. The general explanation was that the establishment was very much under-manned, and the duties placed upon the department had been much increased. This was now remedied to a large extent.

MR. BAXTER said, the retiring allowances which were paid last year amounted to £2,646.

MR. M'LAREN said, then it appeared that even after paying the retiring allowances, they had still a surplus. They had disobeyed an Act of Parliament in not applying that surplus to the reduction of fees, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had put the money into his pocket. He trusted that it would be paid back.

Vote agreed to.

(22.) £18,987, to complete the sum for Prisons in Scotland, &c.

(23.) £59,403, to complete the sum for Criminal Prosecutions, &c., Ireland.

(24.) £33,903, to complete the sum for the Court of Chancery, Ireland.

(25.) £22,377, to complete the sum for the Superior Courts of Common Law in Ireland.

(26.) £6,470, to complete the sum for the Court of Bankruptcy and Insolvency in Ireland.

(27.) £9,721, to complete the sum for the Landed Estates Court, Ireland.

(28.) £8,526, to complete the sum for the Court of Probate in Ireland.

(29.) £1,540, to complete the sum for the Admiralty Court Registry, Ireland.

(30.) £11,508, to complete the sum for the Office for Registration of Deeds in Ireland.

(31.) £2,316, to complete the sum for the Office for Registration of Judgments in Ireland.

(32.) £73,673, to complete the sum for the Dublin Metropolitan Police.

(33.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £693,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for the Constabulary Force in Ireland."

MR. FIELDEN observed, that a large sum was put down for pensions, and that the increase over the amount asked for last year was £10,442. He objected to the increase, and moved that the Vote be reduced by that amount.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £682,818, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for the Constabulary Force in Ireland."—(Mr. Joshua Fielden.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that the pensions were granted under Act of Parliament, and he scarcely believed that the hon. Member for the West Riding would persist in his proposal to deprive the men of the pensions they had earned, and on the faith of receiving which they had been induced to enter the service.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, that the amount of pensions was certainly enormous, and was increasing at the rate of £10,000 a-year. It already amounted to £120,000; whereas the pay of the force only amounted to £567,000.

MR. RYLANDS said, that these pensions were a difficult matter to deal with,

had been lately abolished, and he should like to know why that one was not dealt with in the same way.

MR. MACFIE said, he wished to know whether any progress had been made in consolidating the Inland Revenue with the Customs Department?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied that, after full inquiry, it had been resolved to retain the office of Receiver General of the Inland Revenue; but he could not state on what ground the decision had been formed. The amalgamation of the Inland Revenue with the Customs Department would not conduce to the public advantage, and therefore there was no intention on the part of the Government to effect a union between those Departments.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he would not say whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer was right or not; but he knew that the Receivership of the Board of Customs was abolished with great advantage to the public service, and he thought it might be possible to dispense with such an officer in the Board of Inland Revenue. In reference to another subject, which had been recently investigated by the Select Committee on Public Accounts, in consequence of what was called "the War Office Scandal"—namely, the allowances made by way of poundage to collectors and assessors of income tax—the Committee made two recommendations: one being that the arrangements for remunerating persons in the public Departments for this special service should be re-considered by the Treasury; and the other, that when public money was received by a person in those Departments beyond the salary of his office, the amount should appear in the Estimates. He should be glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman's opinions on these propositions.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought the recommendations of the Accounts Committee were perfectly just, and the Government would attend to them.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £2,470,355, Post Office.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK observed, that last Session and the Session before he submitted a point for the consideration of the Postmaster General as to the giving of more accommodation to the public for the posting of letters in the railway stations of the United Kingdom, and in Post Office railway vans. Last year the noble Lord then at the head of the Department (the Marquess of Hartington) made considerable concessions in the matter, but more accommodation was still required. The absence of letter-boxes for stations was a great disadvantage to persons travelling, and great delay occurred in consequence of letters not being sorted at the railway stations. It would not be right to make a Motion on the subject, without giving Notice, and he would only ask the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General whether some additional accommodation could not be afforded?

Sir Charles W. Dilke

MR. MONSELL said, his attention had been directed to the importance of affording larger facilities in this matter, and he had spoken about it to the officials at the Post Office. He would continue to give attention to the subject; but there were obvious difficulties in carrying out a satisfactory scheme, and he feared there would be much danger of letters posted in stations going to wrong places.

COLONEL SYKES said, the revenue from the Post Office was part and parcel of the permanent Revenue of the country, and whatever surplus was derived from the Post Office ought to be applied in remedying any deficiency in the means of obtaining letters.

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR mentioned that in France letter-boxes had been attached to the trains, so that letters need only be placed in them to be dispatched at once. He thought the difficulty suggested by the Postmaster General might be overcome by labelling letter-boxes in such a manner as to indicate the up and down service.

MR. BOWRING asked, when the new postal regulations would come into operation?

MR. MONSELL said, probably on the 1st of August, and, as considerable reductions would be made in the postal charges, no doubt the Revenue would be affected; but he trusted that correspondence would increase to such an extent in a short time as to make good the deficiency. These changes, however, would involve no increase of the present Estimates.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) £45,788, to complete the sum for the Superior Courts of Common Law in England.

(7.) £48,777, to complete the sum for the London Court of Bankruptcy.

(8.) £315,706, to complete the sum for the County Courts.

(9.) £69,477, to complete the sum for the Courts of Probate and Divorce and Matrimonial Causes in England.

(10.) £10,160, to complete the sum for the High Court of Admiralty.

(11.) £3,960, to complete the sum for the office of Land Registry.

MR. GOLDNEY called attention to the very unsatisfactory state of the office, and expressed the opinion that they were annually voting a sum of £5,000 for what was of very little benefit to the public.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that nothing but the state of Public Business prevented the Government from dealing with the matter at once.

Vote agreed to.

(12.) £15,226, to complete the sum for the Police Courts, London and Sheerness.

(13.) £154,470, to complete the sum for the Metropolitan Police.

MR. BOWRING asked, how the new system of supervision under the Habitual Criminals Act was working?

MR. BRUCE said, it was working very well, and had already been found very useful. The experiment was only in its infancy; but he believed, from the investigation he had made, that it was likely in time to contribute very considerably to the detection and punishment of crime.

MR. STEPHEN OAVE asked, whether it was intended to amend the Habitual Criminals Act, and to revert to the system of monthly reports of all convicts under inspection who changed their abode from one town to another?

MR. BRUCE said, the Government did intend to bring in a Bill on this subject; and so far as regarded convicts he should be disposed to recur to the former system of monthly reporting; but he doubted the expediency of extending such stringent regulations to persons simply under supervision.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK contended that it was not fair to compel persons simply committed for trial to sit for their portraits, so that the photographs might be sent to different parts of the country, even before the parties had been convicted. The law presumes a man is innocent until he is proved to be guilty.

COLONEL SYKES observed, that if the photographs were taken with the knowledge of the criminals, the latter might distort their faces in order to prevent a portrait being secured.

MR. BRUCE agreed that no one had a right to take the portrait of a man only committed for trial, and if that had been done it must have been with the consent of the man himself. With respect to the shrewd suggestion of the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Sykes), the warders who took the portraits were sufficiently skilled in photographs to avoid taking anything but the man's ordinary expression.

MR. DICKINSON said, he hoped the Home Secretary would not commit himself to the doctrine that under no circumstances should a prisoner's photograph be taken until after his trial, for the simple reason that many persons awaiting their trial had been previously convicted.

Vote agreed to.

(14.) £295,500, to complete the sum for Police Counties and Boroughs (England and Wales), and in Scotland agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £361,332, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, of the Superintendence of Convict Establishments, and for the Maintenance of Convicts in England and the Colonies."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS inquired whether the sum of £15,000, which appeared in the Estimate as "New Prison—Commencement of Buildings," had reference to Brixton Prison? in reference to the expenses of which a Motion was on the Order Book for that night. He thought that the whole of the expenditure for the completion of the prison should be made known before the work was commenced.

MR. BAXTER said, £15,000 would not, of course, cover anything like the expenses of that work, and therefore he had thought it right that the House should not be asked to spend anything until its opinion had been taken on the proposal. If the Bill passed, it would be necessary for Government to bring in a Supplementary Estimate. This, he thought, would be a proper proceeding, because it involved a large sum.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH concurred that the whole cost of the work should be shown, and it seemed to him that the £15,000 had been put down for the Brixton Prison.

MR. WHEELHOUSE asked, whether it was intended to do away with the Milbank Prison altogether?

MR. BRUCE said, that successive Governments had had their attention called to the unfitness of Milbank for the purposes of a prison. It was ill-arranged; and on a careful estimate of the Director of Prisons last autumn, it appeared that the excess of cost in overlooking this prison as compared with other prisons was not less than £5,000 a-year. Government had accordingly determined to do away with the prison, and to put the prisoners elsewhere. Milbank was only partly applied to the accommodation of convict prisoners; it also received the military prisoners. In removing this prison, it would be necessary to make accommodation elsewhere, and it had been considered most convenient that the accommodation should be supplied partly by adding to the Brixton Prison, and partly by erecting a new prison. He had been under the impression last night, when he stated that the £15,000 in the Estimates had reference to Brixton; that sum, however, was required for the new prison, the site of which had not yet been decided upon. While certain other works were under consideration, it was considered wise not to determine the position of the future convict prison; and it was also considered prudent to delay the settlement of that point until some decision was come to by Government which would determine the remunerative occupation of the prisoners, as there was some hope that the authorities would be able to utilize the convict labour to effect some such national work as the fortification of their arsenals, or the defence of London. There were two circumstances which would lead to a very considerable increase in the number of the prisoners, although, on the other hand, the state of crime might be described as generally satisfactory; one was the absolute cessation of transportation abroad, and the other was the term of punishment inflicted on persons already convicted of felony. The increase which those two circumstances would cause rendered it necessary to look ahead for the next few years, with a view to the proper housing of the prisoners.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS wanted to know the whole amount of the Estimate in connection with this work, and also the probable cost of the new prison under the Brixton Bill, including the purchase of land.

MR. BRUCE replied that the cost would very much depend on the nature of the prison erected. If erected for the purpose of accommodating convicts engaged in some temporary work—say at Dover or Chatham—it would be less expensive than if it was to be erected for permanent purposes.

MR. CANDLISH said, it was apparent that the right hon. Gentleman had determined nothing. The site was not known to him, and its ultimate cost was not known to him. He thought a strong case was made out for postponing the Vote. It would be open to Government to proceed in the matter when their mind was made up.

MR. BRUCE said, it was absolutely necessary to provide increased accommodation for the increased number of prisoners during the coming year, and provision must be made not merely in reference to the wants of the moment but in regard to future wants, which could be estimated with tolerable accuracy. It was a matter of indifference to Government whether this Vote of £15,000 was taken now or postponed to some future time, so long as Government was able to carry out the works necessary for the public interest.

MR. CANDLISH said, he thought it only reasonable that the Committee should know the whole cost and the site of the buildings before voting the money.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, that the magistrates in the North of England had been considering how far there was any necessity for providing more convict prison room than actually existed. In Yorkshire there was a strong feeling in the mind of the magistrates that it was very undesirable to continue the Act which made it necessary, after a conviction for felony, to send to penal servitude for seven years. The justices would like to see their way to ordinary imprisonment being inflicted instead of penal servitude.

MR. HERMON moved that the Vote be reduced by £15,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £346,332, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, of the Superintendence of Convict Establishments, and for the Maintenance of Convicts in England and the Colonies."
—(Mr. Hermon.)

MR. BAXTER said, that it was quite immaterial whether this sum was granted now or afterwards, and Government would accordingly agree to the Motion just made.

MR. RYLANDS pointed out that there was nothing to show that the expenditure in Milbank was greater than in other prisons. Both at Chatham and Dartmoor many of the charges were higher than at Milbank.

MR. BRUCE said, the circumstances of these prisons differed from those of Milbank, which was used partly as a prison for short sentences and partly for the first portion of sentences to penal servitude.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, that as the Home Secretary had sent a Circular to the managers of Industrial Schools stating that the Treasury Grants to those schools would be reduced, he desired to have some explanation on the matter. The proceeding appeared to have been rather abrupt, for the Circular Letter was dated the 27th of April, and the reduction was made on the 1st of May. The Treasury payment for children under 10 years of age was reduced nearly 40 per cent, and a similar reduction was made in the case of children over 15 years of age. The reason given for the reduction in respect to children under 10 years of age was that they were hardly capable of industrial training; and the reason assigned for the reduction in the case of children over 15 years of age was that keeping children too long in Industrial Schools was not favourable to their moral or physical development. He had letters in his possession contradicting the reasons assigned in both instances. Indeed, the experience of every Industrial School proved that if children of the class sent there did not begin their instruction at an early age, the purpose for which industrial schools were instituted would be frustrated. It was the neglected state of those children which mainly justified any Treasury aid at all for national education, and which led many to a desire for compulsory education. The Industrial Schools were already the receptacles of compulsory scholars. With regard to children over 15 years of age, he believed that the Circular Letter exhibited a prevalent mistake in the estimation of these schools, arising from their being treated, in consequence of their connection with the Home Office instead of the Education Department, like penal or pauper establishments, and not as schools. In an article on the subject of enlistment in the Army the leading journal on Saturday last adverted to the difficulty which was experienced in getting well-educated adults to that service. The Navy could take boys young—it would be expensive for the State to educate Army recruits till they were old enough for the service, and it would be well to see if we could not render the children educated at the public expense in those schools available for military purposes. In his opinion the present payment of 5s. per head was sufficient, and in some cases more than enough; but he thought that the right hon. Gentleman had made a mistake in proposing to reduce the proportion of the grant in the case of such boys under 10 years of age on the ground that they were too young to benefit by Industrial Schools; and in the case of the elder boys on the ground that they were old enough to earn their own living, ignoring the fact that they might be doing so in the school itself, or preparing to emigrate, or for special service. Under these circumstances, he begged to ask the right hon. Gentleman to explain the reasons which had induced him to propose these reductions?

ALDERMAN SIR DAVID SALOMONS said, he thought that these schools ought to have a wider scope given to them, and that the police should be instructed to keep a sharper eye on vagabond children.

MR. BOWRING inquired, whether the sum taken in the present Estimates was based upon the old allowance of 5s. a-week, or upon the proposal contained in the right hon. Gentleman's Circular?

MR. BAXTER replied that the Vote was based on the old allowance.

MR. BRUCE said, that the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Charles Adderley) spoke with such authority upon this subject, he having spent the greater part of a most useful life in supporting every institution which tended to reduce crime, that he always differed from him with extreme reluctance. No doubt it was of national interest that these unhappy children should be turned into good citizens, instead of being allowed to become the pests of society; but, at the same time, it should be kept in mind that their cases were exceptional. He would not go so far as to apply to the directors of these institutions the saying of Talleyrand, with respect to fathers of families, "That they were capable of anything;" but, certainly, the tendency in Scotland and many parts of the country was to strain very much the machinery of the Industrial Schools Act, and to send to the schools established under it a vast number of children who had no right to be admitted into them, but who ought to be dealt with under the Poor Law. It had been in consequence of this tendency that the Government had found it necessary to determine that no children should be admitted into them who were under six years of age. The annual sum appropriated to the support of these schools had increased from £19,000 in 1865 to £115,000 in the present year, which showed the necessity which existed for placing some check upon the practice of relieving the local burdens by means of these schools at the expense of the Imperial funds. The tendency of these schools was to become more burdensome to the Imperial Revenue, and as he was most desirous that they should be supported by voluntary and local effort, he had determined to reduce the allowance for the children. With regard to the children between 15 and 16 years of age he thought he was justified in making a reduction, for the simple reason, which he thought no one would gainsay, that at that period of life a child could contribute something considerable towards its own support. However excellent the instruction might be it had a prejudicial effect on the character of the children, for nothing could replace the freedom which a child enjoyed in earning a livelihood beyond the walls of an institution. After very careful consideration and consultation with those who were well able to advise him on the matter, he issued a circular announcing the reduction in the allowance to those schools.

Mr. Bruce

Many expostulations against the reduction had reached the Government; but managers of several of the most important institutions in the country had expressed their approbation of that step, and mainly because there was a tendency in these schools to cease to be voluntary. At the same time, these were institutions of great national importance, and it would be necessary to watch most closely the effect of the change in them. Nothing could be further from his wish, or that of the Government, than to do anything detrimental to these institutions, which were doing so much good.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY wished to know how much the Government would save by this reduction, and whether the new system would be applied to Ireland? He feared that the consequence of reducing the grant would be to destroy some institutions that were of great advantage in Ireland.

MR. BRUCE said, that the reduction would not apply to the Irish Industrial Schools.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, he was inclined to think that the alteration in the amount of the grant was a step in the right direction; though no doubt some difficulty would be felt from the managers being too ready to rely upon Imperial funds instead of upon local rates and subscriptions. Too liberal an allowance would probably do more harm than good. A great deal of mischief would be done by anything that would have a tendency to cause the honest working man to neglect his children. There were constant complaints that a poor man could not bring up his children in the way in which children were educated at these institutions, and that there would be no chance for their being so brought up unless he should neglect them and turn them into the streets. It was very difficult to answer such allegations. The real excuse for spending public money upon these children was, that if they were let alone in their neglected state they would probably cause a good deal of evil to society at large. This end should always be kept in view, both in the quality of education given, and the selection of the children, so as to avoid giving a premium to the neglect of children, and more trouble should be taken for the same reason, to exact contributions from parents. The cases should be wholly exceptional. If there was a difficulty as to funds these cases would be properly selected; but if there were a large grant, the managers of the institutions would not be careful whom they admitted within their walls.

DR. BREWER said, he hoped it would be remembered that these Industrial Schools took the place of the prison. They were intended to supersede the necessity of imprisoning children for a greater or less time and exposing them to vicious associations. He did not think that they could draw any hard-and-fast line in respect to the age at which children should be received at or dismissed from school.

MR. CONOLLY said, he was glad to see the attention paid to reformatories in England, because he should on a future occasion bring to the notice of the House the success which had attended the Reformatory of Glencree, in Ireland, under the management of the monks. The proportion of boys reclaimed was 90 per cent, while in England, under the most favourable auspices, it was not more than 75 per cent. He would ask the Prime Minister for a small grant for the Reformatory.

MR. D. DALRYMPLE said, he saw in the Vote an item of £320 for the maintenance of criminal lunatics in private asylums. It was highly inexpedient that such lunatics should be confined in private asylums. There was a Bill in "another place" which proposed to transfer criminal lunatics in Scotland to chartered institutions. He hoped before another year some means would be taken to put a stop to this practice.

MR. M'LAREN said, that the managers of the chartered institutions in Scotland complained grievously of the Bill to which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bath had referred.

Question put, and agreed to.

(16.) £251,980, to complete the sum for the maintenance of Prisoners, Juvenile Offenders, and Criminal Lunatics.

(17.) £25,410, to complete the sum for Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum.

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH said, he would suggest that the Home Secretary should take into consideration a matter which had been pressed by him on successive Secretaries of State—namely, some arrangements for retaining at Broadmoor criminal lunatics of a dangerous character after the term of their sentence had expired. Under the Act of 1869 the Home Secretary had power to order their removal to the asylums of the county to which they belonged. There was no proper provision in the county asylums for lunatics of a dangerous class, and they might well be retained at Broadmoor at the expense of the county or borough to which they might be chargeable.

MR. GOLDSMID desired to call attention to the case of a person whose sentence had expired and who was sent to his county asylum from Dartmoor. Nearly all the time the medical officers were of opinion that the man was perfectly sane, and yet they were obliged to keep him. He was not sure that the medical superintendent was not liable to an action.

MR. BRUCE said, he thought if the sentence had expired and the man was sane those who detained him would be liable to an action. With regard to the general question, there was the greatest possible difficulty in providing at Broadmoor for the criminal lunatics sent there, and the managers were most desirous of transferring them to the counties chargeable with their support. There was, however, great force in the appeal of his hon. Friend, and he would undertake to see to it.

Vote agreed to.

(18.) £15,750, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Legal Charges in England.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE asked, how it happened that additional revising barristers were always wanted, and why the number of days during which they were required was always the same?

MR. BRUCE said, that was the best Estimate that could be made; he would not undertake to say all the money would be spent.

Vote agreed to.

(19.) £55,675, to complete the sum for Criminal Proceedings in Scotland.

(20.) £42,767, to complete the sum for Courts of Law and Justice in Scotland.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, that in Scotland there were Courts called Sheriffs' Courts; but though the office was one of very great importance—more important, in fact, than that of the Judges of the County Courts in England or Ireland—the sheriff himself did not discharge the duties of the Court, but they were discharged by an officer called the sheriff-substitute. Now it appeared, from what had taken place the other night, that this sheriff-substitute might himself appoint a deputy, of whom the Law Officers of the Crown might know nothing. What he (Sir Colman O’Loghlen) desired to know was, if it was true that the sheriff-substitute had the power to appoint any person as his deputy whom he thought proper, so long as he was a barrister of five years’ standing? If such was the case, he thought it was an abuse which ought not to be allowed to continue. In England a County Court Judge could only have a deputy appointed by the Lord Chancellor, and there was the same practice in Ireland. In his opinion there ought to be some power conferred so that in Scotland the appointment of a sheriff-depute might be controlled and the sheriff-substitute might not be allowed to appoint whoever he liked. The power to appoint a sheriff-depute ought either to be in the hands of the Lord Advocate or one of the Judges.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the information on which his right hon. and learned Friend had made his statement was not altogether accurate. In the first place, he was wrong in his assumption that the duties of the Sheriff Court were performed by the sheriff-substitute and not by the sheriff. The office of sheriff was a very important one, and in many of the counties in Scotland the duties were very onerous. The sheriff had, by Act of Parliament and by the terms of his commission, power to appoint a substitute. It was a question whether the power to appoint a sheriff-substitute should continue as at present in the hands of the sheriff, or whether it might not conduce to the public service to transfer the patronage to the Crown. From the sheriff-substitute there was an appeal to the sheriff, and the appeals were very numerous. It was not accurate to suppose that the appointment of the sheriff-depute was made by the sheriff-substitute. There was very rarely occasion to make such an appointment at all; but when the occasion did arise, the appointment was made by the sheriff, and not by the sheriff-substitute. If the sheriff-substitute was ill or unable to attend to his duties from some temporary cause, a deputy was appointed by the sheriff. He did not think there was anything in the present state of matters to call for legislative interference—it might be worthy of consideration, but he had no proposal to submit.

Vote agreed to.

(21.) £22,740, to complete the sum for General Register House, Edinburgh.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that although this sum seemed a very considerable one, it would appear from the account that it was not a Vote of public money, the expenses of the department in question being more than sufficiently provided for by the receipts and fees. This subject had given rise to dissatisfaction, because the Scotch people felt that they were practically taxed for a larger amount than was sufficient to maintain the establishment. It was urged some time ago that it was quite impossible to introduce any reform of the Register House until all the registers were united, and power was given to the Treasury as soon as that should take place to apply a remedy to the state of things complained of. What was asked for was that the fees should be so reduced that after paying the expenses of the department there should be no surplus to go into the general Exchequer of the country. The public had a full right to the benefit of reduced fees if the receipts of the department would justify it. In his opinion the time had come when the Treasury ought to act upon the power which they had, and reduce the fees.

MR. M’LAREN asked what was the exact amount paid to the retired officers throughout Scotland, and whether the payments which had been made had been taken out of the fees? The expenditure of the present year was £30,200, while the receipts were £39,500, leaving a balance of £9,300, and there was a similar surplus last year. He feared that out of these balances had been paid the retiring allowances of those registrars whose offices had been brought to Edinburgh. If this was the case, the amount of the retiring allowances ought to be stated in the Estimates. As to the general balance, it was altogether wrong that it should go into the public purse. The Act of Parliament distinctly stated that the surplus was to be applied to the reduction of the fees, and no one could defend the appropriation of the money to any other purpose.

Sir Colman O’Loghlen

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN said, he quite agreed with the hon. Member for Edinburgh. It was unjust that the landed proprietors of Scotland should contribute in this way a large sum to the national Exchequer. It was the duty of the Government at once to reduce the fees.

THE LORD ADVOCATE agreed that the fees in this Court ought not to be a source of revenue, it having been provided by the Act of Parliament, passed three years ago, that they should be adjusted so as to meet the expenses of the department as nearly as could be calculated, and he regretted that hitherto no steps had been taken towards their reduction. He was informed by the Secretary to the Treasury that the retiring allowances were paid out of the general funds of the country, but no such account was kept as enabled him to set that amount against the other. The department was not under his control; but he would do all he could to have justice done.

MR. ANDERSON asked whether steps were being taken to avoid complaints about the backward state of business in the Register House?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was aware that such complaints had been made, and he was sorry to say not unreasonably. The general explanation was that the establishment was very much under-manned, and the duties placed upon the department had been much increased. This was now remedied to a large extent.

MR. BAXTER said, the retiring allowances which were paid last year amounted to £2,646.

MR. M'LAREN said, then it appeared that even after paying the retiring allowances, they had still a surplus. They had disobeyed an Act of Parliament in not applying that surplus to the reduction of fees, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had put the money into his pocket. He trusted that it would be paid back.

Vote agreed to.

(22.) £18,987, to complete the sum for Prisons in Scotland, &c.

(23.) £59,403, to complete the sum for Criminal Prosecutions, &c., Ireland.

(24.) £33,903, to complete the sum for the Court of Chancery, Ireland.

(25.) £22,377, to complete the sum for the Superior Courts of Common Law in Ireland.

(26.) £6,470, to complete the sum for the Court of Bankruptcy and Insolvency in Ireland.

(27.) £9,721, to complete the sum for the Landed Estates Court, Ireland.

(28.) £8,526, to complete the sum for the Court of Probate in Ireland.

(29.) £1,540, to complete the sum for the Admiralty Court Registry, Ireland.

(30.) £11,508, to complete the sum for the Office for Registration of Deeds in Ireland.

(31.) £2,316, to complete the sum for the Office for Registration of Judgments in Ireland.

(32.) £73,673, to complete the sum for the Dublin Metropolitan Police.

(33.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £693,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for the Constabulary Force in Ireland."

MR. FIELDEN observed, that a large sum was put down for pensions, and that the increase over the amount asked for last year was £10,442. He objected to the increase, and moved that the Vote be reduced by that amount.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £682,818, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for the Constabulary Force in Ireland."—(Mr. Joshua Fielden.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that the pensions were granted under Act of Parliament, and he scarcely believed that the hon. Member for the West Riding would persist in his proposal to deprive the men of the pensions they had earned, and on the faith of receiving which they had been induced to enter the service.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, that the amount of pensions was certainly enormous, and was increasing at the rate of £10,000 a-year. It already amounted to £120,000; whereas the pay of the force only amounted to £567,000.

MR. RYLANDS said, that these pensions were a difficult matter to deal with, as they were granted under an Act of Parliament; but the Government should take speedy steps to deal with the whole question of pensions and retiring allowances.

MR. M'LAREN said, he would call attention to the fact that while the sum voted for the whole police force of Scotland was only £45,000 a-year, the pensions to the police force in Ireland amounted to no less than £121,000.

MR. CANDLISH said, he considered 22 per cent a most enormous amount for pensions and retiring allowances. The police force of Ireland absorbed upwards of £1,000,000, more than twice the amount of England, Wales, and Scotland, and he hoped the whole question would be looked into by the Government, with a view to the reduction of that enormous charge.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK thought the Vote a most extravagant one.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON admitted that the Vote was a large one; but there were large questions involved. Was the House prepared to accept the alternative of greatly reducing the police force in Ireland, or asking Ireland to defray the whole expense of the constabulary, to whose efficiency everyone bore witness, and to substitute local for Imperial management of the force?

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(34.) £35,400, to complete the sum for Government Prisons, &c., Ireland.

(35.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £39,323, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for the Maintenance of Prisoners in County and Borough Gaols, and for the Expenses of Reformatories and Industrial Schools in Ireland."

MR. VANCE said, he must object to the system pursued in the Industrial Schools of Ireland. 18,000 Roman Catholic children had been sent there, while there were only 123 children belonging to every other creed. Practically a denominational education was thus given to the Roman Catholic children, contrary to the national system, which he hoped no Government would ever consent to alter. He moved the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £10,000.

Mr. Rylands

Motion made, and Question proposed;

"That a sum, not exceeding £20,323, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for the Maintenance of Prisoners in County and Borough Gaols, and for the Expenses of Reformatories and Industrial Schools in Ireland."—(Mr. Vance.)

MR. GOLDSMID expressed a warm approval of the Irish Industrial Schools, which had introduced greater habits of industry among certain classes of the Irish people. He cordially hoped that the amount of this Vote would be increased next year.

MR. CONOLLY said, he had never heard a more unjust statement respecting these schools than that which had fallen from the hon. Member for Armagh. The reformatories had done most excellent work in Ireland. The Roman Catholics were deserving of praise for looking after their juvenile criminals better than their Protestant fellow-countrymen did.

MR. VANCE said, he would explain that the children in the Industrial Schools were not criminals. The reformatories might have done very good work, but that was not the case with the Irish Industrial Schools.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(36.) £4,200, to complete the sum for Dundrum Criminal Lunatic Asylum, Ireland.

(37.) £1,880, to complete the sum for the Four Courts Marshalsea, Dublin.

(38.) £6,670, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Legal Expenses in Ireland.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow;
Committee to sit again To-morrow.

And at Seven of the clock the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

NEW FOREST.—RESOLUTION.

MR. FAWCETT, in rising to call attention to the subject of the New Forest, and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, pending legislation on the New Forest, no felling of ornamental timber and no fresh inclosures should be permitted in the New Forest ; and that no timber whatever should be cut, except for the purposes of thinning the young plantations, executing necessary repairs in the Forest, and satisfying the fuel rights of the Commoners," said, the Motion which he should bring before the House represented the almost unanimous feeling of the independent Members, and he believed, from the communications he had received, that the Government were equally as anxious as they that the Motion should be passed. He did not intend in the slightest degree to fetter the action of hon. Members, because, whatever might be their opinion as to the future use of the Forest, he should not think it fair to ask them to prejudge the case. All that he desired was to obtain an expression of opinion that, until the Government had had an opportunity of legislating on the subject, if any legislation were necessary, nothing should be done that would injure the Forest, or affect its present condition. Anyone who visited the New Forest must come to the conclusion that the time had arrived when the House should express an opinion on the subject, and that nothing should be done to destroy what remained of beauty there, or to injure it as a place of resort. The destruction of ornamental timber there had been truly lamentable, but that Forest might still be considered to be one of the most beautiful spots in England, and he desired that the House should say that further spoiling of the picturesque ought not to be effected. As future legislation on this subject would be materially affected by the quantity of land that was inclosed, and as such inclosure diminished the area that could be enjoyed by the public, besides destroying the beauty of the Forest scenery, he thought it only fair for the House to say that pending legislation no further inclosure should be made. In the latter part of his Motion he had deemed it necessary to insert a few qualifying sentences, because he knew that there were certain rights as to fuel that must be exercised, and also because it might be necessary to thin the plantations. As he believed the Government intended to accept his Motion, he should have thought it unnecessary to make any further remarks on the subject, had it not been for the Paper which had just been issued by Mr. Howard, of the Woods and Forests Department, for that had conveyed to the minds of some hon. Members an impression that even if this Resolution was passed it would produce no practical effect. He did not intend to discuss that Paper, but would only say that if the House and the Government expressed an opinion on the subject that no more timber ought to be felled, and no further inclosure should be made until there had been an opportunity of legislating, Mr. Howard, as an official serving under the Government, and representing a Department, would pay some attention to the Resolution, which would, therefore, have an important practical bearing. He would, therefore, conclude by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. CLIFFORD, in rising to second the Motion, said, it was only the other day his illustrious friend the Poet Laureate had informed him that he had gone down to the New Forest to search there for an ancient wood of yews, which had existed since the time of William the Conqueror ; but all trace of them was gone. He himself (Mr. Clifford) had made inquiries about this wood, and had learned that it had been sold to a merchant at Lyndhurst for £60. The fact appeared to be that the New Forest was held in no more esteem by the Woods and Forests than the yellow primrose by Mr. Peter Bell. This Forest, however, which was first created for the diversion of a Norman tyrant, was now a most magnificent pleasure park for the people of England, who found there that rural enjoyment which the richer classes sought in Scotland and other places, and as such it ought to be maintained. They were under a deep obligation to the hon. Member for Brighton for bringing that matter forward, and he thought the Resolution of the House ought to declare, beyond any doubt, that there should be no further encroachment on the Forest. He had the pleasure of knowing Mr. Howard, and he believed that a more excellent or more conscientious public servant, as far as regarded the question of pounds, shillings, and pence connected with his office, did not exist anywhere. Still, it was very necessary for the House to look closely after that office. He did not want to say anything more disagreeable to a Ministry than he could help ; but it was to the efforts of the hon. Member for Southwark that they were indebted for the Thames Embankment.

Had not that hon. Member brought the subject before the House, they would not at this moment have had a continuous Embankment, because the Government of the day, by means of the Office of Woods and Forests, had wished to prevent the Embankment from passing by Richmond Terrace. It was very essential that the House should guard against the encroachments of that Department.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, pending legislation on the New Forest, no felling of ornamental timber and no fresh inclosures should be permitted in the New Forest; and that no timber whatever should be cut, except for the purposes of thinning the young plantations, executing necessary repairs in the Forest, and satisfying the fuel rights of the Commoners"—(Mr. Fawcett.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in rising to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice, to move as an addition to the hon. Member for Brighton's (Mr. Fawcett's) Resolution, "Also that Denny Wood should be restored to its former condition as an open forest land," said, that hon. Members who took an interest in the preservation of the New Forest might remember that some weeks ago he put a Question relating to the inclosure of Denny Wood to his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury. That Question was not put without some knowledge of the facts, nor was it framed without a certain care; but the answer of his hon. Friend, although remarkable for that clearness and that precision which always distinguished his answers, was not of a satisfactory nature, and was not, he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) feared, founded upon an adequate knowledge of the case. The Question that he put to his hon. Friend was divided into two parts. In the first portion of it he asked him whether Denny Wood was originally inclosed with a view to felling and planting, and he was told by him—

"That it was intended originally only to fell such trees in Denny Wood as were dying or defective, and to replant their sites."

If that were so, the course taken was illegal. Sections 3 and 4 of "The Deer Removal Act" authorized the Crown to "inclose and plant," but so that all inclosures "should be made and reported a nursery for timber and trees only." The Crown had violated certainly the spirit and, he thought, the letter of these sections. It obtained the power to inclose Denny Wood from the New Forest Inclosures Commissions under Section 3 of "The Deer Removal Act," on the implied faith that it intended to convert the inclosure into a nursery for trees. But finding that if the Act was complied with the value of the property would undergo a great depreciation, and hoping to secure the inclosure as part of the property of the Crown, freed from common rights and from all public rights, the Crown left the inclosed land alone; and when the commoners said, "If you inclose, you are bound to plant," it answered, "If you press us, we will cut the trees." The Commissioners refused to tell them why Denny Wood was inclosed. They thought, and had every reason to think, that they wished to retain that beautiful wood as a choice and compact estate in itself, with a view that it should ultimately pass to the Crown, unincumbered with rights of common, or other public rights. That this was the correct view was established by the provisions of the Bill now withdrawn. Section 41 provided that the Commissioners should not allot to the commoners "any land which is now inclosed under the authority of the recited Acts"—that was, all existing inclosures, including Denny Wood, were, on the passing of that Bill, to vest in the Crown, as provided by the 46th section, "as part of the possessions and land revenues of the Crown, absolutely freed from all rights of common." He repeated, before he left that branch of the subject, that the Crown had no power to inclose open forest lands over which commonable rights were exercised, except by virtue of statutory powers. The statutes provided that inclosures were to be made for the purpose of planting only. That was not so as to Denny Wood, for there no planting had taken place, and as to the greater portion of it—that part covered with old timber—Mr. Howard long ago promised that no felling, and consequently no planting, should take place. He again asked, therefore, why and how, legally speaking, had Denny Wood been inclosed? A local answer was given, that it was inclosed in order to allow self-sown timber to spring up. If so, that was illegal; but he had been told upon the spot, that the only self-sown timber that was ever seen in the New Forest now was Scotch fir, and that the cones were found stuck in rows in the ground a long way from the trees from whence they came. They might be self-sown; but the self-sowing process was aided by Her Majesty's keepers and Her Majesty's carts. He now came to the other part of his Question, in which he asked whether, now that no more cutting of ancient timber was for the present to take place in the New Forest, Denny Wood should be restored to its former condition, as open forest land. He was told, in answer to that, that the Commissioners had power only to throw open the inclosure when "the young trees were past danger from cattle." What young trees? There were no young trees. The only trees not ancient timber in Denny Wood were some trees in an inclosure of 1829, called, he thought, "Little Holme Inclosure." But his Question and the Answer could not relate to these, and for two reasons. They were not in Denny Wood Inclosure, but in an old inclosure within it, and if all the posts and rails and banks and gates round Denny Wood were to be thrown down, the cattle would nevertheless not get into this inclosure of 1829. His second reason was so much stronger, that he was reminded of the 21 reasons of the Mayor of Bayonne for not giving the keys of the town to Henri IV. of France, ending with the 21st—"There are no keys." It was this—that in the map of 1867 they would find that that inclosure was to be thrown open in 1869, as out of danger of cattle. That had not been done, because it was inside this very Denny Wood Inclosure. Really it was rather too bad to make that an excuse for not throwing open the latter. Now, what was Denny Wood? It was one of the most beautiful woods in the whole world. It was not like Mark Ash—a wood of beech only, but was mixed wood of beech, and birch, and oak. It was close to the railway, and therefore well within reach of pleasure-seekers. Several beautiful forest paths, much used by picnic parties, had been stopped up by a fortification-like fence, through which there was not a single gap. The whole of the gates had padlocks, and the whole of the padlocks were locked. Even if the cattle were to be excluded, he could not see why the walking public should be entirely blocked out. A private landowner would not be guilty of so gross a sin against public enjoyment of the most innocent kind. The fence was such that none but active youths could climb over it in any place, and for women, children, and old people, it was impassable. In trying to find an open gate, he saw the wanton destruction which, in making this inclosure, the Crown had wrought. The fence had been carried right through the best portion of the wood, and all the trees near it on either side were felled, and vast numbers of giant beeches and huge oaks laid still on the ground, unsold. He had one thing more to say. Denny Wood was a hernry—a place where herons often bred. Near to it was a marsh, known as the Bishop of Winchester's Purlieu. The herons were for the sport of the Bishop for the time, and the marsh was granted to—not the present Bishop he believed—but some ancient Bishop of a sporting turn, who induced a King to grant to him for hawking purposes as much of the marsh as he could crawl round in a day. He was sure that that House had too much respect for the right reverend Bench to permit the destruction of the herons that resorted to the Bishop of Winchester's Purlieu. But, seriously, he should take the opinion of the House on the preservation of Denny Wood. He would conclude by moving the Amendment to the Resolution of the hon. Member for Brighton, of which he had given Notice.

Mr. Clifford

MR. W. FOWLER seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words "also that Denny Wood should be restored to its former condition as open forest land."—(Sir Charles Dilke.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. BAXTER said, he was glad to find that the management of the Office of Woods had been admitted to be satisfactory in a pecuniary sense. The hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) stated that Denny Wood had been illegally inclosed, and that there were no young trees in that plantation. Those allegations rather surprised him, because the Commissioners of Woods and Forests distinctly held that they were bound by statute to inclose a certain portion of the New Forest every year, and that they had only acted in accordance with the Act of Parliament. He hoped his hon. Friend would not press his Motion to a division, because he (Mr. Baxter) had heard for the first time that evening that there were no young plantations in Denny Wood. Under the circumstances of the case it would become the duty of the Treasury to inquire carefully into the matter and to see who was right and wrong with respect to it. As to the padlocks which had been spoken of, he admitted that they ought to be at once removed, and he hoped the Commissioners of Woods and Forests would give directions to have them taken away. As to the Motion of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), the Government could not of course help accepting it, for it was couched in the precise terms of an Answer to a Question which he (Mr. Baxter) had himself given; and although it was rather an unusual thing to found a Motion upon an Answer given by a Member of the Government, yet the Treasury could not object to the Motion because they intended to take the precise course which he had stated in that Answer. That hon. Gentleman had, in the course of his remarks, animadverted on a Paper which had been laid on the Table of the House, and the Government saw no objection to the publication of the Report. He wished the House at the same time to understand that Mr. Howard was alone responsible for what he thought and said, although the Treasury were responsible for what he did.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, that the Paper in question gave but little information with respect to the mismanagement of the Crown lands to which it referred during several centuries. It was, indeed, a very curious document; for the remarks in it were not confined to the New Forest. It was rather a manifesto than anything else of the principles on which Mr. Howard and Mr. Gore managed the Crown lands under their charge. But those who were really responsible to the country had not stated the principles on which, in their opinion, those estates ought to be managed. The Commissioners of Woods and Forests contended that they were trustees for the lands in question, and that they were responsible to no one; but the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer acknowledged that he was responsible for their acts, and he ventured to think the Commissioners had entirely mistaken their position, and that the Government, too, mistook the position in which the Crown estates stood towards the public at large. It was never intended, he maintained, that they should be trustees of the Crown property. The division of that property which was made between them and the First Commissioner of Works, had been made simply for the convenience of management, and no one would, for a moment, contend that the First Commissioner was a trustee for the Crown estates under his charge. There was, in fact, in that respect, no difference between Hyde Park and Epping Forest, both of which were Crown lands. The right of the Crown to recreation in its parks and forests had enabled the people to have recreation in them also, and he must say the Government were, in his opinion, ill-advised when they endeavoured to divorce the two. The Crown Lands Commissioners had excited a strong feeling against themselves by the spirit which had led them to issue this Paper, for they had shown themselves determined to sacrifice the rights and the recreations of the Sovereign and the people, in order to carry out the principle of adding to the income derivable from these lands whenever the opportunity arose. What the Crown Lands Commissioners appeared to say was that, though they were sorry to disobey the wishes of Parliament, they were unable to act differently until a new Act of Parliament had been passed. The responsibility, however, was clearly vested in the Treasury, and it was impossible for the Treasury to shift that responsibility upon those who, after all, were only their subordinates. He thought the House ought to be told not only in what manner the Commissioners had been authorized to give their opinion, but they ought to be put in possession of the Correspondence between the Treasury and the Commissioners which had led to the issuing of this Paper. The Paper itself would, doubtless, at some future time furnish a bill of indictment against the Commissioners for the way in which they had acted in regard to Epping Forest, in having allowed it to slip out of the hands of those who were formerly able to take their recreation there. He submitted that it was not right any particular locality should be deprived, as they had been latterly, of a privilege which they had enjoyed for centuries. He was, however, exceedingly pleased that this Paper had been issued, because they could afterwards discuss the matter more easily, and possibly bring the Government to acknowledge that there ought to be some actual responsibility in the management of those estates, and that to the objections which were urged against the conduct of the Commissioners it was no answer to say that these lands were tied up as trust estates, and could not otherwise be dealt with.

Mr. Baxter

MR. HAMBRO said, he had been content to accept the intimation of the Government that they would agree to the proposal of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett); but, after the publication of that extraordinary Paper, he trusted the hon. Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) would press his Motion to a division.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, he was glad that the Government had assented to the Motion of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett). Within his own recollection allotments of beautiful woodland had been made simply that the timber upon it might be cut down, and in the face of such a state of things it was of the utmost importance that the inquiry with regard to Denny Wood should be pursued by the Government. It was true that the Department of Woods and Forests produced each year a satisfactory balance-sheet, so far as mere financial results were concerned; but this was only accomplished by cutting down and selling large quantities of noble timber that ought to be let stand. It was true that little or no timber had been felled since 1864; but previous to that year the average annual value of the timber cut down for several years ranged between £10,000 and £15,000. In addition to that, there were entries in the accounts of £3,000 for fuel, which meant that the beautiful beech trees in the Forest were felled and sold at the rate of 3*d.* a foot to be chopped up and sold as firewood. And all that destruction of forest trees, which were, in actual fact, monuments, both valuable and beautiful, had been carried on for no earthly reason, so far as he was able to judge. He could not go so far as to say, with the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke), that Denny Wood was illegally inclosed, because the inclosure was directed by Commissioners legally constituted and invested with power to act as they did; but as land containing old wood was usually, if not invariably, inclosed for the simple purpose of cutting down the old trees and planting young ones, he should be inclined to hold that the inclosure in question was illegal if any other course was pursued. He must say that, having only recently visited Denny Wood, he failed to see any young trees growing there. It was important, too, that the House should be told plainly who was responsible for the conduct of the Department of Woods and Forests. Unless that was done, hon. Gentlemen would not know in what light to regard the Papers occasionally issued, as the one placed in the hands of hon. Members on the preceding day had been, by the officials in the Department. The last document issued in 1867 was about the most unfair statement of the relative position of the Crown and the commoners that could have been written. It was, in fact, an ex parte argumentative legal statement, drawn up by the Solicitors to the Department, for the purpose of prejudicing the interests of the commoners, and he contended that it was unfair to issue any such document with all the authority of Parliament. The Paper just issued, too, was almost as full as its predecessor of partial extracts and one-sided statements of fact; but there was no one in that House to defend the authority and accuracy of the statements made. It would, therefore, be advisable that one of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, who should be responsible alike for the finances and the conduct of the Board, should have a seat in that House, and unless he was much mistaken there was a clause—namely, section 21 of 10 Geo. IV. c. 60, which provided for that.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the clause of the Act in question had been repealed.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, that if this was the case he hoped the Government would carefully consider the question and provide for the direct representation of the Department in Parliament in some way. He would revert to his statement that the Paper recently circulated was full of inaccuracies, and would say that some of the passages contained in it were not even what they purported to be—namely, correct copies of documents. For example, there was a quotation from the Act of William III., but the words “2,000 acres” were omitted, and the words "inclosures, or within inclosures to be hereafter made" substituted, and there were many other alterations of the same kind. Again, these gentlemen gave a quotation from the Report of the Commissioners of 1789; but left out that portion which told immensely against themselves. There were likewise misquotations respecting inclosures in the Act introduced by the Government this Session. Some of these inclosures were 4,000 or 5,000 acres in extent, and the public were prevented from walking through them, although no harm could possibly result from their being allowed to do so. In conclusion, he thanked the hon. Member for Brighton for bringing in this Motion, and expressed his hope that the Government would accede to it, as well as to the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea, which he should certainly support, if the hon. Baronet went to a division upon it.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE said, he hoped the Motion which had been acceded to by the Government would admit a little light into the recesses of the Office of Woods and Forests. In the remarkable Paper which had been placed on the Table, the Commissioner of Woods stated that it was his duty to manage the Forests for the benefit of the public, but he took a different view from that entertained by the majority of hon. Members as to what the interests of the public really were. He repudiated any benefit but a pecuniary one. When the Commissioner had to deal with some of the most magnificent beech trees in this country, he seemed to think the best thing he could do for the interests of the public was to cut them down and sell them for firewood. It did not seem to have occurred to him that the public could possibly care for the Forest as a natural landscape, of which the country was proud. No one in this House ever alleged that the public money was wasted when it was expended in purchasing the productions of great landscape painters for the National Gallery; but the Commissioner could not believe that the public approved of the expenditure of money for the purpose of preserving the finest natural landscape existing in England. He wondered whether the Commissioner, if he had the charge of the National Gallery, would sell the pictures for what the canvas and paint would fetch; or whether, if he had the management of the British Museum, he would sell the Elgin Marbles for the value of the marble of which they were composed. The progress of inclosure, and improvements in agriculture, were rooting out the beauty and charm of the wild scenery in England, and as this was the only large Forest still open freely to the public, it was their duty not to sacrifice wantonly and unnecessarily the beauty of the scenery, nor to allow the destruction of ancient and matchless trees, in order that their places might be taken by young saplings, which might as well be planted in other situations. The British public delighted in the picturesque, and surely it was impolitic to drive them abroad in search of it? He hoped that henceforth it would be a recognized principle among the official arbiters of the fate of this Forest that it was not to be wantonly and carelessly destroyed, but that it was to be preserved, as far as was consistent with the rights of the Crown, for the healthful enjoyment and pleasure of the public. In conclusion, he would urge that there was no part of England better adapted for the training of troops and for military manœuvres as the New Forest. It presented inequalities of surface, open spaces, and woods; it was in the vicinity of the garrisons of Portsmouth and Winchester; and a national interest would be served by preserving it as a place for military manœuvres.

SIR HARRY VERNEY also urged that no part of England was so important to the country for campaigning manœuvres. It not only presented every variety of surface, but it was also near the sea, and therefore available for the purposes of embarkation; and, in fact, it was adapted to all those tactics which had brought the Prussian Army to such perfection. He hoped, therefore, the House would not permit the destruction of that beautiful district, which was the best exercising ground in the whole country. The very Paper of Mr. Howard proved that the Commissioners of Woods and Forests were really unfit to be intrusted with the management of the New Forest.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he trusted the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) would withdraw his Motion, in order that it might go forth to the country that Parliament had unanimously determined to preserve the New Forest for the recreation of the public. After the announcement from the Treasury bench that the padlock should be taken off the inclosure to Denny Wood, it would be a bold Government indeed that would continue the course of demolition which had been going on in that wood. The Paper of Mr. Howard gave them some very trite advice as to the duties of proprietors with regard to the property they held, and as to the responsibility of the officers of the Government to the taxpayers of the country. All that advice was already anticipated by the A B C of constitutional Government or of Ministerial management. What they did want was something in the Paper which would clear their minds and free their apprehensions as to this particular exceptional property of the Crown, of which the most ornamental portion, by the mismanagement of the very Department now on its trial, had diminished to 6,000 acres. Before the ill-omened legislation of 1851, the ancient wood land covered 9,000 acres; so that it had been reduced by 3,000 acres since that time. In regard to the question why were there the two Departments of Woods and Forests and of Public Works, he thought the answer was contained in the intention of Parliament, that certain property in the country should not be administered regardless of benefit to the public on the one hand, and of the honour and dignity of the realm itself on the other. Therefore it was that, the Royal Parks of London and similar property being at present under the administration of the Office of Public Works, the argument of Mr. Howard's Paper fell to the ground. Parliament having decided that there were certain provisions to be applied to the public Parks, it was only a question whether the woods of the New Forest should be thrown into the ordinary category of woods and forests, or whether they should be put under the footing of Kensington Gardens and Hyde Park. He claimed that those ancient groves of the New Forest should be dealt with as park land, not as wood land. He was, to a large extent, a proprietor of woodland property, and therefore he was not speaking in ignorance of his subject; and he claimed that the noble old woodland of the New Forest, with its trees of gigantic size, and of an age that was dated by centuries, should be treated as a park.

Lord Henry Scott

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, it had always been his opinion that when the question of the New Forest came to be discussed in that House the sentimental view of the subject would be found to prevail. At the same time, the right hon. Member for South Hampshire (Mr. Cowper-Temple) must be perfectly aware that there were numerous inhabitants of that division of the county who would be glad to see a portion of the New Forest sold in lots and appropriated to agricultural purposes. It had fallen to his lot to have to deal with the case of the New Forest; and it was at his suggestion that the Government of the day refused to allow a Disafforestation Bill to be introduced. When, at the beginning of the Session, a Bill was laid on the Table, he took the liberty of suggesting that the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) might come to the rescue, and that by aid of the section of the House in which he occupied so distinguished a position, the disafforesting of the New Forest might be put entirely out of the question. It had been a practice of that House to bear hardly and unnecessarily on the Commissioners of Woods and Forests with regard to the property of which they had charge. That, he thought, was unjust. It was clearly unjust that they should be found fault with for doing what he believed they considered to be their duty. The disafforesting of the New Forest was forced upon the Commissioners by the residents of the New Forest, who quarrelled with the Act of Parliament that was passed in their interests and at their suggestion. He always felt that the House would take the question into its own hand, and would, at the proper time, interfere to prevent the disafforesting of the New Forest. He now understood that the wild and wooded district of the New Forest would be left in its integrity.

MR. M. CHAMBERS said, he was glad that some progress was being made with this question, and that an understanding was likely to be arrived at about the management of these forests. The House had had placed before it a manuscript of the recollections of one of the managers of the Woods and Forests. "Oh, that mine enemy would write a book!" because a perusal of that manuscript must convince every hon. Member that the forests were being mismanaged, and, however polite they might desire to be towards the Commissioners, the House must be determined; while the Government ought to consider whether the present arrangements for managing Crown property ought to be continued. The assent to the Motion that had been given by the Government must convince all that a change was necessary, and the unanimity of opinion that prevailed among hon. Members was the condemnation of the Commissioners.

Mr. FAWCETT said, he was desired by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) to state that he wished to withdraw his Amendment, in consequence of the satisfactory promise of the Government to give up the padlocks on Denny Wood. He explained, in reference to the statement that had been made by the Secretary to the Treasury, that he did not desire to express the least want of confidence in anything that his hon. Friend might say; but it must be remembered that the answer which was given by a Minister was to a certain extent his individual opinion, but a Resolution of the House was a formal matter, and recorded as the expression of the opinion of Parliament. The House, he thought, would be of opinion that he was right in bringing forward that Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, pending legislation on the New Forest, no felling of ornamental timber and no fresh inclosures should be permitted in the New Forest; and that no timber whatever should be cut, except for the purposes of thinning the young plantations, executing necessary repairs in the Forest, and satisfying the fuel rights of the Commoners.—(Mr. Fawcett.)

ARMY SERVICE ABROAD.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

Mr. W. M. TORRENS moved—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that measures be taken to prevent as far as practicable Soldiers enlisted in any Regiment of Cavalry or Infantry of the Line, being called upon to serve Her Majesty out of the United Kingdom, who shall not have attained the age of twenty years.”

Motion agreed to.

Mr. M. Chambers

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that measures be taken to prevent as far as practicable Soldiers enlisted in any Regiment of Cavalry or Infantry of the Line, being called upon to serve Her Majesty out of the United Kingdom, who shall not have attained the age of twenty years.”—(Mr. W. M. Torrens.)

CHARITIES, &c. EXEMPTION BILL—

[BILL 23.]

(Mr. Muntz, Viscount Sandon, Mr. Wheelhouse.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [10th May], “That the Bill be now read a second time;” and which Amendment was, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.”—(Mr. Hardcastle.)

Question again proposed, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question.”

Debate resumed.

Mr. MUNTZ said, he expected his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department would have given some reason why he did not proceed with the Bill he had introduced for abolishing all exemptions from payment of rates. He might assume, however, that that measure was withdrawn because there was not the remotest chance of its being carried. Two years ago, he might remark, the principle of the exemption of Sunday schools was carried in that House by a majority of 120, and he now had to ask the House to pass that Bill, the object of which was to exempt from the payment of poor rates charitable institutions which were supported solely by the voluntary contributions of the public, and likewise to exempt hospitals and other similar institutions, with the consent of the vestry, from the payment of those rates which now threatened to destroy several of them. The Bill merely re-enacted the old law of the land.

Mr. GOSCHEN said, he was sorry that it was impossible for the Government to accept the Motion of the hon. Member, who erroneously supposed that he would by this proposal re-enact the old law. He provided that it should be permissive for vestries or the other authorities to decide what particular charities should be exempted, and the effect of that would be to raise a debate —which would be often, he feared, of an acrimonious nature—in every parish as regarded the merits of every charity it possessed. This would be highly undesirable. It would be impossible in many cases to define, as the clause would require, whether a charity conducted in any way to the private profit or advantage of the occupier, because many charitable hospitals were supposed to have been established as an advertisement for those who conducted them. The Government had been prepared, at considerable cost to the Revenue, to abolish all exemptions; but, by making an exception in favour of property devoted to certain public, though charitable, purposes, they would destroy the whole principle, which would otherwise enable them to tax public property for local purposes. The Motion was conceived in a benevolent spirit, but it was impracticable. The Government in resisting it had no wish to check the course of charity; but it could not be carried into effect without involving injustice.

MR. DIXON said, he thought the difficulties of carrying the scheme into execution could hardly be so insuperable as the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty imagined, because the Bill would merely re-enact a law which was in force only a few years ago. It was not at all an unreasonable thing on the part of his Colleague to ask that that which had been the practice for so many years should continue to be the practice until a general law was passed. The words of the Bill were copied from the Irish Poor Law Act, and if they were right in Ireland they might be right here. If the permissive provision would not work well, that was not the principle of the Bill, and an alteration could be made; and it might be provided that where a vestry granted exemption in one case, it should be bound to grant it in all similar cases. At all events, that which had worked well for so many years should not be stopped by the mere accident of a Court of Law having given a particular decision in a particular case.

MR. LIDDELL said, he intended to vote against the Bill, because it contained a vicious principle. Until all property bore the burden of local taxation there was little chance of resisting its increase. The Bill of the Government evaded the difficulty of making all property liable to the support of the poor, or it would have met with a different reception.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, he approved the principle of the Bill, but thought the phrase “all institutions exclusively used for charitable purposes” rather too wide, while he admitted certain institutions might well be exempted from rates, such as hospitals for the sick.

MR. REED said, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) was the author of the permissive clause affecting ragged schools, and not a single case of difficulty had occurred under it.

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH said, he hoped the House would not pass the second reading, because it was no part of the duty of the House to remit local taxation; and he referred again, as he had done three years ago, in illustration of the injustice that would be done by the Bill to the magnificent pile of buildings, occupying a large site in a poor parish, constructed on the opposite shore of the river by the corporation of St. Thomas's Hospital, one of the wealthiest corporations of the Metropolis and of the world, which was that day (Wednesday) to receive Her Majesty and many hon. Members of that House at a magnificent entertainment.

MR. J. G. TALBOT, in supporting the Bill, said, that no disputes could arise in Boards of Guardians about the class of property to be rated, and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) would appear to have gained but little experience during his two years' presidency at the Poor Law Board if he was of impression that questions of rating could ever arise at the discussions of those bodies.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he must dispute the statement that these charities had from time immemorial been exempt from taxation, for, in point of fact, the exemption was first established in 1859. The Bill granted exemptions to endowed charities, and would, for instance, exclude the Smith Charity, where an annuity was granted to the bearers of that name, and to the Dog Charity, where a man left some money for the support of three dogs, and on the death of one of which a question of survivorship was raised in a Court of Equity. He was therefore opposed to a Bill which, by granting unnecessary exceptions, could only have the effect of still further burdening the community at large, more especially when in that very Parliament, also, a Resolution had been passed unanimously to place such institutions under the income tax law, a Resolution which was inconsistent with the principle of this Bill, which was also contrary to the old law of this country, as defined by Chief Justice Holt.

MR. HENLEY said, he should vote for the second reading upon the Preamble of the Bill, which was confined to schools and hospitals. The provisions themselves, which were wider, could be set right in Committee.

MR. J. S. HARDY said, he attached no value to the Resolution of the House placing charities under the income tax, as it was carried as a compromise, and probably would not have been carried if the House had had notice of it. There never was any difficulty in vestries deciding what hospitals should be relieved from taxation.

MR. BRISTOWE said, the recent decision in the Mersey Docks case was only an explanation of the Statute of Elizabeth, by which all property was made liable to the payment of poor rates. Not long ago a law was proposed to exempt literary institutions from taxation, but with very little success. He was opposed to the Bill.

MR. A. JOHNSTON said, he must deny that there was anything in the nature of surprise in his Motion, to which the hon. Member opposite (Mr. J. S. Hardy) had referred.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 68; Noes 116: Majority 48.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for six months.

HARROW SCHOOL.—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question proposed [13th June],

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to disallow the Statute now lying upon the Table of the House, by which membership of the Church of England is, for the first time, imposed as a qualification for appointment to the governing body of Harrow School."—(Mr. Trevelyan.)

Mr. Gladstone

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

After further debate,

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 99; Noes 71: Majority 28.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ACTS (IRELAND) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Serjeant SHERLOCK, Bill to amend the Law relating to Municipal Corporations in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Serjeant SHERLOCK and Mr. BRYAN.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES (SCOTLAND) ACT (1867) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. ARMITSTEAD, Bill to amend "The Public Libraries (Scotland) Act, 1867," and to give additional facilities to the local authorities entrusted with carrying the same into execution, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ARMITSTEAD, Sir JOHN OGILVY, and Mr. KINNAIRD.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 209.]

House adjourned at a quarter after Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 21st June, 1871.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee—Resolutions [June 20] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Amendment * [210].

Second Reading—Sale of Liquor on Sunday [48].

Select Committee—Dean Forest and Hundred of Saint Briavels * [190], nominated.

Committee—Sequestration (re-comm.) * [208]—R.P.

Committee—Report—Primitive Wesleyan Methodist Society of Ireland Regulation * [143]; Metropolitan Building Act (1855) Amendment * [200].

Third Reading—Glasgow Boundary * [198]; Sasines Register Scotland * [199], and passed.

SALE OF LIQUOR ON SUNDAY BILL.

(Mr. Rylands, Mr. Candlish, Mr. Birley, Mr. Osborne Morgan.)

[BILL 48.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. RYLANDS, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he might remark that the Government measure was altogether one which, though they might differ from its details, must have satisfied the House as to the desire of Government to deal with that important question, and he felt grateful to the Government for having attempted to deal with a matter affecting so materially the welfare of the country at large. He had hoped, from the course the Government took in regard to that Bill that he should have been relieved from the necessity of troubling the House with the second reading of the Bill which was now before it. The Government proposed some important limitations in respect of the Sunday traffic. They proposed to limit the hours during which publichouses should be allowed to be open on Sunday, with option to the magistrates and ratepayers to close on Sunday altogether, and they also proposed a six-days' licence. It seemed to him that in all these particulars the Bill of the Government was one which was worthy of support, and he regretted very much that, under the circumstances, the Bill was withdrawn before it had been properly discussed on the second reading. The Bill was no doubt withdrawn partly in consequence of the great pressure of Public Business. No doubt the Government wished to meet, as far as possible, the desire of the public to bring about a solution of the drink question. The fact was, however, that they brought forward a larger number of measures than by any probability they could carry through the House. The public generally should understand it was not by any means the occasion of rapid progress of legislation that the Government should bring forward a large number of measures at the commencement of the Session. The Government, he held, ought to be satisfied with attempting less, and the probability was, by attempting less they would accomplish more. No doubt the Bill was also withdrawn in consequence of the great opposition which was excited throughout the country by those who were enlisted in the trade. He hoped, however, the experience the Government had had in connection with that Bill would induce them, in dealing with this subject, to follow the advice of his right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), and keep "on the lines of the Constitution." He objected to new-fangled modes of dealing with matters of this kind. If the Government contented themselves with dealing with the question in accordance with the previous legislation of this country, they might do a great amount of good in restricting the drink traffic, without creating any considerable amount of opposition. It seemed to him, as he had already said, by continuing the means of legislation that had before been adopted, they could direct their attention to the broad task of dealing with two important points — namely, the lessening the number of houses, by raising the rateable qualification, and by increasing the difficulty in obtaining new licences for new property; and by restricting the number of hours that houses were to be open. Now, he went entirely with the hon. Baronet the Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), who had expressed similar opinions, and who, by legislation, had shown on that great question that they could not hope to deal with it all at once, but must proceed gradually in dealing with a great interest of that sort. In their endeavour to limit the evils which were admitted, he granted that they should proceed with as much rapidity as possible; but they should also see that they did not create such a convulsive feeling of opposition as arose from the propositions of the Government, which were of a new and peculiar character. Now, he ventured to propose this measure for closing publichouses on Sunday, on the ground that it would deal with a very important part of the reform of the drink traffic, that it would, as far as it went, have a material effect in limiting the evils which arose from the sale of drink; and he thought he might ask the Government and the House to support the second reading of the Bill, on two grounds. First, it was quite clear from the evidence before the Select Committee of 1868, that the amount of drunkenness and crime, and all those evils that flooded the country in consequence, were not only largely produced by Sunday drinking, but that they were also on the increase, and therefore it was in his judgment one of the first points to which the attention of the House should be directed. The other reason why that Bill should receive favourable consideration was that public opinion was more advanced on that particular point of the reform of the drink traffic than upon any other of the various propositions which had been made with a view of limiting the evils. That measure had not only the support of that very large number of persons—the extreme advocates of temperance reform, of whom the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), who sat near him, would allow him to place him at the head—and a very worthy head he was—but there was also a very large amount of public opinion amongst moderate men, who were not prepared to go to the full extent with his hon. Friend, and who were not prepared to adopt total abstinence principles; but still thought the time had come for the Government to deal with closing Sunday traffic in publichouses. With reference to the point as to the proportion of crime and drunkenness produced by Sunday trading in publichouses, he might say that the Select Committee which sat in 1854 reported that from the evidence given, a considerable amount of drunkenness and crime arose out of Sunday trading—the fact seemed to be unquestionable. He would not trespass at any length on the time of the House in quoting statistics, but perhaps he might be allowed to allude to a few cases without wearying the House. [The hon. Member proceeded to read from Returns from Manchester and Liverpool. From the Report of Captain Palin, Chief Constable of the former place, there were apprehended for drunkenness on ordinary days and on Sundays. In 1866, ordinary days, 22; Sundays, 40; 1867, ordinary days, 28; Sundays, 48; 1868, ordinary days, 24; Sundays, 37; 1869, ordinary days, 29; Sundays, 42. Mr. Greig, the Chief Constable of Liverpool, gave a Return of the number of prisoners taken into custody for drunkenness between 12 p.m. on Saturdays and 12 p.m. on Sundays, for 52 weeks, from October 4, 1868, to September 26, 1869—namely, drunk and disorderly males, 1,952; females, 1,665; drunk and other offences, males, 361; females, 118; total, 4,096. These figures showed an average of 78 each Sunday, and 42 each week day—a result showing that the same state of affairs existed at Liverpool as at Manchester.] There was another valuable class of evidence to which he wished to refer—that of chaplains of gaols. [The hon. Member then read letters from the Rev. G. Hans Hamilton, chaplain of Durham Gaol,

Mr. Rylands

and the Rev. W. Cane, chaplain of the County Gaol, Manchester, the former of whom stated that—“Half the crime of the county was committed between Saturday afternoon and Monday morning;” and the latter gave Returns of committals, from which it appeared that of 1,037 committals, 343 were brought in on Mondays; both in the most decided manner connecting this state of crime with the publichouses and beershops.] He thought those cases must satisfy everyone that in dealing with crime and the evils arising from drunkenness, that one of the first points to which attention must be directed was that of Sunday drinking. He could multiply those cases to a very large extent; but he refrained from doing so, because he believed he had quoted enough to illustrate the fact. The other point which was strongly in favour of legislation on this question was the fact that public opinion was more ripe on the subject of Sunday drinking and Sunday closing than upon any other part of the question. On that he also held in his hand abundant evidence to show that wherever public opinion had been actually and correctly ascertained, it had been shown that a large portion had expressed a decided opinion in favour of closing publichouses on Sunday. For instance, at—

	Houses visited.	For.	Against.	Neutral.
Crewe ...	2,951	2,036	357	163
Goolo ...	1,214	1,193	22	80
Bradford {	many thousand	many thousand	1,409	2,355

At Liverpool, of 67,000 inhabited houses, 44,149 were absolutely in favour of Sunday closing; while the whole United Kingdom showed a grand total of 349,193 householders in favour of Sunday closing, 59,885 against, and 37,649 neutral. This was sufficient to prove the fact that, at all events, there was a very large proportion of the population who were desirous of keeping publichouses closed on Sunday; and so far as the association in favour of that object was concerned, they did believe, after making very careful inquiries, that a very considerable number of the working classes was in favour of it; and as regarded the middle classes—the magistrates and the clergy—no hon. Gentleman in that House could say that that was not their wish. There were many who did not go the length of saying that publichouses should be entirely closed, who were strongly in favour of considerable restrictions as to the hours they should be open. He would also remind the House of the important declaration signed by magistrates which he had the honour of presenting to the Home Secretary a few weeks ago, and he might add that that memorial might have been very much extended if the attempt had been made. He begged to assume, therefore, that, at all events, the extent of popular opinion was generally in favour of Sunday closing, or for a very large amount of restriction. He ventured also to say that among the trade, which was particularly interested in this question, that there was no small amount of opinion in favour of closing on the Sundays. He had known efforts made by publicans themselves, by mutual agreement, to close their houses on the Sunday, and those agreements had been carried out for a length of time; but they had ultimately been compelled to give them up in consequence of two or three of the landlords refusing to be bound by the agreement, thus obliging the others to re-open their houses. One case of that kind had come particularly under his notice. A friend of his own, a brewer who owned a large number of publichouses in Liverpool closed his houses on Sunday, and would have continued to do so, but he could not induce other landlords to do the same. The name of that gentleman was Mr. Peter Walker, a gentleman who he thought was well known to some hon. Members of that House. In the evidence given before the Select Committee of the House of Commons, a Memorial was presented by the Liverpool publicans in favour of Sunday closing, and of the passing of an Act compelling those houses to be closed. Out of 1,400 publicans in Liverpool, no less than 757 signed the document, in which they distinctly stated that they were in favour of an Act of Parliament being passed, compelling all persons who kept publichouses to close them on Sundays; 113 said they would be glad of the Act, but would not sign; 251 refused to sign, and were believed to be opposed to Sunday closing; and the remainder of the number included persons who were neutral, or who thought that the houses should be permitted to be kept open for an hour or two, or who declined to sign the document at all. Thus it would be seen that out of 1,400 publicans of Liverpool, more than one-half had expressed a positive and decided opinion in favour of closing on Sundays. At Goole, of 34 publichouses visited, there were 16 ayes, 8 noes, and 10 neutral. An eminent brewer, Mr. Alderman Mackie, of Manchester, who was largely engaged in the liquor traffic in Dublin, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Birkenhead, London, and Brighton, and had been in business for more than 40 years, had never opened one of his publichouses on Sundays. He stated, in his evidence before the Select Committee, that a number of publicans would be very well satisfied to close on Sunday, and some of the best did close on that day; but others were afraid that if they did not open on Sunday and their neighbour did, and so got his customers on the Sunday, he would also get them in the course of the week. Hon. Gentlemen now met them, when they proposed to deal with this question of the liquor traffic, with the assertion that there was a large amount of capital employed in the trade, and they assigned that as a reason why they should not touch it, unless they gave the publicans some compensation. The hon. Member for Derby (Mr. M. T. Bass) had, on the authority of Professor Levi, estimated the amount of capital employed in the trade as £117,000,000, or a larger capital than was employed in their great staple trades of cotton and woollen manufactures, and it was urged that they should therefore be careful how they touched a trade which had so large a capital invested in it. He was not at all inclined to dispute the figures of those who made that estimate of the amount of capital employed in that trade. That estimate might be exaggerated, but he was prepared to take Professor Levi's estimate, and he asked what comparison there was between their cotton and woollen trades — industries which provided the comforts and necessities of life for a great portion of their people, with a traffic which filled their gaols and their workhouses? He thought there was too much capital in that trade and too much liquor drank. He was not without statistics on that point, but did not wish to weary the House with them. He would, however, refer to some which had been prepared in a very careful manner by Dr. Samuel Smiles in The British Almanack, where he had published some very important statistics relating to the drink traffic, and which he would just mention to show how that great capital provided for the requirements of the people of that country. Of spirits nearly 30,000,000 gallons, or a quantity equal to four gallons for each adult male, was consumed in the United Kingdom in the year. The consumption of beer in England was 30 gallons per head in the year 1868. In Scotland it was 11 gallons, and in Ireland 8; or, in other words, at the rate of 120 gallons per head for each adult male in England, 44 in Scotland, and 32 in Ireland. He would now show what had been the cost to each adult male. In England he spent £3 15s. 6d. per year in spirits, and £7 in beer, or, on both beer and spirits, £10 15s. 6d. In Scotland the expenditure was £5 8s. per adult male on spirits, and £2 11s. 4d. on beer, or £7 19s. 4d. altogether; while in Ireland the amount spent was £3 3s. on spirits, and £1 17s. 4d. on beer, or £5 0s. 4d. on both. The sum expended on wines had not been included, but it had been estimated that the entire expenditure on intoxicating liquors of all kinds was £90,000,000 a-year, or £3 per head for the entire population, and it was calculated that the working classes spent in drink not less than one-sixth of their entire earnings. He thought, then, that was a matter of a sufficiently serious character to claim both from the Government and the House the most careful attention. It was a matter which touched every important influence in that country, and seemed to lie at the root of every great industrial social question which they had to deal with. It lay at the root of local taxation and all social problems. They had been told that it was not within their power—that they could not prevent men from drinking if they wanted to drink. He did not suppose that they could keep one who was suffering from dipsomania from drinking, for there were people who would get drunk whenever they could. They were people who required the attention of the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. D. Dalrymple), and might be fit inmates of our lunatic asylums; but there were numbers of persons who were not suffering from dipsomania, and who would not drink but for the facilities for drink, and the temptations that were offered to them. If they permitted a number of gin palaces to be opened on the Sunday, and shut up all rational places of amusement and recreation, he said they had no right to expect that men would not yield to the temptation. He had been told that he wanted to rob the working man of his beer; but he did not want to do it. He was quite willing that the working man should have his beer at the proper time. He wanted a man to have his pint of beer if he wanted it; but what he wanted to rob him of was the opportunity of going into a publichouse on Sunday, and robbing his family of their subsistence—of sitting in a publichouse and then returning home, to the injury of his wife and family. But he was now met with the charge that if they closed the publichouses, working men would not be able to get any beer for Sunday. He ventured to dispute that statement altogether. Mr. Alderman Mackie, of Manchester, in the course of his evidence before the Select Committee, was asked—

Mr. Rylands

“Do many working men within your knowledge buy their beer on Saturday night and keep it for Sunday's dinner?”

And he replied—

“I know of my own personal knowledge that hundreds and thousands do.”

It was also stated in the Report of the Committee of 1854—

“That it is the practice of such publicans as close on Sundays—and there seem to be many who close throughout the country—to provide their customers with stone bottles and jars in which to take their beer home, well corked, on Saturday night for Sunday's use. The best evidence that the practice is found to answer is that they none of them speak either of complaints of their customers or loss of custom.”

No doubt the trade could soon adapt itself to the new conditions under which it would be placed were publichouses closed on Sundays; but even if they could not do otherwise, he would rather they charged more for their beer in order to pay the additional cost of bottling, for the working men would gain a great advantage by the exchange. There was another argument in support of the Bill to which he should but briefly refer. Every step taken in favour of restrictive legislation had always resulted in a diminution of drunkenness. His right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Wilson-Patten) succeeded a few years ago in passing a Bill which considerably diminished the hours of opening publichouses on Sundays. That Bill was known as “The Wilson-Patten

Act," and was in operation for about twelve months, and during the time that Act was in operation there was abundant testimony given throughout the whole country showing that drunkenness had been diminished to a very large extent, and that crime also had been stopped. There was the testimony of mayors of towns, and of police officers, showing and proving that there had been a diminution of drunkenness. In the town of Liverpool the Reports of the police force were most remarkable. The London police courts were described as presenting a striking and unusual appearance, owing to the great reduction of the number of night charges caused by Sunday drinking. In Preston, the chaplain of the gaol stated that it had had a very marked effect on the number of committals for drunkenness. Mr. Clay (the chaplain) said that the number of commitments for four months prior to the passing of the Act were 171, and for four months after the passing of the Act, 90, showing a reduction of nearly one-half in the number of convictions for drunkenness. But that Act was unfortunately repealed. There was no manifestation throughout the country generally against the working of that Act. It was known perfectly well in this House that the dissatisfaction was created by a number of persons who raised complaints, and who were represented in this House by Mr. Berkeley. It so happened that, in 1855, Lord Robert Grosvenor brought in a Bill interfering with Sunday trading which excited a large amount of opposition; mobs assembled in Hyde Park, some rioting ensued, and a few windows were broken; but the Bill against which those demonstrations were held did not deal with publichouses at all, nor were they caused by the Wilson-Patten Act. Mr. Berkeley, however, came down to the House, and intimated that the riots made it important that the Act should be repealed. Though he said again that the Bill against which these demonstrations were held did not deal with the subject of closing houses at all, under this pressure, represented by Mr. Berkeley, a Select Committee was appointed to inquire into the operations of the Act. That Committee was a packed one, and did not contain a sufficient representation of opinion on the subject. It met with a foregone conclusion, and refused to receive the evidence which had been brought up from all parts of the country, and the witnesses who were ready to be heard. There was important evidence ready to be heard; but the Committee met and passed a resolution recommending that the Act should be repealed. That was when the riots had taken place. It was a remarkable fact, and he challenged contradiction on this point—that there was no allusion in the newspaper reports of the day to the riots as being caused by the Wilson-Patten Act, neither was there any allusion to it in the Report of the Select Committee. He therefore asked the opponents of that Bill, why, and on what grounds, they rested their opposition to this Act on account of the riots of 1855. These riots had not any reference to that Act at all, and he challenged them to show that they had. Restrictions had produced beneficial results in Scotland by diminishing the amount of criminality and the number of cases of drunkenness. The Forbes-Mackenzie Act was still in operation there; and although hon. Gentlemen might say that if a large number of publichouses were closed on Sundays there were numerous "shebeens" open, yet the fact remained that there was a much smaller number of drunken cases before the magistrates. For example, in 1852, 401 persons were taken up in the streets of Edinburgh between 8 o'clock on the Sunday morning and the same hour on Monday; but in 1867 there were only 33. In 1852, 776 persons were taken into custody for being drunk on the Monday; but in 1867 there were only 200; and while, in 1852, the average number of prisoners in Edinburgh Gaol was 619, in 1867 it was only 337. In Ireland there was no law to prevent the selling of drink on Sunday; but in some districts voluntary arrangements, which had almost the force of law, had been carried out under the authority and sanction of the Roman Catholic Bishops. He begged to call the attention of the House to the evidence furnished by Canon Toole, of Manchester, as to the effect produced in the county of Tipperary. The Governor of Cashel prison, Mr. D. O'Kearney, writing to Canon Toole in September last, said—

"The voluntary temperance law as established in this diocese has been observed with the greatest fidelity, and it is to be hoped that the success which has attended its promulgation and enforcement here will induce the rest of the Catholic Prelates to introduce it into their respective dioceses. The habit once overcome on Sundays—the day on which it is unhappily most largely indulged in, its gradual decline during the rest of the week may be calculated upon, and the profanation of the Sabbath by the commission of sins which are almost uniformly the concomitant of intoxication, will no longer be the scandal, the curse, and the reproach of the otherwise moral and religious people.”

Canon Toole proceeded to say that in Tipperary Gaol, prior to the introduction of the change in 1857, there were 817 commitments, in 1869 only 145; in the prison of Cashel, in 1857, there were 439, and in 1866, 115. Overlooking a number of other places, he would come to New Birmingham, where, in 1857, they had 588 prisoners, whilst in 1869 the prison was closed. In the Cashel bridewell, in 1858, there were 106 prisoners arrested on the Sunday, in 1867 there were 4. In 1858 the total commitments were 727, of whom 527 were for drunkenness; in 1869 there were 205, of whom 115 were for drunkenness. He had shown that Sunday drinking was a great cause of evil, and that any restrictions upon it must reduce crime to a great extent. It did appear to him that after evidence of that kind there should be great hesitation on the part of the Government, and great reserve on the part of the House generally in opposing this Bill. He ventured to submit to the Government, that while that Bill might be considered by some hon. Members to be extreme and not sufficiently elastic, if they would give him their support on that occasion, he should be quite willing to see in Committee such a careful consideration of the provisions as would prevent the operation of Sunday closing coming with too great a shock, and thus creating too much opposition on the part of those who would be affected. He should regard that as a decided step towards the absolute cessation of Sunday drinking; and as there was a general expectation and hope on the part of the community that that Session would not pass without some reform in the liquor traffic, he confidently commended that Bill to the notice of the House for second reading.

MR. BIRLEY, in rising to second the Motion, observed that in Manchester there was a strong feeling against keeping open publichouses on Sunday. A Petition on the subject had been presented, signed by 70,000 of the inhabitants of that city, and he believed that an immense proportion of the working classes throughout the country were influenced by a sincere and earnest feeling to restrict the liquor traffic. He regretted that the Licensing Bill of the Home Secretary failed, and although many persons objected to piecemeal legislation, he trusted the House would give its sanction to the Bill now before them, the passing of which would not interfere with any general measure that might hereafter be brought forward by the Government. Very large numbers of the publicans desired to close their houses on Sunday, and to observe that day as a day of rest; and, considering that the Legislature had restricted the hours of labour in factories and workshops, he (Mr. Birley) trusted they would not manifest any indifference to the enormous toil which the servants in publichouses and beershops had to undergo on Sunday. If the law assimilated the trading of beershops with other trades, no effort to open beershops for the sake of mere indulgence in tippling would be countenanced for a moment. What would be the position of the traveller under this Bill? The bond fide traveller, instead of finding a house filled with all the vagrant scum of the neighbourhood, would find it orderly and clean, while the larger number, chiefly of the lower class of houses would certainly be closed. And what would be the effect of the Bill upon another very large class—those who occasionally, and at first reluctantly, found their way to the publichouse on Sunday? They would be saved from much temptation, and they constituted an enormous class of the population—a class most worthy of the interest and encouragement of Parliament. No doubt the habitual toper would get his drink whatever laws might be enacted; but there was another class of sober and peaceable people who never thought of entering a publichouse, and who, if this Bill were passed, would find their account in the orderly character and demeanour of the inhabitants of their district, and in the preservation of their children from temptation. It was said that people could not be made sober by Act of Parliament, and no doubt that was true; but, at all events, there should be laws to assist those feeble but right-minded persons who were most open to temptation, and such laws were most important and useful in preserving them from the downward path. It was difficult to decide from statistics whether the sin of drunkenness was or was not increasing in this country, for, in addition to the fact that there was a great fallacy involved in generalizing from statistics, it should be remembered that there was now an immense number of persons who if they did not abstain altogether were, at all events, very moderate in their drinking, and therefore the total quantity of intoxicating liquor consumed by the whole population did not afford any means of estimating how far drunkenness extended. In advocating this measure he was quite aware that the people required not merely repressive laws, but greater efforts for improving their social condition. Before they could expect them to be moral and sober, much more must be done than had been done hitherto to encourage them in improving their houses, and in finding rational recreation. But these things ought to go together, and not one wait for the other, for intemperate people could not be expected to value improved habitations. He earnestly appealed to the House on that question, for drunkenness was a great evil, and was a peculiar temptation to our people, for our system of labour, and the aggregation of our population in large towns, tended to foster it. He had been struck with the strong resolution and earnestness shown by all classes under the greatest difficulties to co-operate together, and if possible, by the help of Parliament, to abate that nuisance. To him it was a matter of indifference how the work was done; but in the name of Heaven and of the country he would beseech Parliament to bestir itself in that great and holy cause. If that Bill were carried the pernicious effects of the many music-halls which existed in connection with publichouses would at once be effectually restrained; and he hoped that the measure would be passed and administered fairly without any desire to make it operate harshly.

Mr. Rylands

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr Rylands.)

MR. J. FIELDEN, in rising to move, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time upon that day six months, said, all were agreed as to the importance of doing away with the evils resulting from the excessive consumption of drink; but the question was, would that Bill be effectual for that object, and would it not be such an interference with the liberty of the subject, and of those who were undoubtedly good citizens, that they ought not to be called upon to submit to such a rigorous measure? His objection to the Bill was that it was a gross libel upon the large mass of the labouring population of this country, because it assumed that a majority of them—or, at all events, a large minority—were given up to drunkenness, and were such slaves to their passion for drink that it was necessary, in the interests of public morality, for the Legislature to step in and pass the most stringent restrictive laws. He, for one, would not consent to slander the mass of sober, hard-working men as they were slandered by this Bill, which would brand them as incapable of restraining their passion for drink. In that respect, the Bill was a libel on the working classes. He objected to it, also, as class legislation, because no attempt was made to apply its provisions to the clubs of the rich. If it was right to restrict the sale of intoxicating drinks on the Sunday, why should not the Bill apply to the clubs, and provide that no intoxicating drinks should be sold in them? Why did not the rich come forward and say—"We feel so strongly the great evil of drunkenness that we will enter into any engagement of this kind in order to set an example to the great mass of the labouring people." He had that morning received a declaration in favour of the Bill signed by 1,331 county and borough magistrates of England and Wales; and if those gentlemen had said they would stop the sale of intoxicating liquors at their clubs on the Sunday, he would have believed in their sincerity; but he knew perfectly well that many of these gentlemen, when they came up to London, spent part of Sunday at the club, where they invited friends to meet them, and did not restrict themselves to the pure beverage of water, but indulged in what were to them more pleasant beverages. These Petitions and Memorials were got up in such a way as to render them worthless. He had seen Petitions lying on tables in the streets of Manchester, where they were signed by boys, who, from their age, could not understand what they were signing; and in such a place where Petitions were indiscriminately signed they received in Manchester the signatures of persons living in Ashton and the adjacent towns, who also signed similar Petitions in the towns in which they lived. This Bill was, in fact, part of the Permissive Bill, and the Permissive Bill men, though a comparatively small body, were a most indefatigable and determined body of men, and they produced on the country an impression that they were more numerous than they really were. These men made representations as to the evils of drunkenness, which no one disputed, and they thus induced benevolently-disposed individuals to sign Memorials and Petitions without due consideration as to the cause from which drunkenness sprang, which was adulteration. Others signed them in order to please relatives and friends, who admired the earnestness with which they advocated what they believed to be true. A large number also signed them from motives he would not criticize; with a firm conviction that what was proposed would never be carried; and he did not make that statement without warrant. On the one hand, hitherto, there had been a small body of energetic men, and on the other there had been an overwhelming majority, totally apathetic, but willing to put their names to Petitions, just as hon. Members would vote for a measure because they believed it would put them in a good position with many of their constituents, while they were satisfied there was no chance of its being carried; but when there appeared to be any danger of interference with the liberty of the subject, the country become aroused, as it had been this year when the interests not only of publicans but of publichouse proprietors were threatened, and it was determined not only that the Licensing Bill of the Government should not pass, but that the Permissive Bill should be thrown out by a majority larger than it had ever been before. As this Bill would stop the sale of intoxicating liquors on the Sunday except to travellers and lodgers, the effect of it would be, that a man who could not obtain drink in his own house would go a few miles away from home and would drink in a publichouse instead of having his pint of beer with his wife and family.

Mr. J. Fielden

They had no right to say that a man should be compelled to buy his beer on the Saturday and bottle it; he might not like bottled beer, and it might not agree with him. At any rate the House had no business to deny the working man the opportunity of buying beer for his Sunday dinner, and to compel him, if he must have beer, to leave his family and neglect his family duties, for it was a man's duty to remain at home with his family on the Sunday. Then it was most inconsistent to allow a man who was merely a lodger in a publichouse to be supplied with beer, when it was denied to the man who wished to have it in his own house. The whole Bill was so inconsistent, so unjust, and such a piece of class legislation that they ought to throw it out. It was all very well for the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) to talk of amending it in Committee; the Bill must be dealt with as it was, and to read it a second time would be to affirm the principle of stopping the sale of intoxicating drinks on the Sunday. If the hon. Member did not adhere to that principle, the Bill would be no longer that which was read a second time. If the hon. Member was afraid of his own measure, he ought to withdraw it, and bring in one dealing with the subject in the way he thought it ought to be dealt with. If he did that, let him bring in a Bill which would treat rich and poor alike. The rich could go to their clubs, and what the club was to the rich man the publichouse was to the poor man, who, therefore, ought to be permitted to get beer at his club if he required it. With regard to the operation of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act in Scotland, if the Scotch were the most sober and moral people possible; if there was no drinking in Scotland on Sunday, particularly in the lower parts of the large towns, then they were the most grossly maligned people on the face of the earth. As to statistical calculations of the amounts of spirits and beer consumed, the question that arose upon them was, were the amounts more than was required. To say that so much beer or so much spirit was drunk did not prove anything; at all events, it did not prove that what was consumed was injurious to the community. Undoubtedly, the consumption of spirits was an immense evil in this country; but what caused it? It was due to the high price of beer, and that was caused by the iniquitous malt tax. Drunkenness was not caused so much by the excessive amount of malt in the beer as by the want of malt, and by the substitution of deleterious and poisonous articles; and that measure would do nothing to cure the evils caused by adulteration. He could not help repeating that that Bill proposed class legislation, and, if the evil required to be dealt with by so stringent a measure, it ought to be applied to rich and poor alike, otherwise it would be said they allowed the rich to have luxuries while they would not allow the poor man to have even that which was necessary. In conclusion, he begged to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

MR. MELLOR, in rising to second the Amendment, said, as an employer of labour, and one who had mixed with working people all his life, he denounced the language of those who described them as a dissipated and drunken class. He sat for a constituency which at one time was represented by a Cabinet Minister, who, on a certain occasion declared them to be the most sober and respectable constituency in Europe; but no sooner did the same constituency return himself (Mr. Mellor) than they were denounced as being drunken and dissipated. With regard to the statistics of the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands), that hon. Gentleman had forgotten that on the Monday there were to be dealt with the police cases of two days—Saturday and Sunday—and that it was the custom to pay wages on the Saturday afternoon. Magistrates in the manufacturing districts would tell you that the cases of drunkenness which came before them on the Monday morning arose principally on the Saturday evening. Therefore the hon. Member's statistics were perfectly fallacious; but, in order to create an impression, every subterfuge was resorted to, and false statements placed before the House. ["Order, order!"] He considered the statement made to be false, because it was not based on fact. As certain diseases were endemic on marshy levels, so the evils of drunkenness existed where liquor abounded too freely; but the legitimate indulgence in it was no crime, neither would it produce crime; but it produced sociability and good feeling.

Like the hon. Member, he would "walk in the lines of the Constitution." He had walked in them when a younger man. He could remember the time when he could go to the publichouse on the Sunday, smoke his pipe, drink a glass, and enjoy himself. There was no such thing to be done now-a-days; the police were looking over every hedge; and, in the disguise of seamen or of cotton operatives, they importuned the unwary publican to supply them with drink, in order that the friends of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) might get the licence revoked, or endorsed with a black mark. He repudiated the language which had been held in that House in reference to the working classes, and he most cordially seconded the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, who, in adopting the course he had taken, was only representing the feelings and interests of the manufacturers.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months." — (Mr. Joshua Fielden.)

MR. MELLY said, he regretted the Bill did not enable the House to have a fair discussion by submitting a practical proposal, because hon. Members were pretty well agreed that the hours for the sale of drink might be restricted after careful consideration, with the concurrence of the community and of the licensed victuallers themselves, while drastic legislation would only defeat the object in view. He must complain that the Motion for the second reading placed them in the dilemma that if they voted against it they would be considered advocates of unrestrained Sunday drinking, while if they voted for it the impression would be conveyed that they were in favour of prohibiting all drinking on Sunday, which would be unjust. In his opinion, the hours during which liquor was sold on Sunday might be very fairly abridged, and with the concurrence of all classes of the community, including the respectable licensed victuallers, who would value a Sunday afternoon free from business. He feared there was a combination between the advocates of the Maine Liquor Law and the Sabbatarians of England, and he was sure the latter would baffle themselves if they forced on Parliament and on the country measures which, by their stringency, would defeat the object they had in view. It was impossible, even if it were desirable or just, to prevent the labouring man from buying a jug of fresh-drawn beer for his Sunday dinner, the only day, perhaps, when he could enjoy that meal with his family. He had also as good a right to a glass of ale at supper-time as any hon. Member in that House; at the same time, he did not believe that there was not a single Member in that House who did not think that the excessive expenditure in drink was one of the greatest curses with which the people of that country was afflicted; and the day when the greatest amount was spent was on the Sunday. The hon. Member for Ashton (Mr. Mellor) had spoken of false statistics and misleading facts. He had just made some inquiries as to the condition of things in that month of June. Now, as to the facts, statistics which he had showed that during the last four Sundays in Liverpool 577 persons were arrested; 555 during the last four Saturdays; 327 during the last four Wednesdays. Of those arrested on Sundays, 111 were drunk; on Saturdays, also 111; on Wednesdays, 52. For larceny and all other crimes, 34 persons were arrested each Sunday, 29 each Saturday, and 29 on each Wednesday. Therefore twice as many were arrested on Saturdays and Sundays as on any ordinary week-day, while there was only a trifling increase in the number of crimes, and therefore the great addition to the number of arrests must be attributed to drunkenness. Again, during the six working days of the year 1867, 91 babies were overlaid by their mothers, or an average of 15 a-day, while on Sundays 36 children were overlaid. Now, overlaying of children was chiefly due to the drunkenness of the parent. The loss of these infants was a direct injury to the State, to which their lives, if well regulated, would be a source of profit and strength. Their death hardened and demoralized their parents, and led to new excesses. It really was a waste of time to pile proof on proof. Drunkards would drink; but the excessive outlay in liquor by those who did not get drunk was the most prolific source of misery, poverty, and crime in England. It was the obstacle to religion, education, and order. It doubled local rates, and increased national taxes. It was actually fostered by their laws, encouraged by fanatic customs and restrictions which had more than the force of law. Why were the schools a third, and the churches half empty? Not because education was not valued, or that the working class was infidel or indifferent to religion. Children were not sent to school because they had no clothes fit to go in. It was owing to the amount spent on liquor that men were not able to clothe their wives decently, so that they could go to church or chapel. He believed the great remedy would be found in moral suasion, that much would be done by the Education Act, and that a great deal, indeed, might be done by throwing open the National Galleries and Museums, the Houses of Parliament, and other public buildings and institutions to the people on Sundays, which he would be glad to see crowded from two o'clock in the afternoon until dusk. He believed that would before long increase the attendance at the churches and chapels. The alternative given to all but the rich class at present was to go to church or chapel, or the public-house, which looked very like a bargain between religion and the gin palace. The result was a large number preferred the publichouse; the wages there spent, the habits there contracted, physically and morally disqualified a portion of the labouring classes from attendance at Divine Service. The upper classes had their commodious houses, private gardens, galleries, and libraries in which to spend Sunday afternoons. The Zoological Gardens were not closed to them. He strongly advocated the opening of museums and innocent places of recreation to the people as a counterpoise to the publichouses. He could hardly understand their licensing places where people could get drink, and shutting up places where they could be amused, interested, and instructed. He knew the laws nominally dealt with rich and poor alike, but practically their effect was too often unequal and unjust. He denied the right, still more the policy, of closing the national institutions to the taxpayer on the Sunday afternoon, and not allowing him the only opportunity he had of seeing his own property. While, on the one hand, there was an alliance as regarded this Bill between Sabbatarians and the supporters of the Permissive Bill, there was another alliance as regarded these laws or customs which the Sabbatarians would be the first to repudiate. Yet what they said in effect was—"Unless you go to church there shall be no in-door amusement open to you except that of getting drunk, or spending what you can't properly afford in the publichouse." There were in every large town institutions belonging to the people, paid for and maintained by them, which ought to be open to them on the only day they could visit them. Of course, it would be urged that the Sunday holidays of servants and attendants would be curtailed. He had made inquiries. The effect on the police of London would be rather to reduce than increase their labours. South Kensington Museum, for instance, would only require four more attendants and six additional policemen, while 10,000 persons might visit the museum between the hours of 2 o'clock and 7. The reduction of the hours of rest of four attendants and six policemen, who could be easily remunerated, ought not to be considered as telling against the advantage of inducing even 5 per cent of the 10,000 persons he had mentioned to spend their Sunday afternoons at such an institution, if they had been in the habit previously of spending them in publichouses. He was aware of the delicacy and difficulty of that subject. Nothing but a deep sense of duty would have led him to make those remarks. He would support any just and fair measure; any change which would practically increase the temperance and prudence of the people. But that question must be settled not by piecemeal legislation, but by a change in the customs and laws of the nation. Until the matter was fairly dealt with, although they might hold their own in the race of civilization, they could not stride in front; and to quote a commercial proverb—"A profit not made was a loss realized." Were it not for that one blot upon the nation—the existence of those "fly-traps at the corner of every street," draining the very heart-blood of the wage-earning class—there would be no limit to their prosperity and the ever-increasing moral and physical welfare of the people. As to the course which he should pursue with respect to the Motion before the House, he was at some loss to say what he should do; but unless he received either from the Government or the promoter of the Bill some explanation which would enable him to vote for the second reading, it would be his duty to leave the House and not vote at all.

Mr. Mellor

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he did not share the difficulty of the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Melly), because he had always urged that that subject should be dealt with as a whole. They prejudiced the question by dealing with small portions of it, and on that ground he could not support the Bill. He admitted that the evil effects of drunkenness were increasing, but doubted whether the statistics of the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) really supported his proposition. The Bill, instead of making a gradual reduction, attacked every hour of the Sunday; but he believed that a shortening of hours on every day would materially assist in attaining the object they all had in view. If the option proposed in the Bill of the Home Secretary—of taking out a licence for only six days—had been offered to publicans, there would probably have been a large diminution of open houses on Sunday. By making violent changes they would raise an opposition which, by gradually approaching the matter, they would never have to meet, because then the people would have an opportunity of testing the advantages of a curtailment of hours. He had Returns from localities mentioned by the hon. Member for Warrington, showing that a larger proportion of cases of drunkenness occurred from drinking on Saturday, rather than on Sunday. In Salford, the convictions for drunkenness on Saturday amounted to 12, as against 2 on Sunday. The Chief Constable of Manchester had supplied him with Returns for every day in the week for three months at the close of last year. There were 1,005 arrests for drunkenness on the Saturday and Sunday, while the total number for the rest of the week only amounted to 2,835. But, on going into details, it appeared that if the hours had been limited from 11 at night to 6 in the morning, the 2,835 arrests would have been reduced by 1,476; and that if the hours had only been reduced from 12 P.M. to 6 A.M., the number would have been lowered by 954. Between 11 and 12 at night on the Saturday, the arrests were 138; between 12 and 1, 179; and between 1 and 2, 127; so that some of the figures included in the calculation of Sunday drinking related actually to continuous drinking on Saturday. He had also received Returns from the borough of Birmingham for the three months ending in March last. On the Sundays there were 159 cases and 144 on the Saturday, making a total of 303, as against 356 on the other five days. Between the hours of 11 and 12 there were 286 convictions, and in all remaining hours only 373. Now, of these convictions he felt satisfied a great number would be wiped out if there were a reduction in the hours during which publichouses were kept open, a reduction which might be effected with the sanction of a large number of the people, whereas the proposal of the hon. Member for Warrington would, in his opinion, tend greatly to prejudice any fair attempt to deal with the question, by the opposition to which it was likely to give rise, and which might injuriously interfere with the general revision of our licensing system. He quite admitted that the question of music-halls and clubs in connection with publichouses was also deserving of consideration, but that, too, might be prejudiced by the dealing as proposed with only one corner of the subject. He hoped under the circumstances the House would not read the Bill a second time, which, while it proposed entirely to do away with the opening of publichouses on Sundays, except so far as travellers and lodgers were concerned, contained no definition of what the word "traveller" meant, and would thus leave it matter for vexatious disputes.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he was convinced, from his experience of town populations in such places as London and Liverpool, that the picture drawn by the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) of the dreadful evils of Sunday drinking was very little exaggerated, and therefore, although demurring from some of the reasons assigned for the prevalence of drinking habits, it was impossible for those, who like himself were anxious to deal with the question, to vote against the Bill. On the other hand, they were placed in a difficult position, for hardly a Member of that House really supposed that the total suppression of the opening of publichouses was within the range of possibility at the present time. The calm and sensible settlement of this question was hindered by over-zealous action. He appealed to the Government as to whether they could not take a practical step on this occasion. The Bill, which was simply entitled "Sale of Liquor on Sunday Bill," did not bear on the face of it the absolute necessity for total prohibition; and he thought the Government might take possession of the measure, and, after allowing it to be read a second time, alter it to a Bill for the Regulation of the hours of Drinking on Sunday. A proposal of that kind made in a former Session by his hon. Colleague (Mr. Graves) had been supported by the corporation, magistrates, licensed victuallers, and the public generally of Liverpool, showing a rare amount of consent with regard to a difficult matter. He did not think legislation of that kind would prejudice a more general settlement of the question, but, on the contrary, would enable them to test the feeling of the country. They had so strong a ground of complaint against the Government for the way in which they had handled this liquor question, that he thought, when they threw out a suggestion to retrieve the Government from the position they had unfortunately assumed, it should have some effect. If the Bill were read a second time, he should reserve the power of proposing in Committee some such arrangement as he had recommended.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT said, that no one could, in his opinion, have listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands), without being impressed by it. Owing to law and custom, there was a general suspension of labour throughout the country on Sunday. In the case of one enormous trade, however, that rule was broken, and, strange though the fact might be, that was a trade which was licensed by the Government, and which was more than any other under their control. He could never understand what was the cause why such an exception was made. He had heard it stated by Mr. Mackie, of the firm of Findlater and Mackie, at a public meeting, that it was quite possible for a working man to procure his liquors on Saturday night precisely as he got any other article of consumption, and that the trade would adapt itself to the wants of the people. He did not himself believe that if publichouses were shut up to-morrow those who thought such drinks necessary either to their health or pleasure, would find themselves unable to procure them. The exception of which he spoke was indeed so remarkable that the justification for it should be very complete. There were in Manchester 2,500 houses open on Sunday for the sale of the articles in question. Now, two persons, at least, were probably kept at work in each of those establishments, and it should be borne in mind that no other class in the community worked for such a number of hours during the week. Had they, then, no claim to be protected from labour on the Sunday? It was not, he might add, in the interest of the working classes themselves that publichouses should be kept open on the Sabbath. The poor would be much less poor if they were not kept open. He did not, indeed, think that the habits of the people could be greatly improved merely by the partial or complete closing of those houses, and he was not in favour of a gloomy or Puritanical Sunday. He did not wish that the people should be shut up in their homes on that day, seeing how confined they were and how unhealthy frequently were the places in which they were situated. He concurred, therefore, with the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Melly) as to the desirability of having places of innocent recreation and amusement open to them; and they ought, in his opinion, to be established where such places did not exist. There was no country in which the people were so densely massed together as in this, or where they had higher wages. The result was, that they were more in a position to yield to temptation, and it would be of great advantage that they should be able to visit institutions where they might pass their time agreeably and profitably. He thought it was possible for a great many hon. Members of the House to vote for the Bill after the statement made by the hon. Member for Warrington, that he would be ready to consider any modification which might be proposed. If such a Bill of a permissive nature were passed, its provisions would be adopted, so far as the great towns of Lancashire were concerned. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) made some two or three years ago the serious charge against the people of Lancashire, of being less temperate than the people of other portions of the kingdom. Now, that might be true or false, but this, in justice, he must say, should be attributed to them, that they had done more than the people of any other part of the kingdom to call the attention of the country to the evils of intemperance, and they would be delighted to hear of the passing of the present or some other measure for the purpose of checking the evil of drunkenness. He trusted that if the Government felt unable to grapple with the subject, they would assist rather than obstruct private Members in attempting to solve any portion of this perplexing question.

MR. HENLEY said, he wished the Bill had been so framed as to have permitted those who thought that much good might be done by reducing the number of hours during which publichouses might be open on a Sunday to consent to go into Committee upon it; but, as the Bill proposed that the publichouses should be closed during all hours on that day, he, for one, was unwilling to assent to the second reading. The hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Jacob Bright) had made allusion to some remarks of his at Manchester two or three years ago. If the hon. Gentleman would consult the official Returns of the police of his own City of Manchester, he would find that the charges he had brought against Manchester had not at all diminished, but, on the contrary, assumed a still blacker aspect than before. He believed most firmly that if the whole of England were in the same state as the police reported Manchester to be in, not only would that House pass such a Bill, but he should not be surprised if it forbade the brewing of beer and distilling of spirits altogether. What were they asked to do by this Bill? A limited number of people—very limited in comparison with the whole population—abused that which was given them for use, and that House was asked to seriously inconvenience those who did not abuse it, in order to prevent those who did abuse it from continuing their abuse. He did not think that was a right principle to go upon. Two very important classes who would be seriously affected by this Bill had not been touched upon in the course of this discussion. A great number of persons fetched their beer for their meals from the publichouse, and any man who went along the streets on Sunday from half-past 12 till 2 o'clock constantly met a girl or woman with a jug of beer in their hands; but by the Bill all these people would be shut out from this privilege on the only day in the week when a vast number of our poor fellow-countrymen were able to eat their dinner with their families. The second class who would suffer was that of single men, who had places where they slept only, while they took all their meals in a publichouse. He wished that those who desired to check the evils complained of would try to do so tentatively, by reducing the hours, as might be safely done, as far as the evening was concerned, during which publichouses should be permitted to be open on Sunday. If the Government would undertake to introduce some temporary measure for that purpose, it would, if it did not meet the evil effectually, at all events serve as a guide for future legislation. Taking England all over, he believed that drunkenness was on the decrease, with the exception of Lancashire and one or two other places, and though he could not blame persons connected with Lancashire for making every endeavour to check the evils of drunkenness, yet he thought they made a mistake when they brought forward a measure too stringent in its provisions.

MR. BAINES said, in support of the second reading of the Bill, that the evidence of the evil came in such innumerable forms, and with such overpowering weight, that he did not see how its magnitude could be denied. He must deny that it was the wish of the supporters of that Bill to interfere with the liberty of the working man, their sole object being to enfranchise him from the worst of bondage, to improve his condition, as well as that of his wife and family. He wished to draw attention chiefly to the enormous evil that resulted from men going to publichouses, from their being induced to take beer until they became drunk and disorderly, and fit for doing all that could disgrace human beings. That evil, which this measure proposed to remedy, was also breaking the hearts of thousands, he would say of tens and hundreds of thousands of women, was depriving children of their proper food and clothing, and filling the workhouses and prisons. Though he should be delighted to see the publichouses entirely closed on a Sunday, yet they must deal with the matter in a practicable way, and he believed it would be wise to adopt the suggestions made by the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon). If the Bill could be amended in Committee as suggested, the Government would act wisely in supporting it; but he must remind the House that there was a justification for its introduction in the thousands of Petitions that had been presented asking for such a measure. In 1867 upwards of 5,000 Petitions, signed by 500,000 persons, were presented in favour of closing publichouses on Sundays. Magistrates, clergymen, the Nonconformist Bodies, large numbers of the working classes themselves, supported the principle of the Bill. He had here a remarkable report, drawn up by a Committee of the Lower House of Convocation appointed to consider the evils of Sunday drinking; it recommended that the publichouses should be entirely closed on Sundays. Archbishop Manning, who had a large acquaintance with the poorer classes of the Metropolis, gave his utmost support to this measure. Then the Sunday School teachers, a very numerous and very useful body, complained that their work of instruction of the children was neutralized by the visits of the parents to the publichouse. The statistics already cited showed how fearful were the consequences of Sunday drinking in relation to crime; but there were two points to which he wished to draw especial attention—one was that wherever there had been established by law a restriction of the hours during which the publichouses might be open, there had resulted a most marked diminution of drunkenness; the other was that wherever there had been Sunday closing, it had been attended with the most beneficial results. There was evidence to show that the closing publichouses on the Sunday had proved highly beneficial in Scotland, Guernsey, and Tasmania, and with respect to his own town, it was stated in evidence which was produced before a Committee on which he sat, that the Working Men's Club there passed a resolution, almost unanimously, approving such a Bill as the one now before the House. He should support the Motion for the second reading of the Bill; but it would require some modification in Committee.

Mr. Henley

MR. BRUCE said, he thought there could be no doubt that there was on the part of a large portion of the population, well deserving of respect, an earnest desire for the present, or some similar measure. He did not know whether they amounted to a majority, but, at all events, they amounted to an enormous number of the working classes. That desire might arise partly, no doubt, from a wish to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day; but, at the same time, it arose very largely from the circumstance that Sunday was the day on which the workman usually had plenty of money in his pocket, and was, therefore, exposed to peculiar temptation. On the other hand, it must be remembered that a great number of workmen, having more self-command, employed part of the Sunday for the purpose of innocent recreation, and therefore the closing of public-houses on Sundays would operate as a great deprivation to them. The manner of observing Sunday was, to a certain extent, a geographical question, being different in England, Scotland, and Ireland; and, that being so, he could not support the second reading of the present Bill. At the same time, as there was a strong disposition on all sides of the House to meet the reasonable wishes of the country, he advised the hon. Member who introduced the Bill (Mr. Rylands) not to press a measure which would run counter to the feelings of the people, but to bring forward some reasonable proposal which would meet with general support. He should be always anxious to give his aid to any hon. Member who might desire to carry a measure to diminish the evil of drunkenness; but he thought that in the present instance his hon. Friend tried too much, and that if he succeeded in carrying it it would only lead to public discontent. He had himself been charged with a similar error; but hon. Gentlemen would have forgiven that error if they had themselves been obliged to give more than one year's study to all the inconsistencies involved in the licensing law; but his hon. Friend, in dealing with the question in the manner now proposed, was running his head against a wall of his own building, and he must have known that the House could not pass his Bill. His hon. Friend had heard the opinions of many of the weightiest Members of the House expressed, and, for his part, however desirous to promote the objects of his hon. Friend, he must say that he thought the only way of remedying the evil was by adopting a middle course. He was not wedded to the limitation of hours which he had proposed, and he must say he felt the greatest difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory solution. He found that the habits of the people differed in different parts of the country, and he had thought that he should do best to adopt the recommendation of the Committee presided over by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. P. Villiers), that the publichouses should be closed on Sunday except from 1 o'clock to 3, and from 7 o'clock to 9; but it might be, as he had been assured by a number of persons, that instead of the latter period it would be better to allow the public-houses to be open from 8 o'clock to 10. The noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon) had suggested that the restrictions contained in what was called the Liverpool Bill, would be more adapted to the popular wants, and such a proposal would, no doubt, receive the support of a large portion of the country. He could not vote for the Bill in its present shape; but if his hon. Friend would consent to take the second reading pro forma, and would afterwards embody in the measure such suggestions as had been thrown out by the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Melly) and the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool, and which were in substance and principle contained in the Government Bill, he would then feel himself perfectly justified in acting in accordance with the feelings expressed by many hon. Members, and would support the second reading. By adopting such a course, his hon. Friend would have the concurrence of the majority of the House, and, even at that late period of the Session, might carry his measure to a satisfactory conclusion. He hoped his hon. Friend would acquiesce in that suggestion, and thus unite all parties in effecting a useful and practical reform.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, the House had been put into some difficulty by the proposal that had just been made. He and others had come down to the House prepared to vote against the second reading of the Bill, but the proposal of the Home Secretary, if adopted, would entirely change its principle. The Bill as introduced was for the entire closing of publichouses on Sundays, but the suggestion that had been made would only alter in a slight degree the present law. That would be a question of expediency and convenience, whereas the closing of publichouses altogether on Sundays was a question of principle. The proposal was one that would require great consideration. He did not think much of the argument about class or club legislation, because all legislation to a great extent must be so. In that case they did not aim at punishing a particular class, but to assist them in doing something for the improvement of themselves. The publichouse was not a poor man's club; and that they felt so was evident from their having recently commenced starting clubs for themselves, and he saw no reason why they should not be assisted in accomplishing it by legislation. It was monstrous to expect the working classes to buy beer on Saturdays to be kept over for their Sundays' dinners. He was in favour of the introduction of the six days' licence for drinking on the premises, and a seventh day's licence for drinking off the premises. Rather than that the Home Secretary's suggestion should be carried out, he would prefer the withdrawal of the Bill, and the introduction of another by the Government, to deal with that question more in accordance with that principle. If, however, he could be made quite sure that they would not be called to vote upon these clauses over again in Committee, and that the Bill would be reprinted with the alterations proposed, he should have no difficulty in supporting the second reading, simply as an indication in favour of a further limitation of hours, although he confessed he had come down to the House with the intention of voting against the measure.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, if the principles last enunciated by the right hon. Member opposite (Mr. S. Cave) were admitted, it was in his (Mr. Wheelhouse's) mind impossible to deal with that Bill in any way whatever, for, from the Preamble to its finishing section, the whole of Sunday was to be taken away from the people, so far as the purchasing of beer and other liquors was concerned. Therefore no alteration of the principle, as embodied in the Preamble, could effect the object which it was held desirable by the Home Secretary to obtain. He could not help thinking that there were some considerations connected with this subject which had not as yet been felt by hon. Gentlemen with their full force and effect. Whether there were or were not abuses committed in the Sunday traffic, he thought it would be a monstrous principle to hold that if a person wanted a glass of beer on a Sunday he should not be at liberty to purchase it. He had lived in a large borough for above 26 years, moving all that time from day to day amongst the population, and taking his part in the Sunday life of a large provincial town. From the experience which he had gained during that long period, he had no hesitation in declaring that it was incorrect to say that drunkenness was on the increase, or that many men were given to drink to excess in proportion to the amount of the population. He contended, relatively to the size of that population, on the contrary, that drunkenness was decreasing from year to year. But if it were not, and if hon. Members wanted to suppress altogether the liquor traffic on the Sundays, they ought in all honesty to begin at home—to shut up their own clubs, and say that they themselves would not take a drop of wine or beer on Sundays.

MR. LOCKE said, he should not have risen were it not for the extraordinary course taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary in regard to this Bill. It was most remarkable that the right hon. Gentleman, who had himself brought in a Licensing Bill, which contained nothing in it that anybody approved, should now take on himself the duty of amending another Bill by striking out the whole of it. [Laughter.] He proposed to strike out everything from the first to the last word of the Bill. Yes, the title must go, the Preamble must go, and any hon. Member who had read the Bill must see that all the clauses must also go—so that nothing would be left. The hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) was, perhaps, one of the most inconsistent men in the House. One year he supported the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) in his proposals; but this year the hon. Member for Warrington was non inventus when the hon. Member for Leicester brought in that Bill of which the hon. Member for Warrington was so enamoured last year. The hon. Member must have a certain number of constituents that led him astray on all occasions. He counted heads and noses, and asked himself how these people would go, and where he would be obliged to go if he did not follow them. Now, it was most extraordinary that his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary should follow in the track of such an extraordinary person as the hon. Member for Warrington. Another thing struck him as extraordinary. Although the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) had quoted from a number of bits of paper which he took out of his pocket all sorts of statistics, which no one could clearly understand, but that hon. Gentleman had never even incidentally alluded to the Blue Book, containing a Report of the Committee which sat on a Bill not half so awful a one as the Bill of the hon. Member for Warrington, and it did not go to the extent suggested by the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon). The Bill to which he referred was that brought into that House by the late Member for Chichester (Mr. J. A. Smith), a measure which was to prevent any person from obtaining drink on the Sunday, except within certain limited hours. The noble Lord the Member for Liverpool proposed to give the people four hours on the Sunday to obtain their liquor—namely, from 1 o'clock till 3 o'clock P.M., and from 8 o'clock until 10 o'clock at night. But the Bill of the hon. Member for Warrington went further than any other person dared to go, for he would deprive the people of their beer throughout the whole of Sunday. But they were told by an hon. Member that the people forsooth could not restrain themselves in any way, and therefore there must be Acts of Parliament telling them when they ought to eat and drink, and when they ought not to eat and drink. He (Mr. Locke) thought it was a disgrace to this country if the great bulk of the population were of such a miserable nature that they could not judge or act for themselves, but that they must depend upon such persons as the hon. Member for Warrington, who would tell them what they should do or what they should not do.

Mr. Stephen Cave,

He (Mr. Locke) confessed he could never look upon such Bills with patience. He thought that they had too many attempts by hon. Members to make the people slaves by Act of Parliament; to tell them what they were to do, how they were to regulate their meals, and what were the hours at which they should take them. He did not think that this country would be worth living in if they were to be legislated for by a class of Members that had recently come into that House, and these were the hon. Members who talked of freedom. The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright) in his speech that day, cited the authority of a Mr. Mackie. He (Mr. Locke) believed that Mr. Mackie, as well as Mr. Findlater, sold as much or more intoxicating drink to the people than anyone else in the United Kingdom. But the hon. Gentleman said he would restrain the sale of liquors at a particular time when nobody wanted to drink. Well, but if nobody wanted to drink during the time referred to, where was the occasion for this Bill? Why that perpetual "meddling and muddling" system, which was so much favoured by certain hon. Members of that House, who were always saying that the condition of the people must be ameliorated—that the people generally were fools, and that they alone were the Solons, the lawmakers, and lawgivers who would arrange all those matters for them? What was the Report of the Committee on Mr. John Abel Smith's Bill? He would remind the hon. Member for Leeds of the unfortunate course which he had taken on that occasion. That hon. Gentleman, addressing the Committee from day to day, spoke of the pain he suffered at seeing the unfortunate condition of the people from their indulgence in intoxicating drinks. But the Committee did not listen to his speeches; they struck out every clause of the Bill, precisely as the Home Secretary must do in regard to the Bill of the hon. Member for Warrington; indeed, the Bill was put aside entirely—the Chairman of the Committee (Sir James Fergusson), a Scotchman, entirely agreed with the majority of the Committee, and was decidedly against the Bill. The Bill was ultimately negatived by a majority of 8 to 3. The Committee afterwards agreed to a Report drawn up by the hon. Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen), which stated that drunkenness had diminished greatly, and that they did not think it proper to interfere with the rights of the people in reference to this subject. The Committee further expressed their belief that drunkenness would continue to decrease, if the people were not interfered with by coercive measures. Now, he very much regretted to find, from the peculiar state of the Treasury benches, that they could not obtain the opinion of the hon. Member for Sandwich upon the present measure, because that hon. Gentleman was well acquainted with the evidence upon which he drew up the Report alluded to. Before any action was taken on this question by the Secretary of State, he thought the House was bound to negative the Bill of the hon. Member for Warrington. And then, if they were to have legislation upon the licensing system, it ought to be by means of a new Bill containing a single clause, though he did not believe the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool would like to see this subject settled by a mere skeleton Bill of such a character. But it would appear that the hon. Member for Warrington had no confidence in the Secretary of State—indeed, the hon. Gentleman did not seem to have any confidence in anybody but himself. For his (Mr. Locke's) own part, he should certainly vote against this Bill on a division.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, there was the greatest anxiety that this Bill should be carried out in Ireland, and he should support the second reading with that view. He was much gratified by the statement which had been made by the Home Secretary, and anticipated the best results from his judgment, knowledge, experience, and responsibility being brought to bear on this question; and in connection with that part of the subject, he would observe that it was obvious that the hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) could not have read the Preamble of the Bill, for there was nothing in it in any way inconsistent with the adoption of the recommendation contained in that statement. There was a very large and important class who earnestly desired legislation in this direction. He hoped the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) would accept the proposal which was made to him by the Secretary of State.

Mr. Locke

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING referred to a Memorial, signed by 59 corporations in Ireland and 937 magistrates, earnestly urging the Government to adopt measures for prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors upon Sunday in Ireland, for the purpose of showing that the question had attracted great attention in Ireland. He, however, could only support the Bill upon the understanding suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he thought it impossible to pass this Bill, although there was a strong agitation in its favour. It would be unwise to foment that agitation by a blank refusal. He would, therefore, support the Bill if a pledge were given that it should be committed only pro forma, with the view of converting it into a Limitation of Hours Bill.

MR. MURPHY said, there would not be the slightest use in passing a Limitation of Hours Bill, until the licence system had been entirely re-modelled. He could not support the second reading.

MR. RYLANDS said, that, after the very general expression of opinion, he should accept the proposal of the Government, which he had ascertained would be perfectly in order, in the hope and expectation that the Bill, as altered, would pass this Session.

MR. BRUCE said, his hon. Friend must fulfil all the conditions. The Bill must be converted into a Bill of Limitation.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, he thought the House had been placed in a position of great difficulty. The hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) having brought in a Bill absolutely to prohibit the sale of liquor on Sunday should either stand or fall by it. He was surprised that the Secretary of State should have made the suggestion he had done. If, as he believed, the right hon. Gentleman was in earnest with his Licensing Bill for next year, it ought to embrace everything now proposed to be touched by the Bill of the hon. Member for Warrington. This sort of piecemeal legislation was most mischievous, and he ventured to say there was a good deal of humbug in it. Many hon. Members were no doubt honest in their intentions, but he believed a good many were dishonest; he meant that while anxious to satisfy some of their consti-tients in voting for such a measure as that, they would be exceedingly happy to see it thrown out.

MR. D. DALRYMPLE said, he thought that there should be a distinct understanding that the hon. Member for Warrington would take upon himself the responsibility of altering the Bill as suggested.

ALDERMAN SIR JAMES LAWRENCE said, he could not support the second reading, because they had evidence that closing publichouses in New York had led to increased drunkenness. If the House should pass the second reading, they would in that way sanction a principle that they would not be prepared to stand by, and against which they were indeed almost unanimous. He hoped that the Bill would be withdrawn, and then a Bill of limitation could be brought in in its stead.

MR. STRAIGHT said, it would be very annoying to the administrators of the law to have to apply one law with reference to the liquor traffic on Sunday, and another law with reference to that traffic on week days. He thought the whole Licensing Law should be consolidated into one statute, for it would be found mischievous to deal with the question in the partial manner proposed. He hoped the hon. Member for Warrington would withdraw this Bill, and if the Home Secretary was afraid to introduce another Bill, perhaps some hon. Member would do so.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 147; Noes 119: Majority 28.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolutions [June 20] reported.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he desired to draw attention to the fact that there still appeared upon the Estimate for the Packet Service, a memorandum that no money was to be applied to the payment of any contract that had been entered into with Mr. Joseph George Churchward. As the contract with that gentleman expired in January, 1870, there could be no object in keeping this memorandum on the Estimates, except it was for the purpose of perpetuating a party triumph.

MR. BAXTER said, that the hon. and learned Baronet should give Notice of his intention to take the opinion of the House upon the question if he objected to the Estimates in their present form.

Resolutions agreed to.

DEAN FOREST AND HUNDRED OF ST. BRIAVELS BILL.

Select Committee on the Dean Forest and Hundred of St. Briavels Bill nominated:—Mr. BAXTER, Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, Mr. MARLING, and Mr. KENNAWAY, and Three Members to be added by the Committee of Selection:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Three to be the quorum.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 22nd June, 1871.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—House of Commons (Witnesses)* (198); Glasgow Boundary* (199); Sasines Register (Scotland)* (200); Metropolitan Board of Works (Loans)* (201); Tramways (Ireland)* (203).

Second Reading—Courts of Justice (Additional Site)* (182); Corrupt Practices Act Amendment* (173).

Select Committee—Locomotives* (130), nominated.

Committee — Report — Metropolitan Commons Supplemental (No. 2)* (174); Land Drainage Supplemental* (175); Poor Law (Provisional Orders Confirmation)* (168); Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Supplemental* (172); Police Courts (Metropolis)* (125).

Report—Dogs* (191-202).

Third Reading—Burial Law Amendment* (126); Public Health (Scotland) Act (1867) Amendment* (148); Betting* (129); Gasworks Clauses Act (1847) Amendment (No. 2)* (192), and passed.

Withdrawn—Ecclesiastical Courts (84); Ecclesiastical Procedure and Registry* (85).

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS BILL—(No. 84.)
(The Earl of Shaftesbury.)

COMMITTEE. BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that the accumulation of business in the House of Commons precluded any hope of this measure, and the Ecclesiastical Procedure and Registry Bill, being considered there this Session. He therefore proposed to withdraw those Bills, with the intention of re-introducing them early next year.

Moved, "That the said Order be discharged."—(The Earl of Shaftesbury.)

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, he had received a statement from Messrs. Moore and Currey, a respectable firm of proctors in Doctors' Commons, with regard to the Purchas case, which, according to the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury), occupied nearly three years and, although undefended, cost one side almost £8,000. They stated that the facts were as follows:—

"The cause in the Arches' Court began (by the issue of the citation) in October, 1869, and was argued in the following month, and judgment was given on the 3rd of February, 1870,—i.e., in about four months from its commencement. The judgment in the appeal to the Judicial Committee was delivered on the 23rd of February, 1871,—i.e., within 13 months of the judgment in the Arches' Court. The appeal would have been more speedily disposed of but for the death of the promoter (Colonel Elphinstone) pending the proceedings, which necessarily occasioned delay. As to the cost, it is stated to have amounted to £8,000. The actual expenditure by us as proctors in the original cause and appeal has amounted, exclusive of our own charges, which are not yet ascertained, to £2,200, of which about £1,500 has been paid in fees to counsel, the remainder to witnesses, printers, and shorthand-writers. No further outlay has been incurred in the Courts, and whatever system of procedure may be ultimately adopted, the above expenditure cannot be avoided. It is common to all cases in all Courts where the parties insist upon the employment of four counsel of eminent ability. If the statement is well founded that £8,000 has been expended, the difference between that sum and what is shown above must have been incurred in preliminary inquiries and what is commonly called 'getting up the case.' This cannot fairly be charged to a defect in the existing system, but must have been equally incurred in whatever Court the case was to be ultimately tried."

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, it was true that he had mis-stated the expenses in the Purchas case. He should have stated that the expenses were £5,000. In mentioning £8,000 he was thinking of another case which really cost that sum, though, like the Purchas case, it was unopposed. He left their Lordships to imagine what the amount would have been had there been opposition. But even if the expenses were no more than £5,000, how important it was that Courts where such costs could be incurred should be re-modelled. It was of vital importance that a Court should be constituted as soon as possible, as cheap and easy as the County Court—for it was manifest that opposition was arising to the judgments given by the Judicial Committee, and the Bishops would be called upon to maintain the law of the land. He appealed to the House whether they could do this while the expenditure of time and money remained what they were at present.

LORD ROMILLY regretted the withdrawal of the Bill, for had it passed through this House this Session it would have occupied very little time next year, and would have had a fair chance of passing through the other House; whereas he feared that a reform which had been aimed at for upwards of 20 years was now indefinitely postponed.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY must confess he had heard with alarm the noble Earl's suggestion that the Courts which were to decide such cases as the Purchas and the Bennett cases should be made as simple as the County Courts. If this was really the object of the Bill it was desirable that it should be made a little more comprehensive. If the noble Earl meant that the law laid down by the Judicial Committee was to be enforced like County Court judgments upon every clergyman in the kingdom, that tribunal should be made a little more tolerable to those subject to its decisions, and a little more consonant with the spirit which governed the other tribunals of the country. That tribunal was one of the greatest grievances of which Churchmen had to complain, for it was the only tribunal of last appeal in this or any other civilized country where the law was not laid down by lawyers. He was aware that there were local jurisdictions of primary instance in which unlearned persons were employed; but in no civil case was the law laid down by a Court of Final Appeal except by persons whose minds had been practised in the study of the law, and whose temperament and disposition had been drilled into impartiality by the long practice which all lawyers obtained. On the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council the law was laid down in part—it might be in great part—by Bishops. Now, nobody would exceed him in reverence for the Episcopal office and all that properly appertained to it; but it was about as sensible to ask a Bishop to lay down the law in the last resort as it would be to ask an Admiral or Commander-in-

The Earl of Shaftesbury

Chief to do so. It was a duty which required special training, and it was a grievous hardship to those submitted to the jurisdiction if persons learned in the law were not employed. He believed that the Judicial Committee required in other points the careful supervision of those concerned with the amendment of the law, before its judgments were enforced with the simplicity proposed by the noble Earl. He would urge that it should be a Court of fixed constitution. At present it was often difficult to discover who were the Judges in the particular case. He believed the President of the Council in every case appointed the Judges; but, as he understood, it was practically done by a gentleman for whom all had the greatest respect, Mr. Henry Reeve, the Registrar. This did not seem a satisfactory state of things for a tribunal dealing with matters which excited people's passions and feelings to the highest degree, and on which parties were angrily divided. Nobody conversant with the matter could harbour the unworthy suspicion that the Court was ever packed for the trial of a particular case—he had no apprehensions on that score—but it was because the action and constitution of the Court should be above all suspicion that he would urge the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack to provide some fixed constitution, so that the Court should not be constituted afresh for the particular case it had to consider. Then, again, the practice of a collective judgment seriously diminished the authority of its decisions, for it was not known whether lawyers or Bishops had given any particular judgment, and one was driven to rely on internal evidence. The weight of all judgments depended on those who delivered them; and great advantage resulted from the practice of delivering judgments seriatim, which prevailed in other Courts. It was of considerable importance whether a decision was unanimous or not, and if not unanimous whether it was the Judges of greater or less authority who gave the decision. These questions required earnest attention if what he should call the disastrous and sinister vitality proposed by the noble Earl were given to this tribunal. He believed that the danger of the Church of England lay, if anywhere, in litigation. It would not fall by attacks from without; but it might be split by the ill-directed energy of friends within. Be this as it might, if the clergy were to be driven to conform in the minutest particulars to the judgment of the Court, it should be a Court formed of lawyers, constituted in a manner above suspicion, and acting in a way common to all other tribunals in the realm.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that his noble Friend the President of the Council was responsible for the composition of the Court, though Mr. Reeve took the principal share of ascertaining what Judges were able to attend, so that a Court might be constituted. Mr. Reeve invariably consulted the Lord President, who on some occasions called a Cabinet Council to consider whether the proposed composition of the Court would be satisfactory and fair. He would offer no opinion as to whether the Court benefited by the assistance of the right rev. Prelates; but the original idea undoubtedly was that it was desirable that the heads of the Church should form part of the tribunal. The question of collective or separate judgments was one more for his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack than for himself; but he understood collective judgments had always been regarded as a great advantage in the decisions of the Privy Council. The other plan was likely to weaken the authority of the judgment, for it might be said that the two Judges in the minority were men of greater weight than the three who decided a question.

LORD CAIRNS said, it was a mistake to suppose that any right of selecting Judges for any particular case existed. Every member of the Judicial Committee had a right to sit on every matter which came before it. The statement of the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) referred, he thought, to other Committees of the Privy Council which were occasionally required for the purpose of hearing appeals as to University statutes, in which cases the composition of the Committee was not laid down by Act of Parliament—so that some action on the part of the Government or the President was necessary. He could testify from considerable experience to the way in which Mr. Reeve performed his duties. The fact was that there was a great unwillingness to attend and undergo the great labour and responsibility of hearing important cases. Mr. Reeve, knowing this, and having an earnest desire to perform the duties of his office effectively—no public officer could discharge them better—was in the habit of making himself acquainted with the arrangements of those who might be expected to attend, with a view—not to decide who ought to attend to hear particular cases—but as to whose services were obtainable, in order that some kind of Court might be constituted. He did not believe Mr. Reeve had ever interfered in any other way, and whatever objections might be made to the composition of the Judicial Committee as an ecclesiastical tribunal, it ought to be understood that no person had any power of selecting some and excluding others, and that the Registrar's endeavour to procure the attendance of individuals had merely arisen from anxiety lest there should be no quorum.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was glad the question had been raised by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), for there could not be a more mistaken impression than that any selection was made with reference to the attendance of members of the Judicial Committee. As his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns) had explained, every member had a right to attend, though not bound to do so. At one time, indeed, those who had filled particular offices and were in the receipt of pensions, deemed it their duty to attend regularly; but, in process of time, as was not surprising, years and infirmity prevented them, and—as he recently mentioned—there were now five Judges of experience and eminence who had gradually discontinued their attendance. He did not say there was a formal summons to the members, for this was regarded as insisting on attendance; but great care was taken to ascertain whether all those accustomed to take part were willing to attend. There was no wish to exclude—the difficulty being that of including all those whose attendance would be desirable. With the praise bestowed on Mr. Reeve every one connected with the Committee would entirely concur. He assisted those who were able and willing to attend in finding coadjutors, and there had been no instance that he could recollect of anything but a desire to include as many as were willing to attend. No selection was made. As to the manner of delivering judgments, whether separately or collectively, this House was hardly a precedent, for the judgments delivered in their Lordships' House were, strictly speaking, speeches; a regular Motion was made, on which a vote was taken. But for this question of form there would, probably, as in the Judicial Committee, be a collective judgment. The practice in the Committee was laid down, he thought, by Lord Kingsdown, and for very good reasons. It was desirable, for the information of the Court above, that judgments in banco and in the Exchequer Chamber should be delivered seriatim; but when a matter came to the Court of Final Appeal individual judgments would serve no purpose, but would merely create heartburnings and jealousies—for the law would then have been settled, and could not be altered except by Parliament. Any dissatisfaction with the Judicial Committee, founded on the impression that there was partial summoning or anything like packing, was wholly unfounded, and could only be due to the jealousy always observable when men's passions were excited, and when they were more intent on their own conceptions and ideas than on submitting themselves to the law. The difficulty consisted in the insufficient number of Judges willing and able to attend. A Bill to remedy this had been prepared by him, and, had time permitted, would have been proceeded with this Session, and attention would continue to be directed to that matter.

Lord Cairns

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY desired that there should be no misapprehension as to the position of Bishops on the Judicial Committee. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) appeared to fear that the Church was likely to be subjected to a course of Bishop-made law, and to regret that Bishops should be judges in cases requiring a knowledge of law. Now, he had sat many times on the Judicial Committee, and had never found a lack of readiness on the part of legal members to defer to the Bishops as to matters which, though not theological, necessarily touched on theological points, or of lack of readiness on the part of the Bishops to defer to their colleagues on matters of law. Notwithstanding all he had heard, his opinion remained unchanged—that it was better on the whole that there should be some persons on the Committee acquainted with theology; not that the questions at issue were theological, but that there were legal questions which touched persons holding certain opinions, and that the greatest lawyers might make mistakes unless they had the assistance of theologians. In proof that this view was borne out by the lawyers themselves, he would mention that in certain cases not arising under the Church Discipline Act the Bishops had no right to sit. But in the first case, in which he took part, he was summoned, and Archbishop Sumner, to be present as assessors. Their presence was not legally necessary; but the Court thought it right to summon Bishops as assessors—apparently a declaration on their part that it was well to have the advice of persons acquainted with the theological points in the questions at issue, even when the law did not strictly command their presence. The Judicial Committee was sometimes very unpopular; but he had observed that it was generally unpopular with those against whom it had decided, and he believed this was no peculiarity of this particular tribunal. He had sat upon it in cases in which it was very popular, because the person condemned had no large following; but if it happened that the person condemned had a large following, the Court was for a time very unpopular. He could not help thinking there was a good deal of unworthy agitation in this matter when such an argument was brought forward. When he first sat on the Episcopal bench there was a great scheme for radically reforming the Judicial Committee by turning all the lawyers out of it. The idea was that there should be only Bishops. Years went by, and at last it occurred to a certain number of persons that, if the Bishops could only be got rid of, the decisions of the Court would only be the opinions of lawyers, and might be represented as having nothing to do with the Church, which might be considered quite independent. Now, till the persons who objected to the present Court had some definite idea what they wished to substitute for it, he—though fully convinced that the Court, like all human institutions, was capable of great improvement, but having never heard a proposal for a better plan—was content to put up with the present tribunal.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON remarked that judgments often derived weight from the persons who delivered them, and a considerable and increasing difficulty was likely to arise with regard to cases in which it was impossible to tell how far the Bishops on the Judicial Committee coincided with the judgment. He believed that the two Archbishops and the Bishop of London were the only Prelates who sat on the Committee. He was not aware whether they did so by virtue of the sees they held, or as Privy Councillors. In this respect the Judicial Committee laboured under a serious disadvantage as contrasted with the old Court of Delegates. The latter enjoyed the right of selecting any person, lay or clerical, civilian or layman, to take part and give counsel in important questions; but since it had been superseded by the Judicial Committee, the choice of the Crown was limited to Privy Councillors. Now, there might be cases which were theological as well as legal, yet, under the present constitution of the Court, it was impossible for the Crown to select the ablest theologian or highest casuist in the country to bring his judgment to bear on the matter. Were Bishop Butler or Jeremy Taylor now living, they could not sit on the Committee. As to collective judgments, not only this House but every other Court in the country except the Judicial Committee, allowed its members the option, at all events, of expressing an opinion separately, and it deserved consideration whether the Judicial Committee should not adopt the same course.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that the constitution of the Judicial Committee formed no part of his Bill. He disclaimed any desire of promoting litigation in ecclesiastical matters, and he believed that were the Bill passed very little litigation would arise. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) must be aware that it was the character of Englishmen to struggle hard for a right, and having got it, oftentimes not put it into execution. The knowledge of the existence of such a power, however, would operate as a restraint on a great number of the clergy who were giving way to pedantic proclivities. To refuse justice by making it expensive and dilatory was not wise or statesmanlike. The ecclesiastical laws of the realm were among the statute laws of the land, and people had a right to enjoy full access to and benefit from them. As to those gentlemen who were resisting the law, their course would be to do all they could either to amend the law, or to amend the formation of the Judicial Committee; but they did neither one nor the other; they must then obey the law as it stood, or secede from a Church to which they could not conform.

Motion agreed to; Order discharged accordingly; and Bill, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

ECCLESIASTICAL PROCEDURE AND REGISTRY BILL. [NO. 85.]

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read, and discharged, and Bill, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

TRAMWAYS (IRELAND) BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend The Tramways (Ireland) Acts 1860 and 1861—Was presented by The Lord CAIRNS; read 1^a. (No. 203.)

House adjourned at half past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past
Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 22nd June, 1871.

MINUTES.] — SELECT COMMITTEE — Twenty-eighth Report—Public Petitions.

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Railway Regulation Amendment* [195]; Vaccination Act (1867) Amendment* [191]; Public Schools Act (1868) Amendment* [204].

Referred to Select Committee—Local Government Supplemental (No. 4)* [187]; Sewage Utilization Supplemental* [186].

Committee—Elections (Parliamentary and Municipal) (re-comm.) [103], debate adjourned; Tramways (Provisional Orders Confirmation) (re-comm.)* [197]—R.P.

Considered as amended—Kingsholm District Boundary* [185].

Third Reading—Ecclesiastical Dilapidations* [202]; Metropolitan Building Act (1856) Amendment* [200], and passed.

HERRING BRAND IN SCOTLAND. QUESTION.

MR. ELLICE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, with reference to a statement to the effect that the Government intend to abolish two years hence the herring brand in Scotland, Whether he is aware that a Treasury Commission in 1856, after full inquiry, distinctly recommended the maintenance of the branding system; and that another Treasury Commission in 1870, after similar inquiry, as distinctly refused the responsibility of the abolition of the brand; whether Government has received since the Report of the last Commission in 1870 any official information of a contrary tendency to that Report; and, if so, whether such information will be laid before the House; and, whether he will state that no order, notice, or proceeding with a view to the abolition of the brand shall be adopted by the Government until this House has had full opportunity for expressing its opinion upon any proposed change?

The Earl of Shaftesbury

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, it was not necessary that he should enter into any considerable detail on this question; but he did not think the hon. Gentleman's facts were exactly correct. The case was this—In 1856 an inquiry was instituted by three Commissioners, of whom two recommended the continuance of the branding system and one recommended the reverse. A second inquiry was made, he thought, in 1866, when the Sea Fisheries Commission reported adversely to the branding system. In 1870 a Treasury Commission on this and other subjects reported that they were unwilling to take the responsibility of advising the abolition of the brand. The Treasury had not received any official information since 1870; but both the Treasury and the Board of Trade had expressed departmental judgments adverse to the branding system. As to the last Question, he hoped he could give the hon. Gentleman entire satisfaction, because there was no intention whatever of taking any proceedings upon the subject during the time that would elapse before the matter could naturally come under the consideration of the House by any Vote in Supply that might be taken next year for the Fishery Board. The hon. Gentleman would, therefore, have an opportunity on that occasion, even if he had not on any other, of promoting further discussion on the subject.

ARMY—ROYAL ACADEMY AT WOOLWICH. —SONS OF MILITIA OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. CORRY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in consequence of the more intimate relations intended to be established between the Regular Army and the Militia, he will consider the propriety of admitting, by competitive examination, the sons of officers of the Militia to be educated at the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, on the same terms as the sons of officers of the Line?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, the advantages given to sons of officers in the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich are on account of the dangers to which their parents are exposed on foreign service, and he did not think it desirable to extend the same privilege to the sons of officers in the Militia.

ARMY—ADJUTANTS IN THE RESERVE FORCES.—QUESTION.

EARL PERCY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in the event of the Army Regulation Bill becoming Law, officers now serving as Adjutants in the Reserve Forces will be called upon to resign their commissions; and, if not, upon what conditions they will be permitted to retain them?

MR. CARDWELL: Officers who have obtained adjutancies since the introduction of the Bill have received notice that they take them subject to any regulations which may hereafter be made with respect to their tenure and duties. Adjutants appointed before will hold their appointments on the old conditions, so long as they continue to discharge their duties faithfully.

EPHING FOREST—INCLOSURE AT WANSTEAD FLATS.—QUESTION.

MR. HOLMS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it be true, as stated in the public journals, that an enclosure of thirty acres of Epping Forest has been made at Wanstead Flats during the past week by the representatives of Earl Cowley; and, if so, whether the Government intend to institute proceedings in the matter?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, there had been an inclosure of some rough land at Wanstead Flats by the Lord of the Manor (Earl Cowley). It was inclosed by a fence, which did not offer any obstruction to the feeding of deer, supposing there were any deer to be fed there. It was not his intention to involve the public in any litigation on the subject.

UNITED STATES—TREATY OF WASHINGTON.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he will give an early day for his Motion relating to the Washington Treaty?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he subscribed to the general principle that it was particularly fit and becoming for that House to take an opportunity of obtaining any explanation, which might be thought desirable, and of passing a judgment which might be thought fit, on the conduct of the Government, or of those who acted on the part of the Government, in respect to the Treaty of Washington. When the right hon. Baronet asked that an early day might be fixed for the discussion of his Motion on the subject, he hoped that what was meant by "an early day" would be construed with some latitude, because the present state of Public Business, and the inconvenience of postponing Bills beyond a certain date of time, when measures of importance should be sent to the House of Lords, constituted a very serious difficulty in the case. However, he suggested that the right hon. Gentleman should communicate with him on the subject, for he was desirous that the right hon. Gentleman should have the opportunity of bringing forward his Motion before a period of the Session when it might be inconvenient for Members to attend to take part in the debate.

METROPOLIS—NEW STREET FROM TOTTENHAM COURT ROAD TO CHARING CROSS.—QUESTION.

MR. RAIKES asked the hon. Member for Bath, Whether a proposal for the expenditure of £200,000 on the new street from Tottenham Court Road to St. Martin's Place, now intended to be made under the provisions of a Bill at present before Parliament, has been entertained by the Metropolitan Board of Works; whether eminent Contractors have not expressed their willingness to make this new street free of cost; and, whether the Metropolitan Board of Works seriously contemplate so large an outlay of money to be obtained from the ratepayers of London under these circumstances?

SIR WILLIAM TITE said, in reply, that the Metropolitan Board of Works proposed to contribute £200,000 towards the construction of a great and important street from Tottenham Court Road to the Strand. It was to be 60 feet wide. He was not aware that there ever was any offer made to the Metropolitan Board by "eminent contractors to make this new street free of cost." The facts were these:—In 1864 an Act was passed to make a railway connecting the northern and southern railways, and that had something to do with some proposition for making this great street. However, that Act having passed, four years elapsed and nothing came of it. The Metropolitan Board were then requested to take up the street by the parishes principally concerned. At that time a new proposition came from very respectable quarters to construct a railway somewhat on the old line; and if hon. Members desired to see the importance of the railway and street together they should look at the plans which he had placed in the Library relating to both. The Act for the construction of the railway had passed that House, and was at present in the House of Lords. In 1870 an application was made to the Metropolitan Board by a Mr. George Elliot, who had something, he believed, to do with the former railway in 1864, who stated that he could bring forward, if the Board would give him power, respectable contractors who would take the whole matter in hand. The Board paid every possible attention to the application of Mr. Elliot, who, unluckily, had been unfortunate previously. However, attention was paid to his communication, and he was requested—that the Board might consider the question—to mention the names of the contractors to whom he referred. They were inquired into by the proper officers for the Metropolitan Board, who were told they had better have nothing to do with them. The other parties promoting the present Bill were men of great wealth and respectability. The street, it had been ascertained, would have cost half a million of money; but by the railway going under the street the parties had undertaken with the Board to complete this important project for the sum of £200,000.

Mr. Raikes

He hoped the House would agree with him that the Metropolitan Board had been wise in agreeing to that arrangement.

THE HEIRS OF WILLIAM PENN.

QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Who are the parties now in receipt of £4,000 a-year pension granted in 1790 to the heirs of William Penn; whether he is satisfied that the grounds on which it was granted were such as to make it a fair and legitimate perpetual burden on the people of this Country; and, whether it is not desirable and possible to arrange some limit to its duration?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: In reply, Sir, to the first Question of my hon. Friend, I have to state that the person at present in receipt of the pension is Mr. William Stewart, the representative of William Penn. With respect to the grounds on which that pension was granted, the circumstances are such as no Englishman can think of without regret. The family of William Penn were the possessors of property in the State of Pennsylvania, estimated by the Commissioners at £500,000. That property was lost to the family entirely in consequence of their adhering to the mother country in the war between the mother country and her colony. In 1790 Mr. Pitt proposed, as a very inadequate compensation, as he thought, for the loss sustained by a family which had rendered great public service in the Plantation of Pennsylvania, that a pension of £4,000 should be granted to them. So far as I can collect, the sense of the House rather was in favour of £5,000 than £4,000; but ultimately it was agreed between Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox, without any dissentient voice, that the amount should be £4,000. It was declared that the pension should be placed on the Consolidated Fund, and be considered in the nature of real property, and subject to all the provisions of any settlement as real property would be. The pension was removed from the Consolidated Fund and placed on the Estimates, but I am distinctly of opinion that, under the circumstances, and after an enjoyment of 80 years, it would not be consistent with public credit and good faith to alter it. The third Question of the hon. Gentleman is whether it is not desirable and possible to arrange some limit to the duration of this pension. Certainly I think it is not possible or desirable to limit the grant that Parliament made; but in several cases we have purchased up such pensions—the pension, for instance, of the Duke of Grafton—and I do think such a proceeding would be both wise and prudent. I will give my attention to the subject, and see whether some terms could not be come to with the heirs of William Penn for purchasing up this pension.

ARMY—THE RESERVE FORCES.—ADJUTANTS' COMMISSIONS.—QUESTION.

Mr. HOLMS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in the event of the Army Regulation Bill becoming Law, he will take such steps as shall render impossible in the future payments of sums of money for Adjutants' commissions in the Reserve Forces; payments which, notwithstanding the solemn declaration made by each recipient of an Adjutant's commission—namely—

"That he thereby declares, upon his honour as an officer and a gentleman, that, in order to obtain the appointment of an Adjutant in the he has not given, paid, received, or promised, and does not believe that anyone for him has given, paid, or received, directly or indirectly, any recompense, reward, or gratuity to any person or persons whatever," have hitherto been notoriously common?

Mr. CARDWELL replied that it certainly was his intention, if the Army Regulation Bill became law, to take such steps as might be in his power to render impossible in future the payment of any sums of money for Adjutants' commissions in the Reserve Forces, and he hoped those steps would be effectual for the purpose.

ELECTIONS (PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL) (re-committed) BILL.

(Mr. William Edward Forster, Mr. Secretary Bruce, The Marquess of Hartington.)

[BILL 103.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Mr. G. BENTINCK rose to move—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to make provision therein for the better prevention of bribery and corruption at Elections."

["Order, order!"]

Mr. SPEAKER: It is proper that I should inform the hon. Member that it will not be necessary for him to move the Instruction he proposes, as it will be in his power in Committee to propose any clauses or Amendments on the subject of bribery which he may desire. As the hon. Member has reminded me that in 1860, on the Bill to amend the laws relative to the Representation of the People in England and Wales, an hon. Member (Mr. Hunt) moved an Instruction similar to that which he now proposes, and that the same course was taken in the year 1866, I looked back to both Bills. They defined the right of voting in counties and cities and redistributed seats. There was no reference whatever to bribery and corrupt practices or the means for suppressing them. Now, in the Bill before the House this evening there is a series of clauses—from Clause 22 to Clause 28—relating distinctly to corrupt practices—that is to say, to bribery, treating, and personation, to which other clauses might be added. Under these circumstances, the hon. Member will see the great distinction that exists between the two cases. The hon. Member will see that in the present instance an Instruction to the Committee is unnecessary, and, therefore, that it is contrary to the Rules of the House that it should be moved.

Mr. G. BENTINCK said, he was perfectly satisfied with the right hon. Gentleman's decision, and more especially so since he understood that he was at liberty to move clauses relating to bribery and corruption. Acting upon this understanding, he begged to give Notice that he should move such clauses in Committee.

Mr. J. LOWTHER rose to move—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to provide for the redistribution of the seats now vacant through the disfranchisement of the Boroughs of Beverley, Bridgwater, Cashel, and Sligo."

The hon. Member said, he thought there could scarcely be any serious objection to this proposal. Without detaining the House with any lengthened argument in its favour, he must remind hon. Members that although the question did not come within the scope of the Preamble it certainly did within that of the Bill, which was entitled an Elections (Parliamentary and Municipal) Bill, although for some inscrutable reason the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister invariably termed it the Secret Voting Bill. The subject-matter of the Instruction he proposed was one that urgently demanded the attention of Parliament, especially that part of it which related to Ireland, the representation of which suffered more severely from the suspension of two of its seats than did that of England. The noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in reply to a Question from the right hon. and learned Baronet (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) the other day, said—

"The Government were desirous, as soon as possible, of providing for the allocation of the vacant seats; but he declined to give any pledge on the part of the Government as to the time when and the manner in which the Government would attempt to dispose of them."—[3 Hansard, ccvii. 195.]

Nothing could be more contrary to the spirit of the Constitution than that representation should be withheld for an unlimited time without some definite reason being assigned for such suspension. It was true that certain seats were suspended in the representation of England in 1861; but, although at that time every public man in the kingdom was distinctly pledged to an early consideration of the question of Parliamentary Reform, which was a good reason for refraining from giving those seats to other constituencies, the House, acting upon the constitutional principle to which he had referred, distributed those seats, although the new constituencies were unable to avail themselves of their privilege until the next dissolution, which did not occur until four years after it had been conferred upon them. Parliament should determine either that these seats should be re-apportioned, or else that the Members of that House should be reduced. He did not intend at that moment to enter into the question as to what use the Committee ought to make of the power he proposed to confer upon them, as in the event of the House agreeing to his Motion he should have another opportunity of discussing that subject. Having expressed a hope that Her Majesty's Government would not put him to the trouble of dividing the House, the hon. Member concluded by moving the Instruction of which he had given Notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That it be an Instruction to the Committee, that they have power to provide for the redistribu-tion of the seats now vacant through the disfranchisement of the Boroughs of Beverley, Bridgewater, Cashel, and Sligo."—(Mr. James Lowther.)

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING seconded the Motion, and complained that Ireland, possessing as it did so small a share in the representation of the United Kingdom, should have been so long deprived of two of its seats. He did not mean to suggest that Sligo and Cashel had been improperly disfranchised; but as the county of Cork had more than 16,000 electors and only two representatives, he thought Queenstown, which was a place of great commercial importance, was entitled to one of the vacant seats.

MR. GLADSTONE*: There are two questions which arise in connection with this matter. First, whether an attempt ought to be made at this particular juncture of affairs by Parliament to dispose of certain vacant seats; and, secondly, whether such a proposal ought to be carried out by means of the Bill now before the House. As regards the first of these questions, I think the hon. Member (Mr. J. Lowther) has stated a proposition of greater breadth than it is easy to sustain. It is quite true that, in 1861, Parliament proceeded to dispose of the then vacant seats; but it is far from true that there was then any expectation of dealing with the subject of Reform. On the contrary, when the Bill of 1860 was dropped, it was under circumstances which rendered it doubtful whether it would be revived at an early date. When Parliament met in April, 1861, not only was it expressly announced that the Government had no intention of introducing a Bill on that subject, but there was no disposition on the part of any party in that House to press them to do it. It was under these circumstances that, in 1861, certain seats were disposed of. But in 1862, when the Government of the day made a proposal to dispose of the seats then vacant, the House determined, by a large majority, that the proposal was not of an urgent character, and might very well wait until a more fitting time arrived for it to be carried into effect. The hon. Member states with truth that the disfranchisement of two seats in Ireland tells more sensibly on the representation of that country than it does upon that of England. But he appears to have misunderstood the reply which the noble Lord the Chief Secretary gave the other night to a Question which had been put to him in reference to the intentions of the Government as to bringing in a Bill for dealing with these seats. The noble Lord on that occasion said it was not the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill dealing with these seats separately, but rather one to effect a general redistribution of the Irish seats, under which these seats also would be dealt with. It was upon this ground, therefore, that the noble Lord declined to pledge himself to introduce a measure dealing with these seats alone, and by so doing he by no means intended to convey that the Government regarded the matter as insignificant, or that it would bear indefinite postponement. I frankly admit that the re-distribution of seats in Ireland is recommended by many considerations of great public importance. The main point is, whether the Bill now before the House offers so manifestly proper and convenient an occasion for dealing with that matter, that an Instruction ought to be given by the House to the Committee for the purpose of enabling and requiring them to deal with the subject. The hon. Gentleman expressed some surprise that I have been in the habit, as he says, of calling this Bill "a Secret Voting Bill." It is a Bill of which that certainly is not a very adequate description. Its title is a long one, relating to the procedure at Parliamentary and municipal elections. I adopted the phrase for shortness, and if I did not adopt a still shorter one and call it "the Ballot Bill," I am aware of no better reason than that I recently perceived a Parliamentary usage of speaking of a secret Ballot, and not of a Ballot simply, and I assure the hon. Gentleman that the use of the words he has mentioned was accidental on my part. I contend that this is not a convenient or suitable occasion for attempting to deal with this case. With regard to filling up these seats, although the case is very different from Ireland, and partly because it is different from Ireland, I am aware of no urgent reason why the House should at present deal with the subject at all; but to deal with it in connection with the present Bill is, I think, a proposal recommended by no one circumstance of propriety. The matters connected with the constitution of this House branch out into several parts. There is the great question of the franchise. Many of us may think that great question may advantageously receive, at an early period, further attention. There is the question of the distribution of seats. There is the question of the boundaries of boroughs. These are all very large questions, and perhaps hardly any of them have been settled entirely to the satisfaction of the whole House. Then, why are we to force this particular subject into the present Bill? Is it because we have arrived at the 22nd of June? Does the hon. Gentleman think that we should really have such a superfluity of time on our hands when we have disposed of the matter that is in this Bill that in order to fill up our vacant hours it is either expedient or necessary that we should proceed to introduce into this Bill other very important and interesting questions relating to the constitution of Parliament, but which do not specially relate to the subject of this Bill? Our reason is very plain: it is that the hands of Parliament are too full, and the time of Parliament is too limited. If we force this subject into the Bill, we may force into it a number of other subjects, which have as good a claim as this; and upon the practical consideration that Parliament has already as much as we can fairly expect to do, to get through, in a manner becoming the dignity of this House, the proposals that are already before it for consideration, we decidedly object to the needless multiplication of subjects therein.

Mr. J. Lowther

COLONEL FRENCH complained that Ireland had not been so well treated by either side of the House with regard to this matter. At the same time, he did not think it expedient to take up the time of the House with the subject at present. He protested against the course adopted by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Downing), who represented a county that had four-fifths as many Members as the province of Connaught.

MR. DISRAELI: The object of the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther) is a legitimate one, for it is not proper that vacant seats in this House should be left unfilled, and that representation should remain incomplete. It is one of our first duties to complete the representation of this House, and I think that our legislation will not be satisfactory to the country if we get into a chronic habit of allowing the representation of the country to be incomplete. But, at the same time, I think the hon. Gentleman will, on reflection, see that it is very difficult to effect his object by connecting it with the present Bill. Because the Bill really relates to proceedings at Parliamentary and municipal elections, and that limit is an obstacle to the course he recommends. At the same time, I must say that I listened to the speech of the Prime Minister with considerable apprehension. It seems that the right hon. Gentleman is determined that this country shall never have rest or tranquillity. I should have thought that the experience of this Session, which began with so much ambition, has proceeded with so much discomfiture, and will probably end with disaster, if not with disgrace, would have induced the right hon. Gentleman to have been a little more reserved in his projects and plans of legislation. Considering the great subject which he has unsuccessfully attempted, and looking to the important matters that he still has on hand, it was hardly discreet to announce to the people of this country that they must prepare for the question of the franchise and the distribution of seats being again discussed and again settled. If those expressions on the part of the right hon. Gentleman are to afford a sort of dram to the flagging energies of the Liberal party, I am not sure that they will produce the effect that was perhaps contemplated. I would observe to the Liberal party, here and elsewhere, that dram-drinking is a very dangerous practice, and it sometimes occurs that when a violent stimulant is taken, the result is only a condition of increased depression. I do not believe that the country generally will receive this intimation on the part of the Prime Minister of England with any satisfaction. I believe that there is throughout this country a conviction that the question of Parliamentary Reform, as regards both the franchise and the distribution of seats, was largely considered and largely dealt with; and that there is a general indisposition that we should again, or at least for a considerable time, apply our energies to the discussion of these subjects. However, after the intimation that has been given, we must be prepared, of course, for all conjunctures and events. I had hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would have felt, after the experience of this Session, that it should rather be the object of a wise Minister to tranquillize the public mind. He has contrived, in the exuberance of his energy, to array almost every class in the country against the Government—to make a very considerable portion of the people feel alarmed lest they were about in turn to be attacked. And now, when we are approaching the termination of our labours, that we should be authoritatively informed that the highest questions concerning the distribution of power in this country are probably again and speedily to be submitted to our consideration, is, I think, a course greatly to be deprecated; and greatly deprecated especially at a period of the history of the world when questions concerning the re-distribution of power and the form of Government are so very rife, and when, as I should have certainly thought, a wise Minister would have felt it rather his duty to rally round him those feelings in the country that look with respect upon institutions which, though they may be old, have at least provided that, at a moment of trial and exigency, this country, compared with the condition of others, need not be ashamed.

MR. GLADSTONE: I rise to explain that I entirely disclaim the statements and the announcements which the right hon. Gentleman has made.

MR. MACFIE said, he hoped that the hon. Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther) would be satisfied with the statement that had been made from the Treasury bench. It had long been felt in Scotland that the representation of the country was inadequate; and he held that a re-arrangement of seats was necessary in the interests of Scotland and of the kingdom at large.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman if my right hon. Friend did not correctly interpret the arguments he brought forward against the proposal of the hon. Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther) what was the meaning of his speech? The right hon. Gentleman unquestionably argued that the Motion of my hon. Friend ought not to be proceeded with now because there were three great subjects connected with the representation which were likely to be raised for discussion.

These three subjects were—the franchise, distribution of seats, and the re-arrangement of the boundaries of boroughs. If the right hon. Gentleman now tells us that he meant nothing by his statement, his argument against the proposal of my hon. Friend falls to the ground. If, on the other hand, he was intimating that he seriously contemplated further legislation on these three important and grave questions, then, of course, the argument of the right hon. Gentleman stands on a very different footing. Unless we hear that the right hon. Gentleman has abandoned or never entertained those schemes of further reform, I must say that the statement we have just heard demands more explanation.

SIR FREDERICK W. HEYGATE said, he would much rather rest satisfied with the present state of the question of the distribution of seats than re-open it; but whenever the seats were re-distributed, he hoped the undoubted claims of Ulster to further representation would not be overlooked.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I think the short debate we have already had on the Motion of the hon. Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther) is a pretty strong proof that if we were to yield to his wish and adopt his Instruction, there would be very little chance of our arriving at a decision with regard to the real objects of this Bill in the present Session. We see clearly that anything which affects a re-distribution of seats brings up Members from all sides of the House to advocate, as might be expected, the special interests of their constituents, and also brings up the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire and the noble Lord opposite to speak upon great and important constitutional questions. I think that what has passed must convince the hon. Gentleman that to deal with the subject of his Motion would prevent a fair consideration of the Ballot question by Parliament this year. With regard to the observations of the noble Lord opposite, I wish to remind him that my right hon. Friend did not state that there was any desire on his part to bring all the questions mentioned by the noble Lord before the House; he simply stated that if the Instructions of the hon. Gentleman were adopted it would be quite competent for any Member to bring up any one of those questions.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I venture to say that in the speech of the Prime Minister there was no allusion to what propositions other people might bring forward. The right hon. Gentleman stated that he proposed soon to bring before the House the three subjects mentioned by my noble Friend. [MR. GLADSTONE: I beg pardon; I said nothing of the kind.] Whether the right hon. Gentleman intended to say so it is not for me to determine, but whether he did say so is quite another thing; and in proof that, at least, he was supposed to do so, I need only refer to the shudder which he caused among hon. Gentlemen on his own side of the House.

MR. CONOLLY observed, that whenever they put forward the claims of Ireland to just representation they were told that it was the wrong time; and therefore he hoped the hon. Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther) would press his Motion to a division. He could not understand why the supplying of the deficiencies in the representation of the people of Ireland should be postponed to that indefinite period at which a new Reform measure was to be introduced.

MR. SYNAN stated that when the Reform Bill was passing through Parliament, the question of re-distribution in Ireland was not dealt with in consequence of the state of that country at the time. He thought that this was also an inopportune time to consider it, and therefore he could not support the Motion. Still he could not vote against it, because that would be tantamount to saying that there ought not to be a re-distribution of seats. He should, therefore, abstain from voting.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 145; Noes 254: Majority 109.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in rising to move, That this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee, said, the Bill contained so many provisions to regulate the procedure at elections, both Parliamentary and municipal, some of which were good, some indifferent, and some altogether bad, that it was, perhaps, puzzling in the first instance, to know how to meet such a Bill; but, on second consideration, he came to the conclusion that he ought not to ask how many of its smaller provisions were good, bad, or indifferent, and that it would be better to avoid dealing with minor points, and to discuss its vital principle contained in that part of the Bill, the striking out of which in Committee would be fatal to the Bill itself—namely, whether or not secret voting should for the first time be introduced into that country. He did not desire to deal with the Bill in any party spirit; he cordially concurred in the hope which the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council had expressed at the close of his remarks on introducing it, that party feeling would not enter into the discussion. So far as his side of the House was concerned, that hope would be realized, and he trusted that hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House would treat the measure in an equally impartial manner, and that if the Bill was to be considered independently of party on the one side of the House, it would also be considered independently of party on the other side—that they would deal with it, in fact, as their consciences directed, and not vote for it simply because it had been submitted to the House by the Prime Minister. The question was really and truly one of very grave importance, quite independent of party. Some hon. Members with whom he had had the pleasure of speaking, treated the question first of all on the ground of how it was to affect their own seats. That might be a very important question to hon. Members themselves, though not so vital to the country at large. Some treated the question before the House as one merely whether the one party or the other would gain—a very important question for party purposes, though, perhaps, not so vital to the country at large after all. The grave question before them was—how could the House best secure, consistent with the full representation of the people, the best constitution of the House of Commons, ensuring to the voter the giving of his vote freely and purely, and free from temptation; and, at the same time, ensuring to the country that the voter should give his vote according to the dictates of his conscience, and for the benefit of the country? He also agreed with one or two observations which fell from the right hon. Gentleman—that they might rely on the people because they had faith in the instincts of the people. But in legislating on that subject, they had to take care that they did not lose sight of the general good for the purpose of remedying one or two particular evils which it was difficult to lay their finger upon. He was willing to abide by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman—that they could trust freely to the instincts of the people. No man was more willing than he to keep the people in the exercise of their vote free from illegitimate influences which might affect their vote, to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred—the illegitimate influences of the priest or landlord, or employer—and it was his desire to secure for the voter the full force of all those legitimate influences to which the right hon. Gentleman had also referred, arising from the education, the character, and the tone of those with whom he lived, and likewise to assure to him the privilege of knowing how all those persons whom the voter looked upon as worthy of his respect and admiration, voted on the questions involved in any Parliamentary contest. It was at the same time his earnest desire to protect voters from the illegitimate influences to which the right hon. Gentleman had not referred—first, that of mob orators, who were in the habit of travelling through the country making statements easy enough to refute at the proper time, but difficult enough, or even impossible to refute when used to a mob by men who did their best to create false impressions and to distort facts; and, secondly, it was also his desire to protect them from another illegitimate influence, one equally dangerous, though of a different character—and that was exercising that which was simply for the common good for the promotion of a private end, which was frequently contrary to the best interests of a nation. Let hon. Members consider, on the very threshold of the question, what was the nature of the franchise which had been given to so many of their fellow-subjects. It used in former times to be argued by Lord Palmerston, and those who had made this question their study, that the vote was a trust exercised by the voter for the good of the country at large; but he found of late years it had been said that that was an exploded doctrine. In recording his change of opinion on that subject, the Prime Minister had said—

"In substance, the change which has been made in the constitution of our Parliamentary system within the last few years is the basis of the change which will be made in my conduct with regard to secret voting."—(3 Hansard, col. 1039.)

That, if it meant anything, meant that because they had enlarged the franchise the voter was no longer a trustee for his fellow-subjects. But the right hon. Gentleman, as, he was sorry to say, was occasionally his practice, had argued upon false premises. Surely the voter was at all events a trustee for the remaining members of his family, for the women and children, and for the unenfranchised and disfranchised throughout the country. The voter exercised his vote as a trustee for the nation, not of his own free will for his own private benefit and advantage, but actually and practically for the nation at large. On what other ground did they deprive him of his vote in case of his using it corruptly; on what other principle did they disfranchise the freemen in Dublin, or deprive other boroughs of their share in the representation of the country? And if, as it was said before, when the franchise was less extended, property was a trustee for numbers, they now had a perfect right to say that numbers holding votes as they did, were to be regarded as trustees for the property of the country. But if the vote could not be regarded as a trust, at all events the exercise of it was to be regarded as a public duty, to be performed by the voter like all other public duties openly in the face of day, and subject to the criticism of enlightened opinion. There was no stronger motive which could influence the mind of any person who had any public duty to perform, be it a magistrate, be it a Judge, be it a clergyman, or a Member of that House, than to know that public opinion was at hand to see that he discharged his public duty honestly. That that was formerly the opinion of that House was evident, for in a Resolution passed in 1828, it was stated—"That the elective right is a franchise not in the nature of a possession, or of privilege, but of service for the public good."

The Prime Minister evidently to a certain extent was of the same opinion, for he further said—

"I should greatly prefer the public to the private discharge of every public function, and therefore I am not able to treat secret voting as an unmixed good. I look upon it as a choice of evils."—(Ibid. col. 1031.)

But surely it was evident by a comparison of the number of voters, with the number of inhabitants in some of our larger towns, that the vote was still a trust. Leeds, for instance, with a population of over 300,000 according to the Census of 1861, possessed only 37,000 voters; Liverpool, with 443,000 inhabitants, had only 39,000 voters; and Manchester, out of a population of 357,000 inhabitants, had only 48,000 voters. In accordance with these facts, he hoped that the House would come to the conclusion that he was right in those two propositions as to the nature of the franchise—first, that if it was a trust before the last Reform Bill, it was still as much a trust as it was then; and, secondly, that it was a public duty which it was for the interests of the country that the man holding the franchise should discharge in the face of day, in the face of the criticism of public opinion, and with all the forces acting upon him which acted upon every public functionary who had a public duty to perform. Prima facie, therefore, he maintained that the arguments were against the introduction of the change now proposed. And, moreover, that was practically admitted by the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council himself, because in introducing this Bill he said—

"I am quite aware that objections may be raised on both sides of the House upon the principle of it, as being contrary to their feeling that an election should be performed with publicity, and in concurrence with established English practice. That is, no doubt, a prima facie objection."—(Ibid. col. 844.)

Now, what were the arguments which the right hon. Gentleman used to overcome this prima facie objection? He argued that in the conduct of Parliamentary elections in various parts of the world experience was in favour of the Ballot. No doubt, it would be a very strong argument in favour of the proposal now made if the right hon. Gentleman could show the House that absolute secret voting had been established in many other countries subject to the same conditions as ours, and that in those countries it had answered and proved so advantageous that we should be warranted in following the example. Before the Committee, of which he (Mr. A. Cross) was a member, they had had a very large number of witnesses called for the purpose of giving them the benefit of their experience in other parts of the world. But they should remember that the question now under discussion was not the Ballot, but what the right hon. Gentleman himself had called "secret Ballot" or "secret voting," for if they lost sight of the distinction between the two, they would not reap that advantage from the evidence taken before the Committee which they otherwise might. Now what was the character of the Ballot established in those countries held up to us as an example for us to imitate. In France, the Ballot had been established for a long time, but there was no secret Ballot and no secret voting in France, and as was shown very fairly before the Committee by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea, voting in France was not, practically speaking, any less open than with us. But even if there had been, in the present unfortunate state of that country and in its previous condition under the Imperial rule, he could see no reason why we should look upon the state of things there as one worthy of example for this country. America had frequently in former days been instanced as a case where the Ballot had been successful. In latter years he was aware that that notion had been exploded, for there was now no more secret voting in America than there was in France. Nothing could be worse than the present system. In most of the States secret voting did formerly obtain, but State after State repudiated it, and in no single State of America did secret voting now exist. But even if America had secret voting, was she a country whose example we should wish to follow in the conduct of our elections? Personation was there extremely rife, and the frauds engendered by secret voting were so great, that it was not often that the return represented public opinion; the evidence adduced before the Committee upstairs went to show that the prevalent cry from North, East, West, and South, in the United States was—"Vote early, and vote often." He did not know that that was a practice they would like to follow, and he might observe in passing that the repudiation of the State Debt by the State of Mississippi would never, it was stated by a competent authority, have come to pass but for the facilities afforded by secret voting. The country, however, which was mainly relied on by the supporters of the Ballot—because France and America had been practically set aside—was Australia. It was pointed out that there, at all events, the system of absolute secret voting had answered; although in former times elections had been attended there by as much bribery and disgraceful conduct of every kind as had ever prevailed in England, at present nothing could be more orderly, pure, and satisfactory than the mode in which elections were carried on in that colony. He would, however, venture to remark that the whole condition of Australia was so entirely different from that of England, that no fair conclusion could be drawn from her case to influence the House in coming to a decision on the question under their consideration. First of all, as to the state of society both social and political:—In Australia, for instance, there were no old traditions of bribery. Mr. Fitzgerald stated that, although there might be individual cases of bribery, it was impossible that it could be carried on to any extent. Another witness had given evidence to a similar effect, and that being so, he would put it to the House how many Members were constantly unseated in this country after every General Election, while in Australia, before the introduction of the Ballot, Members were unseated very rarely, if at all. Under those circumstances, there being no old traditions of bribery—no Gatton, no Old Sarum—Australia could hardly be set up as an example. Again, as was clearly shown on unimpeachable testimony, there were in that colony no clearly defined political parties, and there was not, as a consequence, the same anxiety with respect to elections displayed by either candidates or voters. One witness distinctly stated that parties did not exist there in the same sense as in England, and that there was no such thing as Conservative and Liberal parties. His views upon that point were strongly corroborated by the Reports which the Governors of the Australian colonies sent home, and which had lately been laid on the Table. Sir James Fergusson said—

Mr. Assheton Cross

"I think that to the absence of any division of parties upon principle must be attributed a certain indifference to acquiring or to exercising the right of voting."

He added—

"I do not instance these facts as effects of the Ballot, but in illustration of the absence of partizan ardour, which must be noticed as at least an equal cause, with the Ballot of the quiet with which the elections are conducted."

Secondly, as regarded persons who became candidates:—The candidates—instead of being eager, as candidates were in this country, for their own purposes, to secure a seat in Parliament, and to obtain which they would spend almost any amount of money—were, according to the evidence which had been given by the hon. Member for Cambridge himself (Mr. R. Torrens), in a great measure composed of members of a squatting class, who did not care to waste their time in serving the public, preferring to increase their means, so that they might as soon as possible be enabled to come back to this country. Thirdly, there were the voters themselves, who were so well off that they were not open to be bribed in the same way as some of the lower classes here, who did not earn such high wages; there being, consequently, a great amount of independence among them, as was shown by the Reports of Mr. Du Cane, who said that—

"Owing to the general circumstances of the Colony, there was no reason to suspect the existence of any organized system of bribery or personation at elections; but that if party spirit ran high, and a wealthy candidate were determined to spend money corruptly, the system of absolute secrecy would not prevent his doing so, but would only tend to throw difficulty in the way of his subsequent detection."

And Viscount Canterbury, writing of the Colony of Victoria, said—

"The immunity which this Colony has hitherto enjoyed and enjoys from the offence of bribery is not attributable to secret voting, but to some other cause; nor is it difficult to discover a sufficient cause in the independent position, with comparatively few exceptions, of the voters."

On these three grounds it was clear that the whole condition of Australia was so totally different from their own in every circumstance and way, that whatever might be the experience of Australia, they could judge nothing, and draw no conclusion from it, which should influence them in coming to a decision on the matter now in dispute; and there were but two other countries to which the advocates of the Ballot had recourse in support of their views before the Committee. One of those was Italy, which was, comparatively speaking, a new country, where everybody had but the one wish—that of keeping the country one united Italy, and, consequently, there was an entire absence of party; and the other Greece, which was not seriously to be called into account in discussing the question. He thought, under those circumstances, that the example of foreign countries might altogether be dismissed from the consideration of that House, for it could hardly be contended that that example was such as to establish the superiority of secret over open voting. But the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council said that the only way in which the voter could be protected was by taking away the temptation to bribery, as would be done by means of the Ballot. He, however, would put that proposition in a different way, as it had been put in a remarkable paper published in 1852. It should, in his (Mr. A. Cross's) opinion, be shown first that it was necessary to have recourse to so severe a remedy; secondly, the right hon. Gentleman must go further, and show that if they had recourse to it, it would attain the object which he had in view; and then there was a third point, which was of equal importance, and that was, that the effect of the remedy should not be to produce more serious evils than those which existed in our Parliamentary system at the present moment. He was quite willing to admit, in the language of the Report of the Committee which had been made to the House, that there still existed, in some places to a great, and in others to a comparatively small extent, bribery, intimidation, treating, and corrupt practices. But whose fault, he would ask, was that? If any hon. Gentleman who had sat in that House for a long series of years would add up the amount of money which he had paid in the shape of election bills, could he say that he believed that it had been spent honestly and purely? If he would only say that he was determined, cost what it might, to spend no more, there would very soon be no question of the Ballot, and bribery would cease. At the same time, although he admitted that there was bribery, corruption, and treating to a certain extent, he asked the House to compare the present state of things with that which existed a century ago. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) might, perhaps, be aware that it was only about 100 years ago since the Corporation of that city sent word to their Members of Parliament, just before an election, promising to return them again provided they paid the debt of the corporation, amounting to £7,600. He would also remind the House that it was only 100 years since that occurred to which Lord Chesterfield alluded when writing about a seat he wished to secure to his son. He offered £2,500, but the people in the borough in question laughed in his face, and told him the price of boroughs had risen in consequence of the rich men who had come over from the East Indies, and that in some cases not over £5,000 would buy what might have been purchased for £2,000 a few years before. To the case of the Christian Club at Shorham he need hardly refer. All these facts showed that, bad as elections might be now to a certain extent, they were by no means as bad as they were in former times. In this respect, indeed, they had gone on steadily improving. He was old enough to recollect the great riots in the time of Henry Hunt—the threat to burn the houses of people in his own town, tar-barrels placed against the doors, and the threatened houses marked with a red cross. All this was altered now, and anyone who narrowly examined the history of their elections during the last 100 years would find that a steady advance had been made in the direction of purity and freedom of voting. The reason why their progress had not been more rapid was obvious. It was stated generally by Sir George Lewis, who said it was because the public refused to ratify the statute law, and the broad sense of the English nation could not be brought to stigmatize electoral corruption as an infamous crime; because in the society in which Members of Parliament lived, and moved, and had their being, the standard of morality regarded it as a venial offence; and because, in a word, the great and only tribunal whose sentence they feared, while theoretically frowning on the sin practically absolved the sinner. That was the true reason why their advance towards freedom and purity of election had not been more speedy. If further proof were wanted of the great advance actually made in that direction, he would call attention to the fact that after the General Election of 1852 some 76 Petitions were presented against the return of Members, and 36 Members were unseated; but after the Election of 1868, when the cry raised certainly roused the feelings of the people more than many other cries which had been raised in previous years, 73 Petitions were presented, and only 17 Members were unseated, notwithstanding the fact that the Petitions were scrutinized more carefully by the Judges than they were before by Select Committees of the House. But if they wanted to judge of the present state of electoral corruption in this country, he could refer the House with the greatest confidence to the opinion of gentlemen who, by education, were far more competent to form a correct opinion than most of them—he meant the Judges who tried the Election Petitions, and he believed that the general impression of the amount of bribery that existed was greatly exaggerated. Baron Martin said—

Mr. Ashton Cross

“I have formed a very decided opinion that the general impression with regard to bribery is exaggerated, judging from the cases I tried. . . . With the exception of three places, bribery did not exist to any great extent. . . . In a very great number of cases the charge was perfectly ridiculous.”

He was aware that hon. Gentlemen opposite complained of the increase, not of bribery in its grosser forms, but of intimidation. [“Hear, hear!”] Well, the same arguments and facts applied both to intimidation and bribery. Intimidation was less extensive and less common than it used to be. Baron Martin was asked—“Well, but did any cases of intimidation or undue influence come under your notice?” and his reply was—“Very few indeed, and I think they all failed.” Now, let them go a little further. If ever there was a man of calm judgment, who merely looked straight before him in the execution of his duty, that man was Mr. Justice Blackburn. The question asked him was—“Has any evidence of undue influence been submitted to you?” And his answer was—“Very little evidence of undue influence was submitted to me. There was only one case in which it was proved to my satisfaction. It was alleged in all the Petitions, but I think that in every case it broke down, the evidence being very contemptible. In fact, the cases of intimidation might be fairly said to be frivolous and vexatious—all of them.”

In the excitement of an election words were often used which, being misinterpreted and repeated from one person to another, led to charges of undue influence being preferred; but when such cases were sifted in Courts of Law they almost invariably broke down. This happened in the case of the West Norfolk Petition, tried by Mr. Justice Blackburn, who said that nothing could be larger than the amount of undue influence which was charged, but the petitioners, in his opinion, wholly failed to prove it. Hon. Gentlemen opposite urged that there was a kind of intimidation and undue influence which no law could touch, and which could not be brought into Courts of Justice. He would, however, remind the House, in the words of Mr. Justice Willes, that too great caution could not be observed in accepting the statements of voters who complained of undue influence, because it was often found that a servant was discarded or a tenant evicted totally irrespective of the way he voted, although he afterwards charged his master or landlord with having exercised undue influence. Among the witnesses examined by the Committee gentlemen from Wales and Scotland made the loudest complaints against landlords; but the latter always denied the allegations, and the Committee found it impossible to investigate each particular case, and for that reason discarded the use of such evidence altogether. He thought that bribery, treating, intimidation, and undue influence had, at any rate, greatly decreased; and for three reasons—first, because of the enlightened public opinion of the country; secondly, because of the spread of education. In Scotland there was as much excitement at elections as in this country, but within the memory of man scarcely a single Scotch election had been declared void on account of bribery. This, he believed, was due partly to the superior education of the Scotch people, and partly to the fact that the representation had been more changed from place to place than in England. When the seats in Scotland were re-distributed, the old places where bribery had prevailed were got rid of; but this was not the case in England. So far as the example of Scotland was concerned, he looked to the Act which the right hon. Gentleman carried last year as a much greater safeguard against bribery, corruption, and intimidation than this measure was likely to be. And the third matter which had been at work in reducing the bribery, &c., was the gradually growing independence of electors themselves. He believed that one good resulting from the last Reform Act which had not yet been perceived was that those who were not voters before, but who were voters now, were, to a great extent, men who promoted all the mischief at former elections; and as they were now intrusted with votes they would year by year become more independent and more willing to exercise the franchise as they ought to do, and to join the former voters in saying—"Come what may, we will exercise the franchise purely." The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council was wrong, then, in saying that secret Ballot was necessary for the putting down of corruption and intimidation; for the other influences that were at work would do much to diminish them before that Bill could have any practical effect. The right hon. Gentleman had next to show that the Ballot would effect his object—that he could not do. One provision which would do more than anything to put them down was not to be found in that Bill. The main reason why bribery went on as it did was that there was great chance that it would escape detection, because when an election was over it was the feeling of Englishmen to say—"We have had our fight; we have done all we could; we have lost the battle; we will shake hands, and we will not bring discredit on our town." What was wanted, therefore, was a public prosecutor. Could it be expected that that Ballot Bill would effect its object with the bribable populations of some of their old traditionally corrupt towns—with men as ready as the old traditional rich East India merchant to spend any amount of money to get into Parliament, so long as they did not spend it themselves? Other things would do it; public opinion, the independence of voters, the spread of education would do it; but that Bill would not do it, and to his mind, instead of being an advantage, it would be a great disadvantage in one respect. It might change the form of bribery, but it would not stop it. It might to a certain extent stop individual intimidation, individual bribery, and undue individual influence, but it would only cause bribery to take a different form. The judgments of the Judges on Election Petitions showed what form bribery had taken at different places in the country. The right hon. Gentleman must not think that his Ballot Bill would effect its object in the same way as the Act of last year affected the education of the country, for last year the right hon. Gentleman was dealing with innocent children, and now he was dealing with wicked men, and the right hon. Gentleman's heart was so full of natural goodness that he did not know how bad they were. If he thought the Ballot Bill would stop bribery he was quite wrong. He would not say who now-a-days represented that rich East India merchant of the past, but such a man would not bribe individuals, but would bribe generally. Having fixed upon the borough which he wished to represent, his first object would be to get an introduction and go down, and his second to make himself popular, and he could do that in various forms and ways. He could do it by nursing it in the way which was alleged against the hon. Member for Beverley; he might become the chairman of a great ship-building company; or he might start a manufacture, and become an employer of local labour; but he would not do one or the other for the sake of the pecuniary benefit he was to receive. He had one purpose in his mind which he was determined to carry out, and that to become Member of Parliament for the borough. So he would go down there, spend his money there, and make himself popular; and what was that but bribery, and bribery almost in the grossest form? Then, take general breakfasts, such as were given at Hereford; the opening of publichouses and the employment of watchers, as at Bewdley; and the lavish expenditure that took place at Bradford—what was all that but bribery? It might not come under the particular form, but it was the same fault, the same crime we wanted to put down; and what would the Ballot Bill do in these cases? Then, at Bridgewater, a large number of voters hung back and asked what was going; and the promise was given that the earliest voter as well as the last should be paid. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to have forgotten the main principle of his Education Bill—namely, "payment by results." That would be precisely what would be paid for under the proposed Bill. Men would cease to follow what was called "the stupid form of bribery," and, instead of giving £10 to secure a man's vote, they would offer money to secure vote and interest, and would not pay if they did not get in. That was the form of bribery which that Bill would suggest, and would not stop. The one thing of all others that would stop bribery, corruption, and intimidation was the certainty of being found out; and that Bill would take away that only engine of detection by allowing men to vote in secret. He did not say they could not trace bribery in the same way they did now; but the trials of Election Petitions showed that the first question counsel asked of witnesses was—"For whom did you vote?" The answer to that question at once set them on the track of the bribery. Voting was practically only the last of a long series of acts. The political inclinations of a man were known, and if, at the end of the election, it was found out that he had not voted as his fellow-workmen expected he would, that showed that he had probably been bribed, and it at once set you on the track of the bribery. If this safeguard were to be removed; if the only way in which it could be found out whether a man had been bribed or not was to trace the money from hand to hand were taken away, they would never be able to detect bribery. It was not shown that the Bill was necessary, and it was not shown that it would effect the object in view, and unless these things could be shown there was no justification for altering the law. He said nothing of forms of bribery which could never be detected at all, such as abstention from voting and the spoiling of a polling paper. Then, how was spiritual intimidation to be touched? It was all very well to say there was none, but he would show that there was spiritual intimidation, and that the strongest that could be used. Mr. Justice Willes said if you asked a child whether he would be whipped or see a ghost, the ghost would frighten him more than the whipping; and if a priest said to a man going to the poll, as was said at Drogheda—"You may vote for anybody you like, but if you vote for So-and-So, I would advise you when you go home to think of what will become of your soul." That was a form of spiritual intimidation that would have more effect upon a man than almost any other undue influence you could bring to bear. Well, but that was a species of intimidation which the Ballot could never affect. They had not, then, shown that the Ballot was necessary, or that if they carried their Bill it would affect their object. He wished now to show that it would introduce infinitely worse evils than any which existed under the present system. The right hon. Gentleman in introducing the Bill felt that that was a difficulty which he undoubtedly had to get over, and he said that there were three evils likely to occur, but when the House read the provisions of the Bill it would find that it contained ample securities against those evils. The first evil was that of tampering with the votes. He would not go at length into that subject, but he would like the House to consider whether there were not ample facilities in the Bill for fraud on the part of the presiding officer; and if there was one thing more than another which ought to be guarded against, it was that there should be in a constituency a general impression of foul play on the part of the returning officer. Take the case of such an election as had occurred in his own town of Warrington, where an accusation was brought against the Mayor of foul play. When the case came to be investigated by the Judges the whole charge fell through, and the Mayor was fully acquitted. But the very fact of allegation of foul play disturbed the town for years, and he doubted whether even now the ill-feeling generated, untrue as the charge turned out to be, had entirely passed away. But it was not only the returning officer himself that would be thus open to suspicion. He had to appoint deputies at the different stations, and all of these would be equally liable to be suspected. The returning officer had to decide on the validity of the Ballot paper, and had to deal out temporary voting papers to men not on the register—a most dangerous power. All he would say was, that there was ample opportunity, despite of all provisions to the contrary, for non-voters to get those Ballot papers to put into the box, and therefore an opening to the second of the evils so much dreaded—that of forged voting papers being used, a practice, which under the provisions of secret voting, they would find it impossible to identify or prevent. As to the third evil—that of personation, they all knew that in America it was carried on by wholesale, and he believed if the Bill were passed personation would be carried on here to a great extent. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to meet this difficulty by providing that if the agent of any candidate induced a man to personate a voter, the election should be void. That might be very good in its way, but the right hon. Gentleman, having acknowledged the danger, absolutely took away by the system of voting he proposed, the means of finding the personator out. Putting aside, however, all these mere fringes of the question, bad as they were, and serious as they would be found, there was a more serious evil still. The votes would be given in a more irrational way, not thoughtfully, not in many cases truthfully, certainly not under the influence of public opinion, nor the sense of deep responsibility. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman what effect the Ballot would be likely to have in that unhappy country, Ireland? Was it likely to improve the representation of Ireland? When the men of Westmeath knew that they could give their votes not under the influence of any public opinion, but simply at their own will, was it likely that the representation of that part of the country would be improved? There was another great evil which had not been yet alluded to, and which had been seriously felt in Australia; it was this—that in the different boroughs they would, to a great extent, get rid of party spirit at elections. Some hon. Members opposite thought that would be a benefit, but he believed men would then vote according to some particular crotchet or fancy, and that they would not be controlled by the leaders of parties, but would let some private matter in which they felt an interest override great public questions. Take the case of the Sunday Closing Bill, or of the Conventual and Monastic Inquiry, or of the Permissive Bill, when an election occurred very probably persons who took an interest in these questions would not allow them to be made subordinate to general public questions. The result would be, as had been seriously felt at the last election, especially on the Liberal side, that there would be a large number of candidates offering themselves in different towns with no great difference of opinion on general questions, but influenced by some local advantage which they thought they might obtain. What would be the effect on that House? That House would reflect the feeling out-of-doors, and the same broad party distinctions would not be kept up anything like so clearly as at the present time. What was the case in Australia? A witness before the Committee was asked—

“Do I understand that now the elections are not divided into two parties as they used to be?” His answer was—

“Not exactly. I would rather divide parties in Australia under the universal suffrage into Ins and Outs, for generally the people in office try to hold it, and all who are not in office try to put them out, and the result is a change of Ministers, probably every seven months.”

Again, this question was put—

“Could parties range themselves under distinct colours as they do here, denoting any particular shade of opinion?”

The answer was—

“Yes, but they are constantly changing banners. The man who has been turned out of office on a particular measure will immediately take up that measure when he comes in and carry it.”

That was the result of not having Parliament divided into two strong political parties. He regretted that House was not divided into two great parties now as strongly as it used to be; and as it was not only a Legislative Assembly, but also possessed supreme control over the Executive Government, it was essential that the machine for the purpose should be kept in proper working order, and, in his opinion, that without party government Parliamentary government was in this country impossible. They were asked to pass that Bill on the recommendation of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, who was himself a recent convert to its principles. But it was not usual, in such cases, to follow the advice of converts. They did not go to a man who had recently changed his opinion in religion to ascertain whether it would be wise to follow his example, nor would they ask a recent convert to testotalism for an impartial statement of the merits of that controversy. He was very much obliged to the House for the patience with which they had listened to him. He would ask them once more to remember the words that the right hon. Gentleman had used in reference to the Bill—that it was a choice of evils. That was all—it was not a positive good, but only a choice of evils. In choosing what course they would take, he besought them to consider the question irrespective of party considerations. They were asked to take their choice of evils. There were evils on the one side and evils on the other. But the evils on the one side they had already fathomed to the bottom—the evils of bribery, corruption, and intimidation—and deep, and dark, and stormy, and troublous as they had found these waters, they had happily been enabled by the breeze of an enlightened public opinion to reach, at all events, somewhat shallower and smoother water. There might still be some rocks and shoals to encounter; but looking at the vantage ground that they had gained, they might say that they were at all events in sight of land, and that the Education Act of last Session would help them on their way to the haven of pure elections which they were seeking to find. But the evils on the other hand were unknown. No examples had been brought before them to show that they could safely apply to our institutions and habits the remedy that was now suggested. They were asked to embark on an untravelled ocean, and to throw away what he believed to be the only compass which could possibly guide them safely through the storm—he meant the public responsibility of every voter voting for the public good, under the public eye, and guided by the wholesome and legitimate influences of public opinion. He begged to move, That this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee.

MR. RIDLEY: There are many Members, I daresay, in this House, Sir, who were as much astonished as I was when they heard the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council say, on introducing this Bill to the House, that it was not necessary to discuss the principle of its Ballot clauses, because upon that this House had already declared. I should be very glad if the right hon. Gentleman would tell us when that happened. He told us, however, what the essential principle of his enactment was when he stated that he intended to establish complete and absolute secrecy in which there should be no means whatever of tracing any vote. Now, is there any hon. Gentleman in this House who will assert that this is what this House assented to when it accepted last year, without a division, the second reading of the Bill of the hon. Member for Huddersfield? And will the right hon. Gentleman himself say that there is not a most vital difference between the possibly open Ballot of the hon. Member for Huddersfield and the secret Ballot which, existing in no other great nation, he now proposes for the first time for the acceptance of this House and of the country? Sir, I rejoice, with my hon. Friend who proposed this Amendment, that the Government propositions intrusted to the right hon. Gentleman are such as to bring before us the plain question of openness or secrecy. The issue need not be encumbered with arguments drawn from the convenience of taking votes by ticket, or from the orderly character of elections so conducted, but we are called upon to say Aye or No to this: Is it desirable that every voter should be compelled to give a vote which, except from any statement of his own, shall be, under all circumstances, absolutely secret? Sir, it is because I believe that the answer to this question should, for the sake of the honour and the interests of the country, be most emphatically No, that I ask the indulgence of the House while I give a few of the reasons which induce me to second the Amendment of my hon. Friend. The only reasons, Sir, which the right hon. Gentleman adduced, on proposing this Bill, for the principle of the secret Ballot, were, in the main, twofold. He said, in the first place, that the best way to prevent a crime is to stop the motives for that crime, and he conceived that the Ballot was by far the most likely mode of removing from men the temptation either to bribe or to intimidate. In the premises, Sir, of the right hon. Gentleman I most readily concur, it being, undoubtedly, the first principle of all good government to remove, so far as legislation can do it, the motives for crime. But I confess I am at a loss to perceive how, by removing the temptation of which the right hon. Gentleman speaks, you thereby remove the motives for crime. The right hon. Gentleman has, as it humbly seems to me, supposed the real motives for these crimes to lie in the imagined special facility for committing them offered by the present system of open voting. The hon. Member for Huddersfield made last year the same confusion between motives and opportunities for crime; but I will take leave to maintain that the motive which it is hoped by this secrecy to remove lies far deeper than those who use this argument seem to fancy. The hon. Member for Huddersfield argued last year that "wherever one man has power over another, that power he will use in times of public excitement." Now, without going so far as the hon. Member, I think that it is beyond dispute that there will always be men who, having such a power, will be anxious to abuse it; but you cannot deprive these men of their power, and you cannot seriously thwart their exercise of it by any machinery of wooden or glass boxes. You may diminish—and I will grant that—the facilities for the less guilty, the unpremeditated form of crime—that form, in fact, which will most readily succumb to improved moral feeling and public sentiment; but the more serious form of it will continue to brave the law with the additional security afforded by the reduced means of detection and the diminished watchfulness of public opinion. The other argument, Sir, used by the right hon. Gentleman was that the State has no right to impose on a man the duty of voting, and then not to protect him in the exercise of that vote. Well, Sir, everyone will admit that the law should protect the voter. But how does the Ballot do so? Supposing it to secure absolute secrecy, what protection is that in the case, as we are bound to imagine, of a man wishing to vote in opposition to the will of someone who has power over him? Why, it enables him to lie without detection. That is to say, the State admits its inability to protect against oppression: it confesses its impotence and abdicates its proper functions, and while it pays this tribute to intolerance, which involves the forfeiture of our right to be called a free and law-abiding people, it allows, nay it must from the nature of the case force the voter to acquiesce in the abandonment of his own right of publicity. Sir, if freedom of opinion be a right, freedom of expression is no less so; and to impose secrecy, which you do by this Bill, is as much treason against the liberties of the citizen, as it is treason against the State to intimidate him in the exercise of his franchise. This leads me, Sir, to observe an argument which has been much relied on by opponents of the Ballot, and which has been urged with great force to-night by my hon. Friend beside me, that the elector, as representing non-electors, should perform his trust openly before the public, and so be amenable to the class for whom he exercises that trust. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister used to believe in that argument; but he now thinks that we have so extended the electoral system as to have established practically a personal manhood franchise, so that that responsibility no longer exists. Now, it is quite evident that until you have absolute universal suffrage, with no restriction of sex, the argument, if it ever was a good one, is a good one still. But, in the extended constituencies, it is at least, I think, more clearly seen that the franchise can only, strictly speaking, be a trust, in so far as it involves the duty that a man should vote according to his convictions. He is bound to do that, and so long as bribery and coercion are illegal, you protect him by the law in so voting; but the ultimate test of his honesty can only be his own conscience, and not the public. So far, therefore, as regards this trust argument, I, for one, am not willing to rely upon it as a bar to the proposition now before us. But, now, what is this system of voting expected to accomplish? It is, in the first place, expected to make bribery so difficult and uncertain as to be not worth trying. With regard to what is called "afternoon" bribery I shall say nothing, because it is admitted that that can be stopped by other means; but, in respect of systematic bribery, the hon. Member for Huddersfield argued last year that the evidence showed that people would not go on paying for what they would not be certain to get. Sir, I have gone carefully through the evidence taken with that view before the Committee; but I find no facts to bear this out. I find, indeed, opinions going both ways, and amongst others I find that of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea, who is as conversant as most men with the working of various electoral systems, and who thinks that the contingent form of bribery, which would under the Ballot be the only form possible, would increase, and would be the most successful as it is in theory the best form of corruption. It is quite true that the hon. Baronet's evidence was coloured on this point by his dislike to small constituencies, where such bribery would have most effect; but it is to be remembered, on the other hand, that in the large constituencies their very size tends to make bribery almost impossible, and it is the small boroughs, if we are to maintain them at all, which are supposed to render necessary this extraordinary means of enforcing purity upon a corrupt population. The hon. Member for Huddersfield, Sir, is very fond of quoting to us the example of other countries which have used the Ballot—and he has, I have no doubt, studied history to support his view. I am the more surprised, therefore, that on this point he should have failed to remember that in republican Rome, where alone of all free governments that ever existed, is there to be found any parallel to the venality and corruption which the hon. Gentleman and his Friends represent to exist here, there was a well organized system of contingent payment. In the election of magistrates there was a rigid Ballot as strict as that proposed now by the Government, and, let me add, almost identical with it; but the hon. Gentleman will find, in looking back to the pages of his Cicero, that not only did agents look after particular voters, but a wholesale system existed of paying money contingent on success to large bodies of electors. Is human nature different now from what it was then? Is there, so far as bribes are concerned, less honour among thieves?—and are there not agents now equal to the task achieved then? Sir, I cannot see how bribery of this sort—the sort, remember, which we want particularly to undermine—is to be put down by secret voting; while it must not be forgotten, on the other hand, that under such a system, you give the bribee a direct interest in the success of his corrupter; you make him a canvasser for the benefit of his own pocket, and it is his interest to see that no interloper obtains money under false pretences. Then again, even should you succeed in stopping bribery of voters, you let loose money to bribe officials: and it certainly does not lie in the mouth of those Gentlemen who advocate the Ballot to deny the possibility of this happening, for the very groundwork of their argument is the existence of widespread venality and corruption. It is confessed, indeed, on all hands, that under the ballot you must have confidence in officials; but will more honesty be practised where detection of fraud is impossible, and what sort of confidence will be felt by the more violent portion of a constituency after their favourite candidate has been defeated? Those candidates themselves are, as we all know, not too ready to admit that they have been beaten on their own demerits, and is it to be supposed that in the absence of public guarantees large masses of disappointed men, in a country where political feeling runs so high as it does here, will readily acquiesce in the fairness of their defeat? Sir, it is not in the nature of things that they should do so even in this country; but what is to be expected of Ireland where the inhabitants, whatever be their virtues, certainly do not repose much confidence in Government officials? And can that be said to be a desirable reform in the existing state of our relations with that country which would in any degree weaken the guarantees which a disaffected portion of the community are still compelled to place in the constituted authorities? Well, but the Ballot is to stop coercion and intimidation, and I suppose this is generally allowed to be the strongest part of the case in its favour. Now, how is it likely to prevent mob intimidation, and how will such scenes as take place in their perfection in Ireland, and signalized for example the return of the junior Member for Waterford, be checked by enabling a man to conceal his vote? Why, all parties are known and recognized, men's opinions are no secret in the district, and they are mobbed and prevented from voting: and, on the other hand, if a man have voted and refuse to say how he has given his vote, that very refusal is sufficient to condemn him in the eyes of an intolerant and hasty mob. Then, as to landlords and employers of labour, the hon. Member for Huddersfield endeavoured to make a great deal out of the now historical Timpendean case; but I should like to know, taking that as a typical case, how he can show that Mr. Scott's vote would in any way have been protected by the Ballot. It is very much the fashion, Sir, for certain persons to be continually misrepresenting tenant-farmers as much as they misrepresent landlords. There is no independence they say on one side, and no liberality of dealing on the other. In the case, for example, of that strange attempt at legislation introduced by the hon. Member for the Wick Burghs, they would have us believe that the majority of tenant-farmers are unable to enter into a contract at all, and now in the matter of Parliamentary elections, I suppose we are to believe that men of the position of Mr. Scott are likely to spend their lives in one continual state of reticence as regards political matters; that they will go to no farmers' clubs, no chambers of agriculture, no market ordinaries—no place, in fact, where farmers are now in the habit of openly discussing matters of vital interest to themselves and their landlords; or, that if they do so, they will talk only in the interests of their landlords, whilst entertaining different ideas altogether. Sir, it is idle to suppose anything of the kind: but what earthly protection in these cases is compulsory secrecy of voting if it do not carry out the still further tyranny of compelling a man in this hitherto free country to conceal his political opinions from his neighbours? and if he do not so conceal them, how can anything but public opinion prevent a landlord from dealing hardly with a tenant because they do not agree in politics? Sir, I should be sorry, indeed, to think, representing, as I do, a large agricultural constituency, that there were any landlords in it who, to put it on the very lowest ground, would be so ill-judged as to act in this way; and I should be as sorry to think that there was any tenant in it, who having a cause, real or fancied, to complain of unfair influence on the part of his landlord, would wish so to lower himself as to seek protection—by what? By a contrivance which is to enable him, indeed, to perform the duty of a citizen at election time; but which can only be of permanent use to him if it be supplemented by a life of reticence at all events, if not of hypocrisy. Well, but I am told, Sir, that there are thousands of voters who abstain from forming an opinion, because they are never likely to be able to vote freely, and that secret voting will encourage them to form such an opinion. This, I believe, was the reason given by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary for his change of view on this question. But if this argument be worth anything, it goes against giving the franchise to a class of men who, by your hypothesis, have nothing worth calling a conviction. Sir, I maintain that in using this argument in favour of secret voting, you are using the new electors whom you have created, as an excuse for lowering the tone of the older constituencies. You give the franchise to people who are, you say, politically uneducated, and then to enable them to form an opinion you drag down the rest of the voters to a confessedly lower level. But, Sir, the formation of opinion does not depend on the mode of taking votes; it depends on the spread of education, on the influence of the Press, and of the better educated and more thoughtful men in each class—on the open, healthy, and fearless manner in which political matters are discussed in this and in every free country. What is the worth of political opinion hatched in secret, and formed without any reference to the responsibility which even in private affairs every man owes to the society in which he lives? To compare smaller and greater things, it is like the crotchets which the philosophers who bristle round the hon. Member for Waterford, to his infinite annoyance but to the amusement of the House, are so often accused of forming in the recesses of their studies. But it is infinitely more mischievous, because it has a tendency to reduce the power of voting to a mere sense of privilege to be exercised on personal considerations, and must, therefore, infallibly lower the whole tone of political morality. Sir, I am sorry to say that tone is low enough already; but will anybody assert that it is not improving? Will anybody maintain that if Election Petitions had been inquired into by Judges at a similar period after the Reform Act of 1832, such evidence would have been possible from the Judges who tried them as was given before the Committee two years ago? I do not desire to attach too much weight to opinions formed judicially upon evidence produced in Court; but it is, at all events, upon record that Mr. Baron Martin, who tried 13 petitions, stated that though there was a good deal of treating, bribery was exaggerated, and that no cases of intimidation or undue influence came under his notice. Mr. Justice Willes, who tried 16 petitions, stated that there was undue influence at Blackburn and

Mr. Ridley

Westbury; but that such practices were not common. Mr. Justice Blackburn stated that the only case of intimidation that came before him was by a mob at Stafford. If, in answer to such evidence as this, it be urged that petitions are not easily originated, and when originated do not easily get at the truth, what can be said sufficiently strong in condemnation of a system of voting which shall make them more difficult to originate and less able to get at the truth? You have passed an Act which, in the opinion, at all events, of Mr. Baron Martin, has brought a wholesome fear of detection to bear on would-be breakers of the law, and now you are proposing by this Bill to make the obstacles to the efficiency of that Act greater than they are already. That certainly is not a method of improving morality, which, whatever be the exigencies of party, can be called statesmanlike or even prudent. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister has admitted that this Ballot is a choice of evils. He is, if I understand rightly what he said last year on the subject, as willing as anyone to allow that it is not only desirable but natural that every man should wish, were it possible, to vote openly. But he is in despair of this possibility, and he points to the growth of public opinion since the Reform Act of 1867 in favour of this measure. It might, Sir, possibly be argued that the increasing desire for some purity of legislation, even so violent as this, was in itself an evidence of its not being necessary; but I should wish to ask, in what does this growth of public opinion consist? Is it apparent in the more highly educated part of the Press? Certainly not; the reverse is more nearly the truth; and even among what are called the more popular papers there was one, at all events—that one, I think, with which travellers by rail are familiar as having “the largest circulation in the world”—which asserted the unimportance of the Ballot, except as being one of the Shibboleths of the Radical party. Then, is there any real growing adhesion to it among non-official Members of this House, even among those who, I regret to say, support this Bill because they think it may be of use to them, at all events temporarily, in their own districts? It is notorious that there is not; but that a vote of this House, which should really be a vote expressing its opinion, would reject this part of the Bill by a large majority. Then, as regards the Parliamentary history of the Ballot. Introduced by Mr. Grote after the Reform Act of 1832, it did not grow in the favour of Parliament even in his hands. From the memorable year 1848 up to 1861, Mr. Berkeley was beaten by majorities increasing from 5 to 125; and now, again, after the last Reform Act, when you get as before a large class of newly enfranchised electors, and more democratic demands clamouring to be satisfied, there comes from the same source a renewed cry for this remedy, and an intolerant desire, almost as bad as that expressed in the Bill of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, that the minority should protect itself at the expense of the majority. The time, Sir, has gone by when so much stress is laid, as there was formerly, upon the adoption of this system abroad. Without attaching too much importance to the fact that this absolutely inviolable secrecy exists nowhere except in New South Wales, it certainly cannot fairly be denied that the evidence given before the Committee was not of so encouraging a character to the supporters of the Ballot as they had expected it to be. But even if this mode of voting, so far as it is secret, be the cause of the more orderly manner in which elections are generally conducted abroad—which I am not prepared to admit, but is, on the contrary, as I believe, disproved by the evidence—I maintain that that is not of itself a sufficient reason for introducing it here. Let it be conceded that it has been, or is, regarded in Germany, Italy, or France as the bulwark of growing liberty against bureaucratic, priestly, or Imperial power, I will yet take leave to assert that we, who already assured of that liberty, have altogether a higher ideal of public life, which so far as purity of election is concerned is being more and more secured by the development of public sentiment still more strongly in that direction; whereas by this imposition you are, for the sake of the ignorant and underhanded, belying the national custom and the national conscience. It is for these reasons, Sir, and not because I will allow myself to be afraid of any individual or party disaster which some prophets assert may follow from the adoption of the Ballot, that I most cordially second the Amendment of my hon. Friend.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Cross,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

COLONEL EDWARDES said, if open voting could really be practised, he should prefer it to secret voting. But the evidence taken before the Select Committee showed that many voters could not really vote openly according to the dictates of conscience. The prevalent evils connected with the present system were bribery, intimidation, coercion, eviction of tenants, riot, and drunkenness. Now, he was not sanguine enough to suppose that the Bill before the House would at once sweep away every trace of bribery, but it would tend to check the practice, for a candidate would not like to part with his money until he was sure that he got value for it; and a voter who was ready to accept a bribe would not readily give his vote until he received the bribe. He regarded the clauses abolishing the nomination and declaration days as excellent clauses, for it was on those days that the greatest rioting and drunkenness prevailed, as evidenced at a recent election, where the candidates were pelted with stones, snowballs, and other missiles, and where the successful one had even to be escorted to his committee-room as a place of safety by the police. He also looked upon the clause prohibiting the use of publichouses for committee-rooms as a capital provision, because drunkenness was the cause of many of the riots. He gave to the Bill his most hearty support, and he trusted the Liberal party would unite in voting for it, and though there were many Amendments on the Paper, he hoped that in a short time they would fade away and disappear. Let hon. Members use their best endeavours to get the Bill passed this year, and thus take the first step to make their elections an example instead of a disgrace to civilized society.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he had not the honour of a seat in that House when the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland brought forward the Ballot Bill, and he now wished to trouble the House with a few observations in explanation of the course which he was about to take. He believed that both sides of the House would agree to this observation—that the Ballot now occupied a very different position from what it did when he first entered Parliament, and even five or six years ago. He remembered the time when it was brought forward in the Chartist days—when Mr. Feargus O'Connor presented a monster Petition in favour of the "Five Points," the Ballot being one of them; and much more recently, when Mr. Berkeley introduced his annual Ballot Bill, anyone who was supposed to vote for it, or who advocated it was supposed to hold the most democratic opinions. It was bound up in popular opinion with the most democratic ideas. That time had gone by, and the Ballot now might be fairly discussed on its own merits, and as was observed by the hon. Gentleman the Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. A. Cross), who had moved the Amendment, he hoped that it would not now be regarded as a mere party question. He responded to that wish, and did not desire it to be in any sense considered a party question. What were the present circumstances of the case? Three years ago that House passed a Reform Bill, and he believed that measure had materially changed the position of the question of the Ballot. With respect to the Reform Bill, he approached the consideration of that question and supported it with the greatest mistrust and the greatest fear, and therefore his conduct might appear inconsistent. ["Hear!"] He said so most freely. He bore testimony to the fact that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), and the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners), had always been consistent in the course which they had followed. From the earliest time at which he had the honour of their acquaintance they had always carried out Conservative principles. He did not allude to that as applicable to persons sitting on one side of that House or on the other, but in the highest view of the word "Conservative," as respecting order and respecting the rights of property. Having passed the Reform Bill, it seemed to him impossible to stop short, and the sensible course was to show confidence in the people by now conceding the Ballot. That was a natural corollary and sequence of the course which Parliament had adopted. Nothing was more painful for him, in one respect, than to take the step which he was now doing, knowing that he was acting in opposition to the sentiments of hon. Gentlemen with whom he had uniformly acted; but nothing could prevent him from taking what he considered right and just views, and carrying them out when he believed them to be right. It would be impertinent in him, having only recently adopted those views, to urge on the House his own arguments in favour of the Ballot, because if those arguments were good now, they were equally good before, when he did not admit their force. His present views, however, had resulted from recent circumstances. He was much struck last year when he canvassed the constituency which he represented by the statement of a very important and distinguished gentleman—a man of great influence, employing 7,000 workmen. That gentleman told him that the majority of the men in his employ were Conservatives, and he added—"Believe me, Mr. Cochrane, the working classes are Conservatives, and that proves that Mr. Disraeli was right when he passed the Reform Bill." He (Mr. Cochrane) then asked how, if the working men were such consistent Conservatives, the action of trades unions and the influence which demagogues exercised over the minds of the people were to be accounted for? The reply he got was—"It is simply because the demagogues live with the working classes, mix with them, and work upon their minds. The gentlemen do not mix sufficiently with the working classes." He thought that observation was very much sustained by the graceful remark of the French author of the Memoirs of the Grand Army—

"When you read of soldiers, you only know their faults; but when you live with them you know their virtues."

The other day, in the neighbourhood of a great city, he was shown over some large works, where 7,000 or 8,000 workmen were employed. He asked the manager what were the politics of the men, and was told that they all "voted Radical." He remarked—"Then, they are all Radicals." But the manager replied

Mr. Baillie Cochrane

—“No, I never said so; they vote Radical, but three - fourths of them are of Conservative tendencies.” He (Mr. Cochrane) then asked—“How do you account for this apparent inconsistency?” whereupon the manager answered—“The minority, consisting of thinking, busy, active, energetic men, form themselves into committees and clubs, and they exercise an almost inconceivable tyranny over the minds of the majority. I have seen these men driven up to the poll by these minorities, by the power which minorities do manage to exercise over majorities.” History confirmed the truth of that. They should look at the history of France and her various revolutions. Who, at such times, were the people who exercised authority in France? On each occasion it was a minority binding and pressing upon the majority and conquering its will. There was a passage in one of Mr. Mill’s pamphlets which drew attention to that point, and confirmed it, and which was as follows:—

“Protection against the tyranny of the magistrate is not enough; there needs protection also against the tyranny of the prevailing opinion and feeling—against the tendency of society to impose by other means than civil penalties its own ideas and practices as rules of conduct on those who dissent from them; to fetter the development, and, if possible, prevent the formation of any individuality not in harmony with its ways.”

One reason why he (Mr. Cochrane) had changed his opinion on the Ballot was, because, having recently met many of these working men, and having listened to the opinions of those who were thrown into a larger sphere of action, he had begun to believe in the strong Conservative tendencies of the working classes; not using the word Conservative in its party sense, but in its legitimate sense, as meaning the love of order and the maintenance of the rights of property. In talking to these men he had learnt how much excellence and goodness there was among the working classes, and he believed that, while the history of the benevolence and kindness of the rich to the poor found admirers, the benevolence and kindness of the poor to the poor were even more worthy of admiration. But what was the state of things now to be found in France? In that country both Universal Suffrage and the Ballot were institutions, and what had been their result? Remembering the terrible events which had lately occurred in Paris, one might expect that the result would be the upholding of Socialism and Communism; but it had been nothing of the kind. On the contrary, Socialism and Communism were the work of the minority. Out of a population of 2,300,000 in Paris, the number of Communists never amounted to more than 80,000; there being 400,000 or 500,000 other men, who, if they would have fought, might easily have put them down. Nor were the people of France to be wholly blamed for what had occurred in Paris; for it should be borne in mind that among the Communists were people of all classes and countries congregated together in that city, and advocating what they called international views. But what had been the result? France had returned the most Conservative Assembly ever returned by free election. Out of 89 Departments, 75 had returned Conservative and Monarchical candidates, and at the present moment four-fifths of the Chamber now sitting at Versailles were in favour of Monarchy—surely an extraordinary result to be brought about by Universal Suffrage and the Ballot. And what had been the result of the school board elections in this country? In the Metropolis those elections had been conducted by Ballot, and the constituencies had returned not such men as might have been expected under the circumstances, but such men as his noble Friend (Viscount Sandon), who was possessed of great industry, extensive knowledge, and high merit. What was true of London was also true of the whole country. On the other hand, what was the result of open voting? He had been more saddened than amused the other day by reading the account of the Bilston election of a clergyman. In that case, which should have been one of the most solemn among all cases of election, inasmuch as it was the election of a clergyman, every evil connected with contested elections was carried on under the system of open voting. It was an argument much used by those who opposed the Ballot that secret voting tended to forward the work of secret societies, and the binding up of men in an entanglement of oaths and obligations. But he maintained that one advantage of the Ballot would be, that it would strike at the root of these evils, because the influence which was exercised by the fact of men acting in common, and of their marching to the poll in procession to advocate extreme opinions would be done away with. In that respect the Ballot would do infinite good, and would rather check than extend the influence of secret societies. As to the argument that the Ballot was un-English, if he might use the phrase, that was mere clap-trap. He did not often approve of Prince Bismarck's utterances; but the Prince, when conferring with M. Favre relative to the surrender of Strasburg, did make one excellent observation. M. Favre said that the honour of France would not allow the surrender of that fortress, whereupon the then Count Bismarck said—"I did not know that French honour was different to the honour of any other country, and other nations have had to part with their territory." How could a thing be un-English when it was in daily use in all their colonies and in America? And if un-English, why was it that a sense of degradation did not apply to the use of it in their clubs? The argument was perfectly futile, and he trusted that they would hear no more of it. Then it was said that the Ballot must be dangerous, because all the Liberal party supported it; but he had not that great dread of hon. Gentlemen opposite which some people seemed to have. Certainly many men acted simply on habit, and no doubt there were some hon. Gentlemen who would say—"We do not like the Ballot, but we will vote for it as usual." While there were others who might say—"We are not a bit afraid of it, but we shall vote against it." To speak frankly, if he himself had not thought much upon this question lately, and been abroad and seen the working of the Ballot, he should have been strongly inclined to act upon that feeling which led men to go on consistently voting as they had voted in former years. But there was an old Italian proverb—

"The world so quickly changes that we often find,
The man who would be constant must often change his mind."

When these changes were proposed, the consistent man was the one who looked the question fairly in the face, and said—"Having carried a large measure of reform, I must now be consistent, and prove how great is my confidence in the newly-enfranchised, by giving them the Ballot and perfect freedom of action." The hon. Baronet the Member for

Mr. Baillie Cochrane

Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke), in his excellent book of travels, said that in Australia the term Conservative applied less to any party than to the whole population; and Sir A. Elton, in one of his able pamphlets, characterized the Ballot as a Conservative measure—using the term Conservative in a higher than a mere party sense. For himself he regretted, however, that the Government had not brought in a pure and simple Ballot Bill, unencumbered by complicated provisions or by proposals for throwing the expenses of Parliamentary elections upon boroughs and counties. The only means they now had of preventing candidates from trifling with constituencies was by making them pay their share of the hustings and other necessary expenses; and it would be most inexpedient to remove that one remaining indirect qualification. He would therefore advise the Government so far to alter their Bill as to give those who thought the Ballot in itself a wise and Conservative measure an opportunity of voting for it, without calling on them also to vote for something else to which they much objected. Certainly, if they went to a division, he should feel a great difficulty in voting for that Bill unless the extraneous provisions to which he had referred, and which were not contained in the Bill of last year, were withdrawn. If those were withdrawn from the Bill, he should cordially support the measure, placing his full confidence in the good sense and excellent conduct and the Conservative principles of the country.

Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he must congratulate the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. A. Cross) on the very able speech that he had just addressed to the House. But first and foremost he congratulated him on one remarkable feature in that speech. The hon. Member was the first man who, in the course of an hour's speech against the Ballot, had not denounced it as an un-English institution. Now, he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) thought that omission marked a very satisfactory advance in the history of the question, and, let him add, a very favourable starting point for that debate—for it showed, he hoped, that they had had enough of that going about in the spirit of the Pharisee in the parable, and thanking God that they were not as other nations were.

For his part, if he was told that the spectacle of "free and independent electors" standing about in the marketplace, as the Attorney General last year described them as doing at Beverley, like cattle waiting to be bought, or driven, as he himself had seen them, like sheep to the polling-booth, and the spectacle of candidates pitched into waterbutts, and future Chancellors of the Exchequer going about with bloody noses and broken heads; if, he said, he was told that those spectacles were very English, all he could say was that the sooner they were denationalized the better. And he ventured to put it that the issue before the House was, not as the hon. Gentleman put it, whether they should conduct their elections like foreigners, or like Englishmen, but whether they should conduct them like reasonable beings, or like raving maniacs. Now, he would not cross the Atlantic to America, and he would not accompany the hon. Gentleman to the Antipodes—he would take two elections, both held in the same country, and for the same purpose—the one with, and the other without a Ballot. They all remembered the London School Board election; he voted twice in that contest [Laughter]*—*he meant, he recorded his vote in two districts, for each of which he was entitled to vote. Everything was conducted with the most perfect order. He saw no rioting, no confusion; on the contrary, the whole proceedings were as decorous, and, he might add, as dull as the proceedings in that House just before a count-out. Now let him contrast those proceedings with the proceedings in another election held for the same purpose in one of the most peaceable towns in North Wales. At that election, where the Ballot was not used, the experience was just the reverse, and if they had let loose all the winds of heaven, all the wild blasts of hell, and all the wild beasts in the Zoological Gardens, in order to create the utmost possible noise and confusion, they would have a faint conception of what occurred. But his hon. Friend would say a vote was a public trust, and therefore it ought to be publicly exercised, and the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. C. Bentinck), wishing, he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) supposed, to improve on that idea, had actually given Notice of his intention to move as an Instruction to the Committee that, if the Bill be passed, votes in that House should be taken by Ballot. Now, it was easy for them sitting there, with no greater fear than the fear of losing their seats, to indulge in that view of pleasantry. It was easy enough, he said, for a magistrate who had just come from a capital breakfast to lecture a poor starving wretch on the enormity of stealing a potato, and it was as easy for his hon. Friend (Mr. C. Bentinck), who was the incarnation of independence, who could rise proudly in his place and say—"he cared for nobody, and nobody cared for him," to denounce as a cowardly hypocrite the voter who was afraid to proclaim his political opinions on the housetops. But, possibly, if the hon. Gentleman's dinner for the next six months, or for the rest of his life, depended on the vote he gave, he, too, might not be sorry to shelter himself under the protection of the Ballot. And as to hypocrisy, was there no hypocrisy in a man going up to the polling-booth and openly recording his vote in favour of a candidate whose principles he disliked or distrusted? Then the hon. Gentleman who seconded the Motion (Mr. Ridley) said but not only did he object to secret voting, but that the Ballot would not give them secret voting. But surely that argument cut the throat of the other argument completely; for if, as his hon. Friend (Mr. A. Cross) said, their objection was to secret voting, and if, as his Seconder contended, the Ballot would not make voting secret, what became of the first objection to the Ballot? But he returned to his hon. Friend and his speech—his hon. Friend laboured very hard to show that the Ballot would not extinguish bribery. Who ever said it would? They demanded the Ballot in order to extinguish intimidation, and you replied—"Oh! but it would not extinguish bribery." It reminded him of the conversation which Lord Macaulay said he once had with a body with whom he was endeavouring to discuss the character of Charles the First. Macaulay complained that the King had broken his coronation oath. The only answer he could get was—"Oh! but he kept his marriage vow." The answer was quite as logical, and as much to the point as that which they got from the hon. Gentleman. Now, he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) went even further—he believed that neither the Bill nor any other legislative enactment would ever extinguish bribery. On the contrary, he believed that so long as they had poor men who looked upon a vote as a marketable commodity, and so long as they had rich men who were willing and able to buy that commodity, so long would money find its way from the pockets of the one to the pockets of the other, as naturally as water flowed from a higher level to a lower. When once it was generally considered as disgraceful to attempt to bribe a voter as to bribe a Judge or a Member of Parliament—and there was a time when better Judges and Members of Parliament were freely bribed in this country—then, and then only, would bribery become a thing unknown. But if the Ballot would not extinguish bribery, it would put a stop to one very prevalent form of it altogether—he meant what was called “afternoon bribery.” And he did believe that it would do much to check, if not to extirpate the evil generally; because he was sure that Englishmen in general had a knack of liking to see which way their money went, and that they would not care to throw away large sums in the dark. And as to what his hon. Friend called “bribery by results,” it would have to be conducted in so vast and wholesale a scale that it was certain it would not be generally resorted to. But then his hon. Friend said—“If they made the voting secret, they took away the possibility of punishing bribery.” But that, he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) apprehended, was an entire fallacy. For they punished a man not because he voted for the man whose bribe he took, but because he took the bribe. That was the corpus delicti; and in order to bring it home to the culprit it was not necessary to follow the vote. But he came now to that which constituted the real case for the Bill, and upon which the demand for it must rest or fall—the prevalence of intimidation and the chance of the Ballot stopping it; and here they were met by two objections. On the one hand it was said that intimidation did, not exist, and on the other that if it did the Ballot would not stop it. Now, as to the first point, that was a question of fact, and each person would answer it according to his own experience. But there was one piece of advice he should like to tender to any

Mr. Osborne Morgan

hon. Member who felt sceptical on the subject. Let him come down and canvass a Welsh constituency. He (Mr. Osborne Morgan) would answer for it, though he might be a perfect infidel to start with, he would be converted before his labours were half over. Had the House forgotten the story of the Cardiganshire evictions? His hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard) brought that matter before the House. They dragged into the light of day nearly 100 cases of men who had been evicted from their holdings and turned adrift into the world for no other fault than that of having voted according to the dictates of their consciences. They proved each case as clearly as it could be proved in a Court of Justice. The House gave them sympathy; but it could give them no redress. The matter, however, was not allowed to rest there—so strong was the feeling in the Principality for those oppressed and injured men that a sum of nearly £4,000 was collected—not merely in large sums, but in half-crowns and shillings, and even in sixpences and pence—to start them afresh in the world, and to provide some of them with the means of emigrating from the country. Now, was it not a monstrous thing that poor tenant-farmers and even labouring men should be called upon in that way to put their hands in their pockets and contribute out of their hardly-earned incomes, to redress a wrong done to their neighbours by men who claimed a right to dictate to them? And did not the fact that they were willing to do so prove that the story of those wrongs was not a trumped-up tale? So far from intimidation being on the decrease, he believed there never was an occasion in which intimidation of every kind, and under every form, was practised so extensively and so unblushingly as at the last General Election. Then as to the question whether the Ballot would stop intimidation if it existed. On that question, at any rate, they had on their side the evidence of nearly every witness who was examined before the Select Committee, or who had since given evidence on the subject. Let him take that of one gentleman, whose Report on the subject had just been placed in their hands—Mr. Du Cane, the Governor of Tasmania. Mr. Du Cane, when a Member of that House, was the zealous and uncompro-missing opponent of the Ballot; but what did he say of its effect in stopping intimidation after four years' practical experience of its working? His views were summed up in these remarkable words—

“Taken in connection with the system of nomination by voting, it secures perfect order and tranquillity during the progress of the election, and permits every voter to record his vote for the candidate of his choice without fear of hindrance by intimidation of violence of any kind.”

And he might add another indirect testimony which was not without significance just now. At the very time when the Liberal journals in this country were agitating for the adoption of secret voting, the Communal papers of Paris were agitating for its abolition. And why? Because, as they put it, with open voting the pressure of public opinion—they all know what that meant—could not be brought to bear on bad citizens? He was not going into the details of the Bill now—it would be time to do that when they got into Committee; but this he would say, that, taking it all round, a better or fairer and a more thorough Ballot Bill was never laid on the Table of that House. But before he sat down, let him say one word on the present position of the measure. The Ballot was the oldest question before the House and the country. They had gone on discussing it for a whole generation. The very first time he entered that House, now more than 30 years ago, he heard that distinguished man who had just passed from among them—Mr. Grote—make one of his masterly speeches in support of the Ballot; and, if he recollected rightly, the arguments advanced against it then were precisely the arguments that had been urged against it that night. From that day to this the question had been brought forward every year. If they could not make up their minds in 30 years, when would they be able to do so? But there was a further special reason why the settlement of this question should be no longer delayed just now—they had already sat there during the average period of a Parliament's duration. In another Session they would be getting into the “sere and yellow-leaf” of their Parliamentary life. It was high time that they should set their House in order, and make their testamentary dispositions. Now, he was not going to lecture the Ministry—it was a cheap and easy way of getting up a cheer from yonder benches. On the contrary, he admitted that the Ministry had behaved loyally to their party in this matter. But he might fairly ask, if they did not pass the Bill, what would be the net result of their labours this Session? Putting aside the University Tests Bill—which was a fait accompli from the first—their legislative triumphs would be confined to a Coercion Bill and a Dog Bill. [An hon. MEMBER: The Army Bill.] Yes; but what sort of an Army Bill? A mutilated torso, without arms, or legs, or head, or tail, or anything else. Now, he maintained that under those circumstances the honour of the Government was bound up in passing this Bill—they could not delay it even for a Session without a loss of credit which might be fatal to them. And he could not conceive any result more disastrous to the whole Liberal party, or more damaging to the character of party government generally, than that it should go forth to the world—as it certainly would go forth to the world if that measure be thrown over for another year—that the only power in this country capable of carrying the Ballot was the power which carried the Reform Act—a Conservative Government belying their own principles in order to secure the support of a Radical Opposition.

MR. PEEL DAWSON said, there was a time when the country might have had good grounds for resorting to the Ballot in consequence of the evils of coercion by landlords, employers, customers, and others. But there was very little of all that left now, public opinion having been for some considerable time exercising its proper influence. A great change had come over the governing power of the country, the higher and richer classes not being now in exclusive possession of it, as the middle classes had come in to share the power with them. Hence had arisen a free action among the electors themselves. Public opinion was doing its work steadily, and when it acquired its proper weight the only argument in favour of the Ballot—namely, that it would prevent intimidation—would be disposed of. So far as bribery was concerned the Ballot never could eradicate it, and would indeed, in his opinion, tend in an opposite direction. What now prevented votes being given for personal and class interests but the dread of coming under a ban amongst a man's friends? Give the Ballot, and the venal voter could at once surrender himself without any fear of shame to any course that corruption might dictate. Let them look at the working of the Ballot in America. Were they satisfied with its results there? Was it not a fact that men there were brought up in bundles to vote, and were not paid unless success was secured? Had it not led in that country to such complete corruption that in that boasted land of liberty there was less of practical freedom than in almost any of the monarchies of the Old World? In a morning paper of December 18, 1858, a letter appeared from the then President of the United States, in which he anticipated the time when the voters in the United States would become so affected with corruption that the foundation of free government would be poisoned in its source and end in a military despotism. England, where men voted openly before the world, had hitherto been regarded as the land of freedom, and he believed that public opinion was the best corrective for those evils which it was sought to cure by the Ballot. The Ballot would introduce into the British Constitution the spirit of the Star Chamber, and although no one would be more ready than himself to rejoice in the destruction of any unfair influence, yet he could not conceal from himself what the most ardent supporters of the Ballot dare not ignore, that it would not limit clerical influence. He did not allude merely to the Roman Catholic clergy, for he had known some of the most arbitrary and unscrupulous interference proceed from ministers of religion belonging to persuasions other than Roman Catholic. The Ballot was especially unsuitable to Ireland, being opposed to the character and habits of the people, and as a fact very few Petitions emanated from that part of the kingdom. The Ballot would tolerate all the evils at present in existence, and would create others. The elector should perform his duty in the light of day, and any other course was, in his opinion, unmanly. Therefore he felt he should be performing his duty in the best manner to his constituency by voting against what he would not call un-English, or even un-Irish, but which was nothing less than a secret, silent, and insidious system.

Mr. Peel Dawson

MR. LEATHAM: Mr. Speaker—I should suppose that few hon. Members of this House listened with greater pleasure than I did to the speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. A. Cross). Knowing a little of this question, I found his speech a great intellectual treat. But skilful and augmentative, and marked by high ability though it was, I question whether the opponents of the Ballot have any great cause to feel grateful to my hon. Friend. But for him and his speech it might have been forgotten that, by so many fallacies, the party, of which he is a distinguished Member, have withstood this great constitutional reform. In one sense that speech was a synopsis of failure. Every argument which he adduced, every assertion which he advanced, every appeal which he made, every standard which he raised—I hope for the last time to-night—but under which in times which are past, the party has marched confidently enough—all these have become already the spoils of common sense—and my hon. Friend has decked out a huge trophy with them, not, as he very well knows, to adorn the coming victory of his opinions, but to grace the triumph of those who have vanquished them. The Ballot is immoral; the Ballot will teach hypocrisy; the Ballot will promote bribery. These are the assertions which have been brandished in our faces any time during the last 40 years, and in defiance of which this question has grown out of its obscurity until it fills the whole of this side of the House, and has taken possession of the Cabinet itself. My hon. Friend argued that intimidation is rapidly on the decrease. I can easily believe that there are few hon. Members less likely than my hon. Friend knowingly to commit an oppressive or unjust act. But the mischief is that we cannot help ourselves. We may protest as much as we please. Tradition is too strong for us. Our very presence at a contested election is pressure, and what is the whole system of canvassing but a system of organized pressure. It is not necessary for landlords to write letters recommending a particular candidate, as they do in Wales. It is not necessary to send the agent round with them to their tenants from house to house, collecting votes as he might collect rents. It is not necessary to send long strings of cars for one's tenants, as they do in Ireland, with a military escort, whose duty it is to see that these free and independent electors do not escape. It is not necessary to go about the streets armed with scythes, as they do at Limerick, or with your pockets full of stones, as they do at Bristol. These forms of intimidation are coarse and brutal, and, except at election times, they shock everybody, although your law either cannot or will not touch them. There are forms of coercion, equally cogent, which wear quite another exterior. There is a form of coercion which goes about bland, and smiling, and bearheaded—which grasps its victim warmly by the hand, and only says—"I know, Mr. Smith, that you will be with us on Thursday"—but which drives, compels, coerces as surely, more surely, than armed mobs and ruffianly agents, and all the posse comitatus of overt intimidation. Sometimes it takes the name of the just influence of property. Men expect their tenants to vote with them because they always have voted with them. And what happens? Why, what happened in Mid-Cheshire; where a Cheshire landlord told us that tenants "think it rather safer to know nothing, since they must vote as they are told." Now with all this staring him in the face; with every instance of coercion with which that Blue Book teems—coercion by landlords and their agents; coercion by masters, overlookers, and fellow-workmen; coercion by customers, by priests, by armed mobs, by the soldiery—coercion exercised by almost everybody who has the power to coerce over everybody who is powerless to resist coercion—the irony is a little too bitter when an hon. Member sitting for a division of the county of Lancaster—the county of Stalybridge, with its anti-screw association; Blackburn, with its screw circular; and of Ashton, with its victim fund—rises from the perusal of that instructive volume and talks of intimidation as though it were almost extinct. But my hon. Friend says that the Ballot will teach hypocrisy. Do not you teach hypocrisy now? What happens when a man votes against his conscience, as thousands do at every General Election? Do you think that he will candidly admit it? When he is twitted by his comrades with giving the coward's vote or the menial's vote—will he calmly acquiesce? No, Sir, he will brazen it out. He will advance any plea for the base vote, except the true and shameful one. Gratitude to his employer, fidelity to his master, affection for his landlord—and when the object who inspires these gushing emotions has turned his back, he will shake his fist after the master of his fidelity, and curse between his teeth the landlord of his love. But perhaps he is a calculating hypocrite. Why, then, he will go about for weeks and months preparing for his base vote, praising the candidate whom in his heart he despises, and shouting until he is hoarse for the man who he hopes to see at the bottom of the poll. It is your open voting which is the true school of hypocrisy. It is there that the man in dependant circumstances learns already those lessons of hypocrisy which my hon. Friend expects the Ballot to teach, and he learns them under the tuition of his betters, and in the name of courage and manliness and truth. But the main argument of my hon. Friend was that the exercise of the franchise was the exercise of a public duty, and that every duty affecting the public must be publicly performed. But I want to know where this monstrous proposition comes from, or upon what precedents it is based? In a free State there is no public duty more important, or more supremely affecting the public, than the duty of the man who undertakes to warn and instruct the public mind; to tell the public what is for its good, and what is not; who are its friends and who are not; to criticize, and, if need be, to condemn the character and conduct of our public men. Will it be contended that the simple duty of the citizen transcends in importance or in responsibility to the public the duty of the man who attempts to mould public opinion, and to dictate from his oracular penetralia the policy of the nation? Now, apply your theory. Demolish the anonymous shelter of the public writer, and what becomes of the liberty of the Press? Observe, then, your inconsistency. The hand which moulds public opinion must be concealed, the hand which contributes its paltry unit to the glorification of Jones, or the discomfiture of Robinson—two rival candidates—must be exposed. The man who persuades me to vote for Jones and disappoint Robinson must wear a mask. I, who vote for Jones, simply because for the time being I am possessed by the mind of the man in the mask, must wear no mask, for, if I do, the social edifice begins to tumble in pieces, and my hon. Friend will be found sitting, like Marius, a ruined man among ruins. But I want to know where my hon. Friend's precedents come from. Does he find them in the Council Chamber of the Sovereign, and among the responsible advisers of the Crown? What happens when, upon those 15 men, devolves the exercise of their prodigious responsibility to the public? Let us suppose that it is a question of the first magnitude—a question of peace or war—and that the Cabinet are pretty evenly divided in opinion, that seven are for peace and seven are for war. Upon the vote of the fifteenth depend the most gigantic issues to his country. Is that vote given publicly? No, Sir; a wise and impenetrable secrecy shields the voter. The country may be betrayed in the dark, but the man who dares to thwart the burning ambition of Robinson must do it in the daylight. But perhaps my hon. Friend thinks that he may find comfort in the Law Courts. He spoke of magistrates and Judges. No doubt the judgment or sentence of a Judge is publicly pronounced. It would be hard to see how it could be otherwise, but behind the Judge stands the whole authority of the realm. He is protected by the arm of the Sovereign, and if there be any risk to the man who wears the ermine, that risk is abundantly compensated for in the dignity and emoluments which attach to the office. But who ever heard of harm coming to an English Judge because he gave an upright decision? Yet harm comes to the upright voter every day. Now, there is a Court of Law in which those who sit in judgment are not supposed to be quite so hedged about with inviolability as an ordinary Judge. It is assumed that consequences in some degree resembling those which attend the decision of a common voter attend theirs. Is their vote given openly? Every member of a Court Martial, when he takes his seat, takes also an oath, that at no time and under no circumstances will he divulge the vote of any other member of that Court. But take the case of the common jurymen. In Scotland, where the vote of the majority rules the verdict, the vote of individual jurymen is secret. In England, where the fiction of unanimity still prevails, this is virtually the case, because all the deliberations of the jury are in secret, and the public never knows who is the stout jurymen, with the capacious stomach or the capacious pockets, who starves his colleagues into submission. Look then, in whatever direction you will, all precedent is against my hon. Friend—all precedent is on our side; and it proves this—that wherever the State does not step in to remunerate the man who discharges a risky public duty, for his risk she calls in secrecy to the aid of conscience. And now, Sir, let me turn from the region of theory to that of fact. The Ballot is no novelty. We have ample experience of its practical working. My hon. Friend spoke of the Ballot in Australia. He laboured hard to show that everything in Australia was not precisely the same as everything in England—that people are a little better educated, or a little better off—or that their political condition differs from our own. Now, if everything in Australia were precisely the same as everything in England—if Australia were simply a slice of Great Britain—my hon. Friend would not have a leg to stand upon, because the success of the Ballot in Australia is absolute. My hon. Friend cited evidence from Australia with the view of showing that bribery and intimidation scarcely existed there before the introduction of the Ballot. Now, no doubt, the colonists spoke as favourably as possible of their friends; but the utmost which any of them would say was, that before the Ballot bribery and intimidation were not general or extensive. Yet some of them distinctly stated that they were. “I recollect a good deal of bribery also.” “It was notorious that a certain portion of the electors were open to bribery.” “Before the Ballot landlords would act very much as landlords do in this country, but now such a thing is never heard of,” said my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. R. Torrens). “I think that there was a great amount of bribery before the Ballot, and a great deal of treating and intimidation also,” said Mr. Muir, for 15 years returning officer at Melbourne. There is one point, however, upon which all the witnesses agree, and the colonial Governors agree with them—namely, that there is neither bribery nor intimidation now. Now, why is this? We say that this result is mainly due to the Ballot. My hon. Friend attributes it to education. But he forgets that, if education has reached a higher limit in Australia than it has here, the suffrage has reached a lower. But what says Mr. Dutton—

“According to the last Census Return, out of 25,929 electors in South Australia, 2,273, or 9 per cent, could not read.”

And further on he says—

“During the time of open voting the principal expense of the candidates was to keep a number of publichouses open.”

He speaks of as much as £4,000 being spent by one candidate mainly in this way. That does not argue a very high state of education. And what says my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge—

“Under the old system everything went on precisely as it does in this country, the same row and screaming, and shouting, and stone-throwing, and rotten eggs, and all that sort of thing.”

This does not look like a high state of refinement. But my hon. Friend says that wages are higher and people are better off, and, therefore, not venal. But, speaking of Tasmania, Governor Du Cane states that “the circumstances of the colony are in a very depressed state,” and I read the other day in an Australian paper of a bread riot at Adelaide. The fact is that people are liable to the same vicissitudes in Australia as in England. But my hon. Friend ekes out his argument by the assertion that there is no party government in Australia, no party organization, or party questions. This only applies to the colony of South Australia, where, however, great political questions occasionally arise. But, generally, there is a good deal of political indifference, coupled, however, with strong ambition on the part of candidates to obtain seats in the Legislature—a condition of things highly conducive to bribery. When, however, you come to the colony of Victoria, you find a state of things clearly analogous to that in this country. Mr. Verdon was asked—

“Is there much excitement about the elections often?—Yes, intense excitement, but it is the excitement caused by the political questions which are being discussed. Do a large number of the electors generally give their votes?—Yes. Is it the rule, or the exception, for a contest to take place?—The rule. Do politics run high there?—Yes. Are parties divided by a strongly marked line?—Yes. Is there any regular party feeling as there is in England?—Yes. Do parties continue to be opposed to one another on definite grounds?—Yes; parties who have been opposed continue to be opposed to one another for the last 10 or 12 years certainly. Then the government of Victoria is by a system of party precisely the same as it is in this country?—Precisely.”

Well, Sir, what then becomes of the assertion that there is no true analogy between the social and political conditions of these populations, and that therefore the argument based upon analogy fails? Now let me turn to America. My hon. Friend told us of the abuses which exist under the Ballot in America, and he referred to a series of letters compiled by a committee of gentlemen in this country avowedly hostile to the Ballot. I said compiled, but I might almost have said concocted, for any method less likely to arrive at genuine American opinion upon the working of the Ballot it would be almost impossible to devise. For how did these gentlemen proceed? They selected 12 correspondents from the United States, upon what principle of selection does not appear; but, since this was a political matter, probably upon what Mr. Darwin would call the principle of natural selection. To each of these 12 gentlemen a string of most suggestive questions was sent, and apparently that there might be no mistake as to the answers which they were expected to return, Mr. Mill accompanied the questions by a note, in which he did not pretend to disguise either his own or the committee's opinion with regard to the Ballot. But, in order that the House may estimate—I scarcely know what to call it, but certainly not the impartiality of the committee—let me remind them that, although there are 37 States in the American Union, the majority of these correspondents were selected from three only; and what three? Why, precisely those, in some of the chief cities of which, through the existence of a large Irish vote and a most imperfect system of Ballot, some of the abuses which attach to open voting prevail. Two were from New York, three from Pennsylvania, and two from the City of Boston. Now, the correspondents who wrote from New York and Philadelphia explained that the Ballot in these States was really no Ballot at all, and, therefore, of course, the abuses which belong to open voting are to be found there. When we come to Massachusetts, however, we find the history of the Ballot in that State to be of a most instructive character. Originally the name of the candidate was written on each vote, but when the State became populous these written Ballots were found inconvenient, and printed Ballots were substituted. This, as Mr. Amasa Walker explains—"very unfavourably changed the character of the Ballot, because the printed votes could be recognized at the polls." But the Ballot was absolutely destroyed by a subsequent law, which provided that "all votes should be deposited open and unfolded." "The consequences soon became painfully apparent." "Intimidation and coercion were extensively used." Eventually, in 1851, the close Ballot was adopted—that is, every Ballot was placed in a sealed envelope, and with what result?—

"It was found economical, convenient, and expeditious; a perfect security against fraud, and a full protection to the voter. Operatives and all others in dependent positions were emancipated by it, and voted with as much freedom as the most powerful classes."

Finally, in the year 1853, the reactionary party came again into power, and "emasculated the law" by providing "that any voter might use the envelope or not as he might choose." Well, Sir, letters were received from five other States. Mr. Colfax, Vice President of the United States, speaking specially for Indiana, spoke most highly of the success of the Ballot. In Illinois and Rhode Island the Ballot is optional, and the protection to the voter therefore imperfect. In Virginia the Ballot had only been introduced six months before the correspondent was asked his opinion, but, true to the instincts of one of Mr. Mill's special correspondents, although he admitted that he had no experience whatever of its working, he recommends that gentleman "to avoid it as he would the small-pox." Lastly, we come to the only State into which the committee penetrated in which they appear to have an absolutely close Ballot, and what do we find? That intimidation does not exist. Sir, I think that I can afford to make my hon. Friend a present, and not a very liberal or generous present either, of all that he can get out of those letters for his case against the Ballot. But before I sit down, let me invite the attention of the House to a short extract from an essay contributed by Mr. Morse, an American writer, well known in this country, to Fraser's Magazine. He says—

"In the matter of corruption, I feel no hesitation in asserting that it is a thing almost unknown among the voters of the United States."

Mr. Leatham

For this he suggests two reasons—the great number of the voters and the Ballot. He says—

"Another fact which is operative at all elections, without exception, is that no man who purchases half-a-dozen votes can ever be sure how the majority of them will be cast. It is an utter impossibility for a person who buys votes to assure himself of their delivery according to the contract of purchase. He is obliged to depend upon the honour of a man whom he has himself proved to be dishonourable."

But I shall be told, perhaps, that the American citizen scorns to hide his vote, and that an equal scorn ought to rise in the breast of the English citizen at such a proposition. No doubt the American citizen scorns to hide his vote, but he scorns also to lay his hand upon his fellow-citizen and to say—"Your vote is mine." Until an equal scorn is ours, it is in vain for us to pretend to American manliness, for there is no cowardice, to my thinking, more unmanly than that of those who first trample down the helpless and then taunt them, as I think I have heard them taunted, even in this House, because they are not brave. The American citizen does scorn to hide his vote. In dealing with the American people you are dealing with a nation whose political limbs had been free for generations. The American citizen walks with a firmer tread among his fellows; the whole American nation marches with a bolder mien before the world; and why is this? Not because there is anything in the American character which is naturally more manly than anything in ours. I rejoice to think that we both belong to the same great and manly race. But all that is manly in the English and American character has been developed by the institutions which surround it, and among them is one framed for a time when the instinct of coercion, inherited from ourselves, was still strong, but which has triumphed over the instinct itself—I mean an electoral system, the first teaching of which was that the voter was absolutely free. I desire to see the character of our people crowned by an equal independence. I desire to see this notion of coercion—which, through the teaching of the Ballot, has wholly died out in Australia, which, through the teaching of the Ballot, has all but died out in America, through the teaching of the Ballot—die out here. For, Sir, I am convinced that the death of the old feudal arrogance on the one hand, and of the old craven submission upon the other, will be the birth of a manlier carriage in our people, a bolder policy in this House, and a nobler spectacle of freedom for the world.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) had pronounced an eloquent panegyric on the American character, but it was a little inconsistent with his previous statement. The hon. Member said that the American citizen scorned to hide his vote; but a short time before he had told the House that in more than one State the Ballot was necessary in consequence of the coercion which was exercised. Before entering upon the question now before the House, perhaps he might be allowed to explain why he had dropped the Motion which had been so long upon the Notice Paper, and why he intended supporting that of his hon. Friend the Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. A. Cross). His Notice was levelled against secret voting, and it was so limited because there were other provisions in the Bill to the principle of which he was not opposed. And although the success of his Motion would, undoubtedly, have been fatal to the Bill, still the objections felt to the measure by a large number of hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House were so strong that they preferred a Motion on the face of it more hostile to the whole proposal. He cheerfully bowed to that preference, and, as he would rather give up the provisions to which he did not object than accept them in conjunction with the Ballot, he had no difficulty in supporting the wider Amendment. Perhaps, however, after what he had said, he ought briefly to specify the points on which he concurred more or less with the Government measure. In the first place, he was very much inclined to welcome the proposed change in the law, and he might say the change in the opinion of the Government, with reference to nominations and declarations of the poll. Riots on these occasions were not confined to the North of England. Though he had faced such accessories to elections, and was ready to face them again, still they were not pleasant. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council had mentioned, in his opening speech, an episode in the election of the right hon. and gallant Member for Ripon (Sir Henry Storks); but he could assure him that the flints of the Southdowns and oyster-shells of the South coast were not softer than Yorkshire granite, and perhaps less easy to catch. On one occasion the declaration of the poll at Shoreham had been interfered with by the conflagration of the hustings. He ought to say, for the credit of his constituents, that they attributed these unruly proceedings to the supporters of the hon. Members for Brighton, where he understood that the roughs made a Shoreham election a close holiday, and came over in force. He was a little doubtful of the complete success of these provisions, and perhaps the right hon. Member for Bradford might find that the public meetings in Yorkshire would change their character, and be interrupted by the noisy element he would shut out from the hustings. Coming to the provision for throwing the necessary expenses of elections on the rates, about which also the Government seemed to have changed their minds since last year, theoretically this might be right; but the present system had afforded some protection against an excessive number of candidates, against men standing from mere vanity, or for the purpose of giving trouble, without the slightest chance of success, and he feared that in that way a very heavy expense might be thrown upon the ratepayers. After all, the grievance to the poor man was rather sentimental than real. The charges of the returning officer formed a very small part of the expenses of Parliamentary life, and he had known many cases on both sides in which constituencies wishing to elect a man to whom expense was an object had, to the honour of both, subscribed every farthing, even to the ticket on the railway. Of vote by Ballot there were two kinds: the one used for convenience, the other intended to secure absolute secrecy. To the principle of the first he had no objection. It afforded protection against that worst of all kinds of intimidation—that of a mob on polling-day, whose violence, usually exerted against the most respectable portion of the constituency, rendered it absolutely impossible for weak, timid, or elderly people to record their votes. So far he went with the Ballot, and he believed the Ballot itself practically went no further in most of the countries in which it was used. There was no question of principle between that kind of Ballot and open voting, and he agreed with the conclusion arrived at by the Vice President of the Council, after comparing the two systems, that "peace, order, and quietness are much in favour of the Ballot." But could not even this object be attained in another way? He thought it could, and he believed the closing of publichouses, the multiplication and proper regulation of polling-places, the admission only of a certain number of people, as at present in the Inns of Courts and Universities, so that voting should be safe and private, but not secret, together with the prohibition of declaration of numbers till the close of the poll, would do all that was necessary to prevent violence, and—the last especially—much to prevent bribery. He believed, also, that magistrates should treat rioting and mischief by mobs much more severely, for they were too apt in many places to look upon it as venial license, all fair at election time. But coming to the real object of the Bill—the framing a scheme of voting which should render it absolutely impossible for anyone to know which way any particular elector had voted—he would pass over briefly the objections which were not those of principle, but of detail. Those, however, were by no means unimportant. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that with secret voting scrutiny must be abandoned; but he said that scrutiny was rarely resorted to. This was perfectly true; but why? Simply because the watchfulness of agents and friends of candidates during polling was a perpetual scrutiny. Take away that, and there was nothing to prevent personation, particularly as it would be no one's interest to follow up a vote without knowing which way it had been given. The papers from Tasmania were very instructive on that point. There would be the danger of forgery, and of bribery of and tampering by officials, the last, perhaps, might not be very probable, but people would always question a return which went much against their expectations. In a recent election in Connecticut it was proved judicially that the returning officer had suppressed a bundle of 100 voting papers on one side, and returned 500 instead of 600. The genuineness of the French elections was credited by few, and even the admirers of the Ballot in Australia confessed that there "it had not felt the strain of trial." The first question naturally was, what were the present evils against which this revolution in our ancient constitutional practice was levelled? Were they increasing, or had they attained such magnitude as to induce them to run any considerable risk in order to get rid of them, and was the particular method by which it was proposed to obviate them fraught with so much mischief and danger that they would be acting more prudently in bearing the ills they had than in adopting it? The weak points of the present system of voting in such a way that their votes might be produced—for he gave up the barbarous system of what might be called voting under fire, amid a shower of brickbats and abuse—the weak points were corruption and intimidation. Nobody could deny that these existed in a very considerable degree; but, at the same time, no one could deny that within recollection they had enormously diminished. The change of tribunal from Committees of the House to the Judges had no doubt done much, and would do more. There had certainly been a great change in public sentiment since men openly avowed that they had a right to the opinions of their dependents. Who could see the way in which farmers' clubs, for instance, spoke out on questions touching what might be called farmers' politics, without being convinced that the coercion of landlords had no terrors for them? At election times especially many changes of tenancy were attributed to political reasons. He remembered the late Mr. Berkeley telling a story in that House of a landlord turning out a tenant for such reasons, and saying—"You have a Roman nose; I object to tenants with Roman noses." So, on the other hand, if a tenant received notice on account of bad farming, for instance, he frequently attributed it to political persecution. It was notorious that such was the character of many cases in Wales, of which much political capital was made at the last election. There was legitimate as well as illegitimate influence, though the hon. Member for Huddersfield refused to admit this. He believed the Ballot would increase the latter and weaken the former; and he would rather see a voter follow a landlord whom he respected, and whose opinion he would take in many matters besides politics, than see him vote under the influence of the speeches of demagogues at excited meetings, which would sway the uneducated and half educated more than ever, and though full of mis-statements and false imputations were cleverly adapted to the prejudices of the audience, based as they were on the axiom that he who went about descanting on grievances would never want hearers. He admitted that in small places tradesmen, especially those without strong political feeling, had a disagreeable time at elections in the wish to oblige customers of both sides, and that the Ballot might enable them to do so more easily. But would the Ballot prevent that worst form of influence and intimidation—worst because it was ever present, sleepless and relentless—that of fellow-workmen. If it prevented that, it could only be by the victim acting as well as speaking a lie every day of his life. As a respectable man in Paris was obliged to shout “Vive la Commune” to save his life, so the English workman who dared to think differently from the mass would have to deny the opinions he cherished, and denounce the candidate for whom he intended to vote. “I wish,” said the hon. Member for Huddersfield, “to get rid of that low morality which makes a man amenable to that false and variable criterion, the opinion of his fellow-men.” As long as human nature existed you could not get rid of it, but you might add hypocrisy, which the hon. Member would admit would lower even that low morality. Mr. John Stuart Mill, in one of his books, said, that “all nations were given to lying; but that the English were ashamed of it.” He was afraid the feeling of self-preservation would remove or weaken the feeling of shame, and, if so, they would attain purity of election at the expense of the national character, and the remedy would, indeed, be worse than the disease. He confessed to the belief that the influence of public opinion was the best security for the due exercise of political rights; and he feared that secrecy would destroy that wholesome public opinion—would make respectable people careless about politics; and by bringing about among them that political apathy which prevailed for other reasons in Berlin, would give strength to the wild anarchical views of an insignificant party which public opinion kept in check. They had been told that it was unfair to oblige a majority to forego the legitimate use of intoxicating drinks because the minority could not refrain from the abuse of them; but here it was proposed to deprive the great majority of the power of making known the way in which they had discharged perhaps the only political duty they had the opportunity of performing, in deference to the timidity of a small minority. Again, he said the remedy was worse than the disease, and was to be applied when the disease had been almost cured by other means. The practice of the clubs was frequently adduced as an argument in favour of the Ballot. He ventured to say that that was a confusion of ideas between public duty and private convenience. Moreover, he should be unwilling to import into political elections many of the motives which influenced the members of a club, and which too often savoured of malice and uncharitableness. Even in clubs promises and votes did not always correspond. Most hon. Members had heard the story of the Kildare Street Club and Lord Fitzgerald—how every member promised severally to vote for his candidate, and how on the day of Ballot the only white ball was his own. A similar experience is said to have converted against the Ballot Mr. Williams, the late Member for Lambeth. One of the worst results of the system was, in his opinion, the destruction of all confidence between man and man. Canvassing could never be prevented—the papers from Victoria proved that—weak people could never be prevented from promising, especially when they were not to be called to account. The result of the election would be, therefore, more disappointing than ever to the beaten candidate, and whereas now in many instances hands were shaken, and a frank admission made that a fair fight had been fought, the unsuccessful man would henceforward retire with the conviction that his neighbours and familiar friends had played him false, and some one would not be wanting to suggest that even his own committee must have turned against him. As they seemed likely to have the nuisance of perpetual elections all over the country for school boards, for financial boards, for parochial councils, and what not—all, he presumed, to be by Ballot eventually—what a disruption of neighbourly confidence this would produce! It was said that the different classes in this country never knew the real feelings, the inner life, of each other; that there was a reserve they never penetrated. That was a misfortune which this new element could not fail to intensify. As illustration was sometimes more convincing than argument, perhaps the House would allow him to mention a circumstance which once came within his own knowledge, and which he thought was somewhat instructive on that point of destruction of confidence between man and man. He was once canvassing a place in the South of England—he need not mention names—and on coming to a public-house in one of the streets the persons who were with him said—“You need not go in there; the landlord is a red-hot Ballot man.” However, he went in, and said to him—“I am come for your vote; but I suppose I shall not get it.” “Are you for the Ballot?” the landlord asked. “No,” he replied, “certainly not.” “Oh, then, I’ll vote for you.” “I am surprised,” he said, “for I heard you were a red-hot Ballot man.” “So I was,” the man rejoined, “till lately, but I’ve found out what a base thing the Ballot is.” He (Mr. Cave) saw that he had a story to tell, so he sat down and let him go on. “A few weeks ago,” he said, “there died the landlord of a neighbouring public-house, in which a friendly society held its meetings. Myself and another publican each wanted the society to come to our house, and the members agreed that it should be decided by Ballot. We both canvassed; there were 30 members, and I got 20 promises, so I thought myself sure. When the time came I got 10 votes, and lost. But that was not the worst of it, for in the course of the day the whole 20 came in, one after the other, and said—‘My dear fellow, I am so sorry you did not win; you know I voted for you.’” [Ironical cheers.] Yes, he understood that cheer, and of course he knew it might be said that a few instances of that kind would prevent canvassing altogether, and leave people free to vote as they liked; but even if that were to be so, which he very much doubted, especially after the evidence to the contrary from Victoria, at what a price would this freedom be purchased! No less than by corrupting and paralyzing the character of the nation. In that country they were supposed to have the right not only to their own opinions, but to the expression of them. Take away the last and they took away the boldness to discuss public questions which certainly existed at present—the open resistance to oppression and wrong which in itself was ennobling—and what did they get in return? They got the character which cringed to their face and struck them behind their backs. They made it impossible to distinguish an honest man from a knave, and therefore they destroyed at least one of the inducements to honesty. Public spirit would be gone. Public meetings would pass resolutions one way and vote another. There would be no more faith in politics than in horse-dealing. So keenly was that felt in Massachusetts that, when an Act providing for secret voting was passed there in 1851, a large body of electors met for the purpose of denouncing with indignation what they repudiated as unworthy of free men, and so strong was the feeling that the Act was repealed the next year. The corruption and profligacy of elections under the Ballot in New York had long been notorious. He found some time ago a remedy proposed in The New York Herald—not more open voting, but that “there should be a registration, by which no man should sail under false colours, or deposit his vote at an election, unless he belonged to the party to which he professed to belong.” It was not fair to subject weak people to such temptation. Even in that House, if they extended the protection to hon. Members, according to the proposal of the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. C. Bentinck)—and they certainly required it as much as any other class—they might sometimes see a marvellous discrepancy between the debate and the Division List. He had said nothing of the party aspect of the question. He did not inquire whether it would benefit one side more than the other. On that there was a wide difference of opinion, as the debate had shown. They were told, indeed, that Her Majesty’s Government should secure the Ballot, and then they need not fear a dissolution. Well, it might be so; but he doubted its aiding the Imperial Parliament to govern Ireland, and he doubted its assisting the Chancellor of the Exchequer in maintaining his balance between direct and indirect taxation. However that might be, it was because, while not blind to the evils of the present system—which, however, he believed, were disappearing from force of circumstances—he thought the proposed remedy worse than the disease, and that the character of the whole nation was too precious a thing to be imperilled for the sake of a crotchet, or sacrificed to the exigencies of party government on one side or the other. It was for these reasons that he could not give his consent to this great change in the election of the Parliament of England.

Mr. Stephen Cave

Mr. Stephen Cave

MR. STANSFELD said, he experienced great satisfaction at the course the debate had taken on this, the first occasion on which there had been a favourable opportunity of discussing it. The hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. A. Cross) had placed the issue to be decided plainly and clearly before the House. That hon. Member had addressed himself to the principle of secret voting; and he was glad to say that the subject had been discussed throughout, without reference to party feelings, and with considerable independence of thought. In spite of the Amendment of the hon. Member, he had a confident hope that this measure would pass into law. Before he addressed himself to the arguments of the previous speakers, he would ask leave to state to the House what he believed to be the various views and standpoints taken by those who had offered opinions upon the question. In the first place, there were those who stood upon the ancient lines who objected altogether to the Ballot and to secret voting to be enforced, even only on the day of polling. Those were not the views of the hon. Member who brought forward that Amendment (Mr. A. Cross), who did not appear to him to rank himself among those who opposed the Ballot in the belief that on political, constitutional, and moral grounds, it was unnecessary and mischievous; and when he turned to the Report of the Committee, of which the hon. Member was a very active and influential member, he did not find that that hon. Gentlemen, or any member of that Committee, Liberal or Conservative, took such a ground as that. What he found was that the hon. Gentleman moved an Amendment which was confined to the objection to what that hon. Gentleman called permanent secret voting. He found also an objection moved by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) which implied approval of the system of Ballot as applied only to the day of the poll. [Mr. ASSHETON Cross: As a means of taking the votes.] As a means also of preserving order and tranquillity upon the day of the poll. He did not know whether he might class that hon. Gentleman with those who stood on the ancient ways and objected to the Ballot in any shape, or with those who occupied an intermediate position, and had satisfied their own minds of the undoubted utility of the Ballot in absolutely securing order and tranquillity upon the day of election. There was a second class of opponents—those whose conversion had proceeded a certain distance, though not very far—and who had become convinced that secret voting on the day of the poll, subject to publication afterwards, would be of immense value, because it would absolutely prevent a knowledge of the state of the poll, and would, therefore, prevent what was well known as “three o’clock negotiations” and the traffic in votes that it was worth while to buy. The advocates of the Ballot might be classified under two heads—there were those whose views were represented by the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Bedford, and accepted by the Committee, which Amendment was as follows—

“That, in recommending the adoption of the Ballot, we desire to express our opinion that in order to secure the benefits we anticipate from its introduction into this country, it is necessary that the secrecy of the vote should be inviolable, except in the case of any voter found guilty of bribery, or whose vote in due course of law had been adjudged invalid;”

and there were those whose views were expressed by the Bill before the House, and by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council upon its introduction. The difference between these two classes of advocates of the Ballot was very narrow, and was not at all a difference in principle. The reason why his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council, and why the Government, on full consideration, had come to the conclusion not to retain that power of publication which would only arise in case of a scrutiny of the election, was that the case was very rare and the remedy very costly and the effect of it very small; while, on the other hand, the advantage of perfect secrecy in the minds of those who believed in the Ballot was so great, and the importance of the conviction in the public mind that secrecy had been fairly secured was so overpowering, that they had come to the conclusion that it was not worth while to observe that distinction, and they had laid on the Table of the House what he believed had been called a clean Ballot Bill. The hon. Member for South-west Lancashire, and the right hon. Gentleman who had just resumed his seat (Mr. S. Cave), had objected to the Ballot upon very high grounds. They had spoken of the Ballot as a system which would demoralize the community. They had said that the franchise was a trust. The hon. Member for South-west Lancashire had said, if it was not a trust, it was at least a public duty which ought to be performed in public, and subject to the control of public opinion. Well, he (Mr. Stansfeld) for one, did not under-appreciate those considerations. He would endeavour to reply frankly to that argument as one who had always been in favour of the Ballot. But before he addressed himself to those more abstract considerations, he would ask leave to direct the attention of the House to the facts of practical interest. It appeared to him to be important that they should come to an understanding among themselves as to what was already admitted with respect to the utility and efficacy of the Ballot, because he did not think any hon. Member would deny that there had been considerable change and progress of opinion on the subject of the Ballot, or that many things were now admitted in its favour which were not admitted in former times and in former debates. It was now admitted that the Ballot secured order and tranquillity on the day of election, and it was also admitted that it prevented intimidation. The right hon. Member who spoke last (Mr. S. Cave) had admitted so much, though, at the same time, thinking other means might be devised for attaining the desired ends. He (Mr. Stansfeld) would, however, remind the right hon. Gentleman that no means could be in any way as effective as the Ballot, because under it the state of the poll would never be known until it was too late to alter it. The only objection made by the opponents of the Ballot in the Committee which sat last year was to the statement that the Ballot was a cure for every form of corruption; and no division was made by them on the assertion that it also prevented intimidation. [An hon. MEMBER: No, no!] He would endeavour to convince his hon. Friend. On the Motion of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham), the Committee adopted the following Amendment:—

“That the evidence leads to the conclusion that this change in the mode of voting would not only secure order and tranquillity both at municipal and Parliamentary elections, but would also protect voters from undue influence and intimidation.”

The hon. Member for South-west Lancashire said the Ballot was a severe remedy which ought not to be applied unless its absolute necessity was demonstrated, and he said he denied the necessity on the ground that the evils of intimidation and corruption were largely decreasing in this country. He confessed he was surprised to hear that statement from the hon. Member. It did not entirely agree with the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Shoreham who spoke last, who, while agreeing with the statement as to the decrease of those evils, admitted their extensive existence. Now, he appealed to the conscience of the great majority of hon. Members of that House, whether the evils of intimidation and corruption were not sufficiently enormous to induce them to try some remedy better than those which had been hitherto applied. The hon. Member for South-west Lancashire said there was no reason, judging from the effects of the Ballot in America and France, why we should be so anxious to adopt it in this country. But the hon. Member answered himself, because in the very next breath he told the House that the Ballot in France and America was not a secret Ballot. Then he referred to the Ballot in the Australian colonies, and to the Report which had been lately laid upon the Table upon the subject of the Ballot in those colonies. He (Mr. Stansfeld) would endeavour to show that the hon. Gentleman had not fully and accurately represented the evidence from the Australian colonies. He would read one or two passages from those various Reports. He held in his hand a memorandum upon the subject from the former Prime Minister of New South Wales, Mr. Cooper, who placed this opinion on record—

Mr. Stansfeld

“With regard to secret voting there can be no doubt whatever that it has effectually prevented bribery”—not merely intimidation it should be observed—and further, that it has already superseded the canvassing for votes.”

He came next to the colony of Victoria. Lord Canterbury was, he believed, an opponent of the Ballot, and it was true he did not express any conviction of its utility; his opinion was rather of a negative order; but still he recorded the fact, which was of very great importance to this discussion, that whatever the causes might be, intimidation and corruption were unknown. Lord Canterbury was disposed to seek elsewhere for the causes, with this exception—that he did believe—

“That the existing system under which votes are given and received has exercised a continuous and valuable influence in maintaining order and tranquillity during contested elections.”

[“Go on!”] He saw nothing in what followed to modify that opinion. Lord Canterbury held that other causes also contributed; but he admitted, as the words just quoted showed, that the system of which the Ballot was a part did exercise a valuable influence in maintaining order and tranquillity during contested elections. He came now to South Australia, and here he had to complain of his hon. Friend who had quoted Sir James Fergusson’s Report as unfavourable to the Ballot, on the ground that there was such apathy in the colony that the Ballot was not put to a fair test. But what did Sir James Fergusson say? Though Sir James Fergusson did not think the test complete in the colony over which he ruled, he was so far convinced of its value that he believed—

“If trying times were to come, the evils of corruption and intimidation would be mitigated if not prevented.”

[“Go on!” and “Order!”] He was perfectly ready to read on; but he would submit to hon. Gentlemen who invited him to do so, that he was not in the habit of endeavouring to produce a false impression. Sir James Fergusson went on to say—

“That it must be remembered that, few as were the opportunities which that system afforded for the entrance of such evils, it could not be said as yet to have felt the strain of trial or to have brought to bear upon it the ingenuity of zealous and unscrupulous persons.”

[Opposition cheers.] Precisely so; he agreed in that opinion; but it was not at all inconsistent with the statement that, in more troublous times, the evils of corruption and intimidation would be prevented by the Ballot. But what said Mr Baker, the Attorney General of South Australia, a still more important witness than Sir James Fergusson, from his greater experience? He said—

“Bribery, as the word is understood in England, is unknown. Treating and conveying electors to the poll have been resorted to to some extent, and one Member has been unseated for that conduct.”

Mr. Baker concluded in this way—

“Few persons, if any, could be found in this colony who would advocate a return to the old system of open voting, and some of the most strenuous opponents of the introduction of the Ballot would now be found among the opponents of such an alteration.”

And such, he believed, would be the case with hon. Gentlemen opposite, when they had some experience of the working of the Ballot. He came next to the colony of Tasmania. Governor Du Cane said that, taken in conjunction with the system of nomination by writing, it secured perfect order and tranquillity during the election, and permitted every voter to record his vote for the candidate of his choice without intimidation or fear of violence of any kind. Governor Du Cane went on to say that if party spirit ran high, and a wealthy candidate were determined to spend money corruptly, the system of absolute secrecy in force would not prevent his doing so, but would tend only to throw difficulties in the way of his subsequent detection. But, in the last paragraph, Governor Du Cane asked only for some arrangement which would make a scrutiny possible, so as to bring to light any act of bribery or corruption. The memorandum of Mr. Wilson, Prime Minister of Tasmania, was most important and interesting, because most appropriate to the present discussion. Mr. Wilson said that the Legislature had provided sufficient preliminary precautions against personation to ensure the rejection of any unqualified claimant; that bribery, treating, undue influence, intimidation, &c., were dealt with in some highly penal clauses; and that any Ballot paper marked otherwise than by striking out the name or names of the candidates, or otherwise defacing it, so that it might be subsequently identified, must be peremptorily rejected by the returning officer. It might well be imagined that some few years hence, after the passing of this measure, the statements of Prime Minister Wilson might be made by his right hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham, in conveying to some foreign Government his experience of the operation of the measure. These conditions and results of the Ballot were either admitted or were satisfactorily proved. It was admitted that the Ballot secured peace on the polling-day; it was not denied that it prevented intimidation; it was proved by the evidence from Australia that corruption, bribery, and intimidation had been banished from elections. He admitted that the franchise was a public trust; that the exercise of it was a duty to be performed in public, subject to the control of public opinion; but, while admitting this premise, he differed from the conclusion that had been drawn from it. When they talked of a trust, and of the way in which the faithful performance of it was to be best secured, they must ask and answer the question—What is the real nature of the trust? The hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Ridley), in a speech of great thought and ability, to which it was to be regretted that so few listened, said truly that the trust imposed upon the elector was to give an honest and a conscientious vote. The question, therefore, was—Under what conditions did they most enable him, and make it most probable not only that he could, but that he would, conscientiously fulfil that trust? He would not shrink from saying that the franchise was a trust confided to the elector, under a sense of public duty to give a free and independent vote; and, practically speaking, they could not do more to secure the fulfilment of that public duty and trust than by securing the freedom and independence of the voter, by freeing him from the necessity or the temptation of considering what he might lose or gain. As to unmanliness and hypocrisy, he would frankly admit that he resorted with unwillingness to secret voting—that one's first instinct was in favour of open voting, and that a man of moral courage needed to be convinced by an exhaustive process of reasoning before he adopted the Ballot. But experience proved that the Ballot did not work in the way opponents feared it would; it did not promote cowardice and hypocrisy, but the reverse. It was stated that under the Ballot men did not care to conceal their votes, and the reason was that when, by a system of secret voting, they had made it impossible to intimidate and difficult to bribe, they created in the minds of bribers, as well as of those who might be bribed, a conviction that the thing was useless as well as immoral; the practice stopped, moral courage reasserted its sway, and men ceased to conceal that which was no longer necessary to conceal. Therefore that seeming paradox was a convincing demonstration of the success and of the moral and beneficial influence of the Ballot. He had congratulated the House on the fact that that question was not discussed as a party question, and to his mind it was not a party question. There might be a party vote; it might happen that the majority of Conservatives would vote against the Bill; but there was nothing in the Ballot which was un-Conservative. It would be an eminently Conservative measure; it would protect all those who required protection; it would protect the tenant against the landlord, the workman against the employer; it would also not fail to protect the tradesman against the customer, the workman against the tyranny of his class, and all men who were in minorities against the tyranny of fanaticism and faction. Opinions were changing on the opposite side of the House upon that question, as evidenced in the case of the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. B. Cochrane); but he was glad to say that, even on that, the Ministerial side of the House, they were gaining converts. The reason why there were converts was, that in former times there were intelligible reasons and arguments against the Ballot, which swayed many men, but now they had complete evidence of the efficacy of the Ballot. Formerly, its enactment would have made it impossible to rest upon a restricted suffrage, so that it was a Radical measure; but now that the suffrage had been extended, it had become a Conservative measure. It was for reasons such as those—because he believed the efficacy of the Ballot to have been conclusively proved by experience, because he believed the time for its adoption had arrived in consequence of the recent large extension of the franchise, and, lastly, because they were firmly convinced that it would not, as some feared, beget cowardice, but would secure freedom and independence in the exercise and performance of a public duty, that they asked the House to enter into Committee on that Bill.

MR. PLUNKET said, he was one of those who wished to stand on those ancient ways upon which the argument against the Ballot had trodden for so long, and upon which the Prime Minister had been content to travel for more than 30 years. As regarded the exact point at issue that evening, he did not think it necessary to argue at present the narrower question as to whether a temporarily secret Ballot would be a desirable measure, because that was not the measure they were now called upon to discuss, for the measure proposed by the Government was an absolute and final secret Ballot. There were two considerations which appeared to him to meet them at the threshold of the inquiry. The first of those was that this measure had never been advocated on any higher grounds than as a choice of evils; the second was that during the 30 years that this question had been before the House and the public the weight of authority up to last year had been most decidedly hostile to this proposal of secret voting. It seemed to him that there never was in the history of this country a time when the evils for which the Ballot was prescribed as a remedy were so few, or when the evils it was calculated to produce were so perilous; that there never was a time when it was so little demanded by the call of justice, as there certainly never was a time when we were so strongly warned against its adoption by the suggestions of prudence. What was the argument formerly urged in favour of the Ballot? It was advocated as a means of checking the bribery and corruption practised by the rich and of putting an end to the intimidation exercised by the powerful. It was said to be scandalous that these evils, which the law forbade, should practically bid defiance to the law, and that immunity from punishment should encourage offenders. That was to a great extent true under the old system of the investigation into corrupt practices. Under the old election Committees witnesses had to be brought from remote places in England and Ireland, and had to be examined before a Committee composed of men wholly unskilled in such inquiries, and many of whom, moreover, were suspected to have a sympathy, prospective as well as past, in the practices they were called upon to condemn. But all that had now been changed. They had sent down the Judges of the land, men carefully educated and trained to sifting evidence, and they had armed them, moreover, with inquisitorial powers such as were conferred upon no other Judges in this country. To that they had added the infliction of heavy penalties, and the result was that the former seats of corruption and intimidation had become almost completely purified. ["No, no!"] Hon. Members said "No," but he would venture to assert that the testimony of the Judges themselves on this point was likely to carry the greatest weight. Three of the ablest Judges in England were examined before the Committee which sat upstairs in 1869, and he would ask the leave of the House to refer very shortly to the evidence they gave, as exhibiting their experience of the new Act. Baron Martin told the Committee that he had tried 13 petitions, in five of which the Members were unseated. In these inquiries he had not any cases of intimidation. But in answer to the first question asked him—namely, what was his opinion of the amount of corrupt practices which prevailed at the election of 1868, he said—"I have formed a very decided opinion that the general impression with regard to bribery is exaggerated, judging from the cases I tried;" and he adds, shortly afterwards, that in all the 13 cases he tried in which bribery was alleged in only three of them did it exist to any extent, and that it was, in his own language, "in a very great number of cases perfectly ridiculous." He added afterwards that, having gone to these trials expecting to find much difficulty in enforcing his jurisdiction, the direct contrary was the case, and that he believed there was very little perjury attempted before him, and he accounted for this absence of bribery by saying "that persons were much more afraid of this new tribunal than of the old Parliamentary Committees." Next came Mr. Justice Willes. He had rather to deal with cases of intimidation. He tried ten petitions. In two only of these were the seats vacated—namely for intimidation, and, save in these two, Mr. Justice Willes said there was nothing to make him believe that such practices were common. Mr. Justice Blackburn, the third Judge examined, made some valuable suggestions for improving the method of inquiry—but to such vulgar expedients the advocates of the Ballot would not condescend—but his evidence plainly showed the charges of illegal practices, where they were at all substantiated, were much exaggerated—that, with the exception of Stafford, he did not believe that in any case there existed a much more general system of bribery or corruption than was submitted to him formally. Then, being asked in question 12,013 as to undue influence exercised by people of property over persons dependent upon them, he said that at Oldham he struck off three or four votes on the scrutiny. But that undue influence being alleged in all the petitions,—these were his own words—

“ I think in every case it broke down, the evidence being very contemptible; in fact, the cases of intimidation might be fairly said to be frivolous and vexatious, all of them.”

The right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had said that the Ballot ought not to be resorted to until everything else had been tried and found wanting. But had this new practice been found wanting? The learned Judges whom he had quoted were no party witnesses—they had expressed no views in favour of secret voting; but they had simply placed on record facts which came under their notice, and the opinions they had formed on them, which were worth pages of the Report of the Commissioners, which were stuffed with the evidence of the agents of defeated candidates, aldermen of country towns expressing their opinions on the value of secret voting, and the opinion of editors of local newspapers, which showed on the face of it how much they had exaggerated the evils of which they complained. The change which has been produced has been for the most part the result of the mere threat of this inquiry, for certainly before the old Committees there was no want of zeal in getting up the cases, of industry in carrying them through, or grudging of expenditure in order to insure success. There might certainly be some subtle influences of intimidation, and there might be certain election evils for which even those stringent inquiries might possibly be unequal; but as far, at least, as the grosser evils were concerned, they had, with the assistance of these tribunals, been effectually dealt with. As far as our experience went, this tribunal had not had a fair trial. There had been but one General Election, and they had not yet had an opportunity of judging of its effect upon the constituencies. He did not deny that in spite of the apprehensions that were entertained relative to the searching nature of the inquiry, there were places where the habits of corruption were so deeply rooted that the constituencies were tempted to repeat them, and the commentary he would make on it was, that the investigations had been such that those places where inquiries took place would not care again to have the electric light of this searching investigation on their practices. One great argument in favour of the Ballot had been removed by the establishment of these inquiries, and the attempt that had been made through them to honestly, thoroughly, and successfully grapple with the grosser forms of bribery and intimidation. A favourite practice of the advocates of the Ballot had been to point to the Irish landlords driving up their tenants to the poll to vote against their consciences, and it was said that if they did not vote as the landlords wished the alternative was the poorhouse or the road. There might have been some foundation for that charge, though there was great exaggeration in respect to it; but, by the Irish Land Bill of last year, that evil had, at all events, been struck down; for if a tenant was now evicted on account of his vote the landlord must pay him compensation. There had also been a great change in public opinion against bribery and intimidation, which were regarded as more odious than formerly, and the influence of that public opinion must daily increase in strength with the daily increasing power of the public Press, which was not over scrupulous in denouncing such illegal practices. He would next call attention to a class of abuses which, so far from being removed by the Ballot, would be aggravated by it. The Bill as proposed by the Government was almost an inducement to personation, and treating would be more than ever prevalent. Moreover, wherever there was a class of voters ready to be bribed the facilities for bribing them safely would be enormously increased, for they would be well aware that they were only to be paid according to the result. At present if a man was discovered to be bribed the matter could be traced up to the agent; but under the present Bill such an initiatory step would be rendered almost impossible. There were besides some cases of intimidation which would not be affected at all by the Ballot, such as, for instance, where the object was not to influence the vote, but to deter voters from going to the poll, riots sometimes occurring when a party of Protestants entered a Catholic town, or a party of Catholics entered a Protestant town. He would now call attention to the offences which were classed under the head of spiritual influence and intimidation, and in doing so would endeavour, as far as possible, to avoid saying anything which could give offence in speaking of the spiritual intimidation of the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland. There were two sources of influence possessed by the Roman Catholic priests. One was of a personal kind, which sprang from the relations between the peasant and the priest, from the intimate relations existing between them, and from friendship and gratitude, for the peasant felt that the priest would stand by him in sickness and affliction. That was an influence to which, when honestly earned, they were justly entitled, provided they did not exercise it in an unjust way. Much as he deprecated the political ends for which it was sometimes used, he must admit that it was generally the ascendancy of education over ignorance, and as such with all similar influences it would be greatly weakened by the introduction of secret voting. But there was another kind of influence exercised by the Roman Catholic clergy of a very different kind, and that was the supernatural appeals which were sometimes made to the superstition of the people. Mr. Justice Keogh, in a decision at Drogheda, put this case, which was not, he said, imaginary—

Mr. Plunket

“Suppose a minister says, ‘If you do not vote in a particular way, and anything happens to you between this time and your reaching your dwelling-house, your immortal soul is imperilled.’”

In such a grave case as that the Ballot would have no effect, for the voter must believe that if he acted contrary to the solemn warning given by the priest his act would be revealed. Therefore, whatever influence which was not undue the Roman Catholic priesthood possessed would be weakened by the secret voting, and whatever illegal influence they possessed would not be touched at all. He would now turn aside for a moment to consider the argument that the Ballot was necessary in order to protect the Irish peasant from the influence which the priest would exercise upon him in favour of the “Nationalist candidates.” He thought that just now in many instances the priests rather followed than led in that movement, and might perhaps be found not the worst friends of the present Ministry in their struggle against the Nationalists. But if it was sought both to drive them into the adoption of an extreme course in politics, and also to throw them back upon the exercise of supernatural terrors, the way to do so was to deprive them of that natural influence which they had over the people. He had hitherto argued that many of the evils for which the Ballot was formerly prescribed had been grappled with and disposed of by direct measures, and that others were fast melting away under the influence of a daily stronger public opinion, while others would either be aggravated by the introduction of secret voting, or be left wholly untouched. Never before were the evils so small for which the Ballot was supposed to be a remedy, and never before were the evils so great which it would aggravate. The principal argument urged for the Ballot was that the vote was a trust. Now, he did not agree with the definition of that trust given by the right hon. Gentleman who last addressed the House. The true and constitutional view of it was this. The privilege of voting, he contended, was given to the voter, not for himself alone, therefore he must not give it for a bribe or yield it for a threat. It was given to him clothed with a trust for the whole of the rest of the community, and therefore he must be responsible to the community for the manner in which he exercised it. He would not further enlarge on that argument. It had been expressed in the most clear and able way by Lord Palmerston, Lord Russell, Sir Robert Peel, and Mr. Mill. He would rather refer to the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister of the Crown had explained his change of opinion on this subject. When the right hon. Gentleman came down to the House last year to record his conversion, he said—

“At other times, whether rightly or wrongly, we were quite content to hear the question argued as it was argued by Lord Palmerston. Lord Palmerston had paid great attention to the question of the Ballot—at least, he felt a great interest in it. He always spoke upon it with much ability, and he usually founded himself on this view of the subject—that the franchise was to be viewed as a trust, to be exercised by a limited portion of the community for the benefit of the whole, and that the whole community had just the same kind of right to know how that trust was exercised on their behalf by the limited portion of the community intrusted with the franchise, as the public out-of-doors have to know how the power intrusted to their representatives in Parliament is exercised by those representatives within these walls.”—[3 Hansard, cciii. 1029-30.]

And then, having, as he understood the language of the right hon. Gentleman, argued that when in 1868 household franchise was actually conceded to boroughs, there was an admission in principle of household suffrage both in boroughs and counties, he went on to state—

“That being so, I think the first view of the question as it stands is this—that there is no longer, properly so called, a limited constituency acting and exercising a trust on behalf of the whole people; but that the basis on which Parliament desires to found the representative system of the country is a basis not less wide than that of the entire nation, setting aside those who may be subject to positive disqualifications; and, consequently, that the trust which is exercised by the father of a family, or by an adult male, in giving a vote for a Member of Parliament is practically a trust which he holds mainly on behalf of his wife and children, all other persons being presumably entitled to act with him on a footing of equality in giving a vote.”—[Ibid. 1031.]

Assuming that to be a full and accurate statement of Lord Palmerston's argument, he asked leave to submit to the House figures to show what, in point of fact, was the extent of this marvellous change in the numbers of the enfranchised as compared with the unenfranchised. He had been obliged to take the numbers from the former Census, not having had access to the new. In 1866 the adult male population of England and Wales was 5,230,573; the number of electors before the Reform Bill of 1867 was 1,056,000, but now it was 2,000,000. Therefore, the condition of the unenfranchised in round numbers was that, whereas before the Reform Bill of 1867 they were 4,000,000, as compared with 1,000,000 electors, now they were 3,000,000 as compared with 2,000,000 electors. If the argument were ever true, solid, and sound, that whilst a large portion of the people were unenfranchised, the remaining portion should exercise their franchise openly and as a trust, he confessed he did not see in what material degree the force of the reasoning had been altered. And when he turned to Ireland, with its £4 rated qualification in towns and its £12 qualification in counties, he asked what practical value was there in the phrase “presumably entitled.” Universal suffrage was the necessary logical consequence. The proper course would no doubt have been to introduce universal suffrage first, and then give Ballot; but the course now recommended was to introduce Ballot first, and then give universal suffrage—which was rather an Irish mode of putting the cart before the horse. But that was not the whole argument. What Lord Palmerston said was quite different. He said, on the 16th of June, 1865—

“But I deny that the vote is a personal right. I say it is a trust. Even if universal suffrage were adopted, it would be a trust which each person would have confided to him for the benefit of the nation.”—[3 Hansard, clxxx. 426.]

Therefore, he could not say that the argument of trust, as explained by Lord Palmerston, had hitherto been satisfactorily answered. He had endeavoured to show, on the one hand, that the evils which Ballot was intended to cure had been already otherwise dealt with, and that, on the other, the arguments formerly advanced against Ballot had not been materially diminished. He now asked, what would be the result of adopting this Bill? The practical result would be this—at the time of the election the large influence of public opinion, but which was by no means an undue influence either in a legal or moral sense, and which would otherwise moderate men's passions, would be extinguished. Suppose a General Election took place at a time when there was a question of great public interest and popular excitement before the electors—one of those questions between capital and labour which were at hand, and which would soon become the turning points of electoral contests, did they not think that in the secrecy of the Ballot-box it would not be the wise and more prudent counsels of the best informed that would prevail? The advice listened to would rather be that of those who pandered to the prejudices and passions. And if a religious question had to be considered, was it the voice of wise and Christian charity which would be heeded? No; but the voices of those who delivered the most exciting harangues. Of course it was impossible to predict accurately what would be the result of this leap not in—but into the dark. Some people thought it would strengthen one side of the House; some thought it would strengthen the other; but upon one point they were all agreed, and that was that it would make a great change in the position of some hon. Gentlemen. The line was drawn, on the other side of the House, with a terrible rigidity, and whatever else might occur, it was admitted that the Whigs must go. This was very hard upon the Whigs. It was hard that the right hon. Gentleman should call upon them to perform this most crucial test of devotion. They had been his most humble and obedient followers. The right hon. Gentleman never was a Whig himself; but the Whigs had followed him through the Land Bill, which they did not like, and through the Irish Church Bill, which many hated, and now, in the fulness of their strength, in the middle of their Parliamentary life, when they had three years of it still before them, they were called upon, not indeed to perform “the happy despatch,” but, by a kind of penultimate act of self-devotion, to immure themselves for the remainder of their Parliamentary life in the condemned cell of public existence. Consider what they had done: they had been dragged in triumph by the right hon. Gentleman, they had supported his Land and Church Bills, they had proposed Amendments and withdrawn them, they had made speeches and voted against them, and these old Whigs, descended into the arena of their last great fight, they seemed to exclaim with the gladiators of old—

“Ave, Cæsar imperator, morituri te salutant!”

He deeply regretted what he saw and knew was coming, for he believed that the great old Whig party had done more than any other, moderately and wisely, for the benefit of this country; but it was an old saying that “misery acquaints men with strange bedfellows.” He believed that the extinction of the Whigs was but a fair forecast and illustration of the result of this measure. It would have the effect of driving out of election contests many respectable and moderate men, because when they found they were absolutely deprived of all influence, and that their individual votes were swamped by the numerical superiority of those opposed to them, they would take less interest in elections than they did now. He hoped that hereafter, when the Whigs had paid this penalty, and when, perhaps, from the Speaker’s Gallery they looked down upon the better and wiser and more moderate men who had superseded them, they would be consoled with the assurance of their Radical Friends that, although they had destroyed themselves, they had saved their country. It was as well to consider the exact circumstances under which the Bill was introduced, and whether this was a convenient time to make the experiment as a nice balance of evils. He was not speaking of the convenience of the Minister or of the safety of the Administration, but of the character of the House and of the safety of the country; and on this view of the matter the House would permit him to quote a warning uttered in 1838 by Sir Robert Peel, who said—

“In times of perfect tranquillity the Ballot might possibly be merely a delusion. But in times of great public calamity or excitement it might be the instrument of irreparable evil. There might prevail a temporary clamour for war or for peace; unreasonable prejudices with regard to public matters of deep interest; there might be false impressions purposely created by a Government, during the prevalence of which it might be deeply and permanently injurious to the public interest to have a general election, the voters being freed from all control of publicity. The fever of the moment, the popular cry might deaden the influence of reason and the influence of property much more effectually under a system of secret than of open voting. I know it will be said that this implies distrust of the constituent body; that it presumes they are unfit to be trusted with the elective franchise. It certainly does imply that there may be occasions when the public mind is for a season under the influence of prejudice, of passion, of unwise impatience; and that it is for the public interest that a public trust should be discharged under responsibility to public opinion, to that sober public opinion which a few months afterwards will pronounce judgment, subject also to the present control which property and station and more enlightened views may legitimately exercise, and can exercise with greater effect at such seasons of excitement under the present system of voting than under the Ballot.”

—[3 Hansard, xl. 1207.]

After this warning the Ballot was rejected by a majority of 117; and was the warning less applicable in these days of household suffrage than it was in the easygoing times in which it was delivered? Would the Ballot be more or less dangerous than it was then? In Ireland secret voting would, in this sense, now amount almost to a plébiscite; and he was astonished at the rashness of the Minister who seized upon this moment to try such a dangerous experiment. He doubted very much whether hon. Members were aware of the feeling which existed just now in Ireland. He could warn the Minister that a terrible commentary was about to be pronounced on the legislation of the last few years. He wished to speak fairly and freely on this subject. He was not, on this occasion, going to find fault with the Land Bill or the Church Bill. He hoped that those measures would, in the long run, produce much good. But time must be allowed, and the introduction of the Ballot at Irish elections just now would create difficulties, and raise obstacles in the way of attaining that good. He was not speaking at haphazard; he knew what he said to be true; and the opinion he expressed was that of many of the ablest and the most experienced men in Ireland, some of whom had sat on the front bench opposite as Members of a Liberal Administration. It was their positive conviction that, Ballot or no Ballot, a General Election in Ireland would be a most dangerous experiment; but with the Ballot the danger would be doubled. Where was it in Ireland that they found the antipathy to this country most strongly? The upper classes were our friends; but as we descended in the electoral strata we came upon "home rule," "Repeal," and "Fenianism." The strongest and the largest and most ignorant part of the population and of the electors were of more extreme views. Was this, then, the time to fling away any wholesome influence in Ireland? And was this the kind of constituency to be intrusted with the Ballot? Of late years the Government had reversed our former Irish policy—but with what arguments, and what language, was the change accompanied? they had disestablished the Protestant Church in Ireland because it was said to be an alien Church; they had transferred a large amount of property from one class to another, because it was said that the terms upon which it was held were indefensible and often "felonious;" but the people of Ireland, while they admitted the premises, drew a different conclusion. The Irish Roman Catholic lower orders said the Protestant Church was an alien Church, because it was an English Church; that its pastors were, wherever they lived, men whom, as the centres of material prosperity and blessing, they personally loved, but whom, as a class, they hated, because they looked on them as the sentinels of the "English garrison." They agreed also that the tenure on which landed property was held in Ireland was indefensible and often felonious, but that it was indefensible because it was the result of English conquest and tyranny, but added that tyranny commenced with the first English King who crossed the Irish Channel. They accepted the Church Bill with indifference, and though they accepted the Land Bill gladly it was only as an instalment, and their answer to every appeal was that they would never be satisfied until they were masters in their own land, and Ireland was governed indeed by Irish ideas, on the principle of "Ireland for the Irish." And what was the next step taken by the Government. They held Ireland down by a Coercion Bill, which was absolutely necessary as he contended, and besides that they had altogether suspended the Constitution in one part of Ireland, which was viewed as an insult by all those whom they were pleased to call the Irish people; and now they offered the country an irresponsible vote. When they had applied their favourite policy—blown hot and cold—flattered the Irish people first and then coerced them, and then brought the Ballot into operation, he warned the Prime Minister—and it was not his individual opinion—that 60, 70, 80, some said 90 men, would be returned pledged to opinions as strong as those which had been recently heard, by some with wonder, from the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Martin). He wanted to know how they were to govern Ireland under such circumstances? Would the conduct of Imperial business be easy? would the government of Ireland then be possible in such a House? He did not wish to be misunderstood. He had always opposed the Church Bill, both for what it did and for what it threatened; but knowing that this evil has been committed, he did desire to reap the good that might follow from that for which so much had been sacrificed, and he hoped that if the absolute religious equality now attained by the Irish Church Bill were fairly, fully, and firmly carried out, great good, he believed, would ultimately result from that principle; and, as to the Land Bill, for the second reading of which he had voted, although he thought certain sections of it bore hardly on the landlords, he also hoped it would ultimately do great good. But for all that, they must have time—quiet and rest from reckless agitation. What he had said probably was as painful to the House to hear as it was for him to speak; but he did not want them to go away under the impression that the gloomy picture he had drawn of Ireland was one without the element of hope. There was one element in Ireland on which, if allowed time to develop, they might build the most sanguine anticipations. Why was it that to offer the Ballot to the Universities would be an insult, and that in Scotland bribery and coercion were practically unknown? Because the Scotch people had long tasted the blessings of education. Would the Prime Minister not give time in England for the Elementary Education Act to produce its natural fruits? Would he not give the great system of national education for some time in operation in Ireland an opportunity of justifying its existence? It was a remarkable feature in the evidence taken before the Committee that in the rural districts of the West and South of Ireland the younger generation of voters could read and write—the elder generation could not write at all; the people were, therefore, in the most dangerous of all positions—they had just enough information to understand and be moved by the maddening appeals that were so sedulously addressed to them, without having sufficient education to understand their opportunities of material prosperity in the present and of real progress for the future. Was this, he asked, the way in which you should endeavour to withdraw the electors from whatever good influences were about them, and expose them ever to the full force of those evil advisers, whose wild appeals to their passions would surely be obeyed if, in the excited moment of an election, ignorant or half-educated electors were called upon to give a secret and irresponsible vote? Was it not melancholy that in Ireland, where material prosperity was advancing with such strides, and which had so many and so great resources to be developed, that the people should ever more be recurring to the miserable past, and brooding over a policy of hate? Would it not be well to give time for them to learn that there was something else in the union between the two countries than that which was evil—that they might have, if they would but be practical and earnest, all that made life valuable in the presence of their industry, and in the future a prospect as bright as the most devoted patriot could desire?

Mr. Plunket

MR. JAMES moved that the debate be now adjourned.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter after Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 23rd June, 1871.

MINUTES.]—Sat First in Parliament—The Lord Howard de Walden, after the death of his father.

PUBLIC BILLS — First Reading — Prevention of Crime* (207); Metropolitan Building Act (1855) Amendment* (208).

Second Reading—Tancred's Charities* (91).

Select Committee—Locomotives* (130-209), The Earl Cowper and The Lord Ravensworth added.

Committee — Report — Pensions Commutation* (128).

Third Reading—Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, Amendment (193), and passed.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) ACT (1870) AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Lord Cairns.)

(NOS. 185, 193.) THIRD READING.

DEBATE RESUMED.

Order of the Day for resuming the adjourned debate, on the Motion for the Third Reading, read.

Debate resumed accordingly.

And after short debate, on Question, "That the Bill be read 3^a." Resolved in the Affirmative; Bill read 3^a accordingly.

LORD GREVILLE moved the Proviso to which he had alluded on the previous evening—

"Nothing in this Act contained shall be deemed to affect the rights of tenants on estates conveyed prior to the passing of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, under the provisions of the Acts twelfth and thirteenth Victoria, chapter seventy-seven, and twenty-first and twenty-second Victoria, chapter seventy-two."

LORD CAIRNS objected to the clause as unnecessary, and likely, moreover, to be mischievous. The Act of last Session gave existing tenants certain rights without any reference to the manner in which the estates had been dealt with or had come into the hands of the owners; and the only doubt which had been suggested was whether those rights might not be lost or endangered since the passing of the Act by their being unnoticed in conveyances since executed by the Landed Estates Court. The object of the Bill was simply to provide that such rights should not be thereby jeopardized; and to add a clause of a qualifying or cautionary character as to the rights conferred by the Act would raise more doubts than it would allay. He thought the noble Lord's object would be met by a verbal Amendment in the Preamble.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR concurred in the noble and learned Lord's statement. A panic had been created by Lord Justice Christian's judgment, of which there was now an authentic statement, and which was certainly couched in terms extremely unfortunate. No serious doubt, however, had been raised except as to conveyances executed since the passing of the Act.

LORD GREVILLE, after this explanation, said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

THE ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSION—
DR. MORGAN'S CHARITY, BRIDGWATER.
PETITION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON presented a Petition of certain Trustees of Dr. Morgan's Foundation at Bridgwater against the scheme of the Endowed Schools Commissioners with respect to that Foundation. The Petitioners stated:—In the year 1723, Dr. Morgan, an inhabitant of Bridgwater, founded a charity for the education of 30 boys. One of the strongest provisions of the founder's will was that which insisted upon the scholars receiving an education in accordance with the teaching and doctrines of the Church of England as by law established; and he also enjoined that the same principle should apply to the whole management of the charity. Several changes had, however, taken place. At the commencement of the present century, after the passing of the Tests and Corporation Act, the Court of Chancery made a change in the general system of the school; and fresh trustees were appointed; but the Court took particular care that those gentlemen should be members of the Church of England. Later on, in 1857, a scheme was put forth under the authority of the noble and learned Lord the Master of the Rolls. Under that scheme the whole system of the school was carefully revised, but Church of England teaching was maintained as rigidly as before; for the trustees, master, and boys on the foundation were required to be members of the Established Church; attendance at Church on Sundays was enforced, and the whole educational arrangements were subject to the principles of the Church. Under that system he believed the school had continued to flourish; and though no "conscience clause" had been introduced Dissenters had had free recourse to the school, and no complaint of the management had been made. But the Endowed Schools Commissioners had taken the school in hand, and had prepared a scheme which, he regretted to say, created an entire revolution of the will of Dr. Morgan. The scheme, indeed, recited that the schools should be conducted on the principles of the Church of England; but there were no provisions for seeing this. The Governing Body were not to be members exclusively of the Church of England; a portion were to be selected by the Town Council, which included Dissenters as well as Churchmen; no qualification was assigned to the master; the boys were to be entirely free in reference to any particular religious teaching; and, lastly, the Head Master and trustees were to define and settle among themselves what the religious teaching should be. So that, whatever might be the intent of his noble Friend (the Marquess of Ripon) and his Colleagues, this recital of their scheme amounted to a total perversion of and departure from the spirit, if not the letter, of Dr. Morgan's foundation. What were the results of this scheme of the Commissioners? The local privileges of particular classes who had claims on the charity were swept away; and in this respect he maintained that the Commissioners infringed upon the spirit of the 11th section of the Endowed Schools Act, which provided that in case of local or other privileges due regard should be paid to the educational interests of such classes. Their scheme also contravened the 19th clause of the Act, which provided that no provision should be made respecting religious instruction, attendance at public worship, or the religious belief of the Governing Body, without the consent of the Governing Body—and he doubted whether the trustees had sanctioned this scheme, for the Petition had been signed by a portion of them. The result of this departure from the provisions of the founder's will would be greatly to diminish the teaching and education of the Church of England, inasmuch as the school board at Bridgwater contemplated, in consequence of the proposed change, the formation of a new rate-aided school, where exclusive Church of England teaching would, of course, become absolutely impossible. Had there been any maladministration of the charity—any complaint or reproach directed against its management—there might possibly have been some justification for a change; but the circumstances connected with the charity remained practically the same as they were at the time of Dr. Morgan's decease. He hoped the Commissioners did not adopt the principles laid down by Mr. Hobhouse, who appeared to hold foundations of this nature in slight esteem, attributing to them more harm than good. A man with such opinions was hardly fit to exercise judicial functions in this matter, and the general application of his views would lead to wholesale confiscation. After the experience we now had of Nonconformists and Churchmen uniting to promote the primary education of the poor, he, for one, could not believe that the former, who had a deep interest in this matter of charities, were prepared to lend their sanction to the principles enunciated in the scheme of the Commissioners. The principle was equally applicable to Nonconformist endowments, of which there were a good many in the neighbourhood of Bridgwater. Proximus ardet Ucalegon—and unless the Nonconformists united with Churchmen on such a question they would be the next sufferers. He admitted the necessity of variations from the founder's intentions to meet the altered circumstances of the times; but he objected to those intentions being absolutely set aside, as unjust to the charities and likely to prejudice the cause of education.

Lord Greville

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, it was impossible under the Act that the Commissioners could have strictly maintained the founder's will with regard to Church of England membership and teaching. He thought the noble Earl had overlooked the provisions of the Endowed Schools Act, which left the Commissioners no option but to open the school to Nonconformists under a conscience clause. On this point they had no discretion. As to the Governing Body, the four members to be elected by the Town Council and the school board might possibly be Dissenters, though he should hope these bodies would see the inconvenience, not to say impropriety, of selecting Nonconformists trustees for a Church of England school; but, even if they did so, the Church of England trustees would always be a large majority. There were six ex officio governors, four of whom must necessarily be Churchmen, as they were the occupants of ecclesiastical offices; and six others were named, all members of the Church of England. The latter were to be reduced by death to four, who would be co-opted governors—that was, persons elected by the whole body—and they would, therefore, in all probability, be Churchmen. The noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) had spoken slightly of the recital; but in his opinion they governed the whole scheme, and no religious teaching could be given except that of the Church of England, Nonconformists parents being able to claim exemption from this for their children. He could not see, therefore, that the Church of England character of the school was superseded. As to local privileges, the only thing which could be done under the 11th section of the Act was to improve the school generally, and it was a great improvement to throw a school open and subject the local scholars to competition with others. No want was so great as that of good schools for the lower portion of the middle classes, and except in exceptional cases endowed schools should not be devoted to primary instruction. He attached great value to the 19th section; but having, since his return to this country, examined the scheme, it did not appear to him to contravene it. The religious instruction obviously could not be defined in the scheme, unless the Commissioners came to terms with the Governing Body. There must in these cases be difficulties on both sides. The object was to make these ancient endowments as largely useful as possible, and by throwing open the school, though contrary to the intentions of the founder, to all denominations, the Commissioners were simply acting conformably with the Act; while the new Governing Body would give the inhabitants a fair guarantee that the school would be made generally beneficial to the town.

LORD CAIRNS said, that considerable inconvenience would arise from the discussion of this question at the present stage, and that the proper time for raising the question would be when the scheme was laid upon the Table in pursuance of the Act. He also desired to say that a conversation of this kind must not be taken to represent the opinion of their Lordship's House; and that if the question ultimately came before them he hoped one particular view expressed by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Ripon) would not escape discussion. A great number of educational endowments had hitherto been used for the purpose of primary education in particular localities; but by the Act of last Session there was to be a justification that did not otherwise exist for diverting endowments which had hitherto been properly used for primary education, to promote intermediate education. In particular localities, under particular circumstances, education endowments might be better used for intermediate education than for primary education; but he wished public opinion to be formed on that point, and that not because a Bill had been passed for primary education the public were to lose the advantage of primary education which had hitherto been provided for them wholly or in part through the medium of endowments.

EARL NELSON said, that after what had been stated by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Ripon) he would not refer to the special scheme that he imagined was before their Lordships. One general principle appeared to run through all these schemes, but they must be careful to confine endowments to the classes for which they were intended, and as far as could be to the neighbourhood, though it appeared to him there was a risk of their departing from that proper and just arrangement. In this scheme certain advantages were to be given to elementary education, and at first it would appear it was intended to confine it to the class for which it was intended; but he was afraid, after what had been stated, there was a risk of the endowment made for one class being used for the benefit of the class above them—which would be very unjust.

LORD LYTTELTON said, he did not know what Parliament was likely to do with the various schemes which would be laid before them in the course of this and next year; but if every scheme was to be made the subject of a special debate the time of Parliament would be greatly occupied. In his opinion, the general questions of the relation between endowments and elementary education, of local or other privileges, and the amount of deference to be paid to founders' wills, would be more conveniently discussed this day week, on the Motion of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) respecting Emanuel Hospital. As to this particular case, the new trustees would be guilty of an express breach of trust, for which they could be called to account by a proper tribunal, if they did not take care that the children were instructed in the doctrines of the Church of England. It was true his brother Commissioners and himself had not gone into the details of religious teaching, but had simply provided that it should be given at the discretion of the governors and Head Master; but the general words of the first paragraph governed the whole scheme, and no other religious teaching than that of the Church of England could be given. The Commissioners had only obeyed the injunctions of the Act in admitting Dissenting children as day scholars under a conscience clause; and as to local privileges, they held that the best thing for the educational interests of the class who had hitherto enjoyed the benefits of a foundation—especially in a small place like Bridgwater—was to establish a thoroughly good school, and to throw it open freely to all who could avail themselves of it. With regard to Clause 19 of the Act, the Commissioners held themselves bound to give it a strict construction. The whole tendency and spirit of the Act was, in the view of the Commissioners, to give the largest freedom to the local managers and authorities in the conduct of the school, and especially in respect to its religious conduct. In the Ilminster school case, which was well known to lawyers, the school was held to be strictly a Church of England one, and the Court of Chancery was called upon to re-constitute the school, and to nominate the first Governing Body, and it was asked—as the Endowed School Commissioners were asked in the present instance to do—to lay down the regulation that nobody should be in the Governing Body who was not a member of the Church of England. The Ilminster school was subject to a conscience clause, and the Court of Chancery said it was a question whether a certain portion of the Governing Body should not consist of members of other religious denominations besides the Church of England, and the Court decided that the question should be left open. It might well be that the best plan would be that a majority—and a decided majority—of the trustees should belong to the Church of England, and that there should also be a certain number of Dissenting trustees to watch over the interests of the Dissenting children admitted by law to the benefits of the school. All that the Commissioners said, however, was that they felt themselves bound not to go beyond the terms of the Act in a case of that kind. In Bridgwater there existed ample provision for the elementary education of the poor; and there was a great need for the means of education for the class just above those for whom that education was intended. For that particular class it was now proposed that there should be a church school, teaching the doctrines of the Church of England; and if there was any class which had been more than another withdrawn from the influence of that Church it was that very lower-middle class for which they were providing in this scheme. Without now entering into the question of the effect which ought to be given to the will of the founders, he would only state that the Commissioners were simply bound by the Act of Parliament which they were directed to administer; and there was no sanctity and no perpetuity attributed to the will of the founders by that Act, except what would be found in the Preamble, in which they were told to carry into effect the main designs of the founders, which were construed to be the putting of a liberal education within the reach of the children, not of any one class, but of all classes. He should be prepared on the future occasion to which he had referred to argue more generally the question of the respect which ought to be paid to founders' wills, as well as various other points which could then be more conveniently dealt with.

Petition ordered to lie on the Table.

PREVENTION OF CRIME BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for the more effectual Prevention of Crime—Was presented by The Lord CHANCELLOR; read 1st. (No. 207.)

House adjourned at half past Six o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 23rd June, 1871.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Euphrates Valley Railway, appointed.

Report—Conventual and Monastic Institutions [No. 315].

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

PUBLIC BILLS—Report of Select Committee—Inclosure Law Amendment* [No. 314].

Report—Local Government Supplemental (No. 3)* [178-211]; Inclosure Law Amendment* [32-212].

The House met at Two of the clock.

SUNDAY OBSERVANCE ACT.

QUESTION.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, considering the annoyance that is being given to many poor persons by unadvised prosecutions under the Act 29 Charles II., he will bring in a short Act rendering it necessary that for the next year all prosecutions under the said Act shall only be by leave of the Attorney General?

MR. BRUOE: Sir, the Act of Charles II. deals generally with two classes of cases. One of them is that which has lately been the special object of public interest—namely, Sunday trading; the other is the question of labour. The Act is, undoubtedly, in many respects inapplicable at the present time. It is an Act which it is simply impossible to enforce, and it was only retained on the Statute Book because of the good sense with which, on the whole, its provisions had been applied. There is, I believe, a general desire—not, perhaps, quite universal, but very general—that the Sunday should be devoutly observed throughout the country, and I do not think that either Parliament or the country is prepared to dispense altogether with legislation on the subject; but these offences, when they are committed, are offences not so much against individuals as offences against the public sense of decency and order. Therefore, I think that there should be some authority interposed between the common informer and magistrate. Whether the Attorney General is the proper person to interpose in these cases—which are cases of summary jurisdiction before a magistrate—is a matter about which I have great doubt, and it is a resource to which I should only be disposed to resort on being satisfied that there were no other means of dealing with the difficulty. Another course has suggested itself to me, and it is one that I venture to hope may meet with general acceptance by the House. I need hardly say that at this period of the Session no proposal could be brought forward with any chance of success unless it was substantially approved of by hon. Gentlemen on both sides. I have not yet worked out the details of the proposal so completely as to lay it now before the House; but I hope to be able to do so in a few days.

THE QUEEN AND THE POPE.

QUESTIONS.

MR. WHALLEY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, with reference to a statement in the Public Journals that Her Majesty conveyed to the Pope congratulations on the event of his Jubilee, Whether he feels at liberty to inform the House of the terms of such communication?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, on the 13th of June an Instruction was addressed to Mr. Jervis, at Rome, to the effect that he was to convey to the Pope, on behalf of Her Majesty, in the usual manner, Her Majesty's congratulations on the anniversary of his accession. I hardly need add that in this communication there is nothing of a political character, and that so far as regards the personal position and dignity of the Pope, who was a Sovereign, but who has been dispossessed of his dominions, which now constitute part of the Kingdom of Italy, it was the feeling of the Government, and I think it will be the feeling of the House, that the duty of expressing personal respect and regard should not only not be omitted, but should be even more sedulously observed than before.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Was the communication made under the powers of the Diplomatic Relations Act of 1848?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not able to say whether that was so, or whether it might not be perfectly possible to make a communication of this kind without reference to the Diplomatic Relations Act. George IV. contrived to present a portrait of himself to Pope Pius VII. before the Diplomatic Relations Act existed. If it was possible in the past it might be possible again, irrespective of the statute, to convey such a very simple message as I have stated to the House.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

LORD'S DAY OBSERVANCE.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BRADY rose to call attention to the present unequal enforcement of the Act of 29 Charles 2, c. 7; and to move—

"That this House deprecates the recent attempts to put in force the Act 29 Charles 2, c. 7, and is of opinion that the said Act should be repealed."

The hon. Member was proceeding to speak upon his Motion, when—

MR. SPEAKER: A Notice has been given by an hon. Member (Mr. P. A. Taylor) of his intention to propose, on the 18th of July, the repeal of the Act the 29th of Charles II., and that Notice having been given some days ago, the hon. Member for Leitrim wishes now to move that this House deprecates the attempt to put the Act of Charles II. in force, and that it is the opinion of the House that the said Act should be repealed. Now, there is a Rule of the House that when a matter has been expressly set down for consideration, no hon. Member can anticipate it by raising a discussion on the subject. I think the course pursued by the hon. Gentleman would be an infringement of that Rule.

METROPOLIS—THE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT—CONSTITUTION HILL.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. HAVILAND-BURKE, in rising to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to direct that carriage traffic may have free access to the Houses of Parliament by way of Constitution Hill," said, that during the present Session that part of St. James's Park between St. James's Palace and Storey's Gate had been thrown open to carriage traffic, and he might appeal to the general sense of the House that it had been found a very great convenience. The object of his Motion was to complete the thoroughfare from Hyde Park Corner through Constitution Hill, past St. James's Palace to Storey's Gate. He had formerly asked that there might be carriage traffic through the Horse Guards also; but, at the request of hon. Gentlemen, he had postponed that part of the question. If he thought the opening of Constitution Hill to carriage traffic would be the slightest inconvenience to Her Majesty he would be the last to propose it; but the House must recollect that the traffic existed already on one side, from St. James's Palace to Buckingham Gate, and it would be almost impossible that there should be any additional inconvenience from what he proposed. Very great expense had been incurred, which somebody would have to pay, by opening the new road from Piccadilly into Park Lane. That new road would be found to be a great convenience. But one of the advantages of the course which he proposed was, that it would be attended with no additional expense whatever, while the general traffic would be relieved, and the convenience of Gentlemen both in that House and out of it would be promoted. He begged to move the Address of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to direct that carriage traffic may have free access to the Houses of Parliament by way of Constitution Hill,"—(Mr. Haviland-Burke,)

—instead thereof.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the subject was one considerably larger than his hon. and learned Friend seemed to suppose. His hon. and learned Friend appeared to think that it was a mere question of allowing certain additional modes of traffic to pass along the road which now existed without a shilling of additional expense. That was not the view of the Government. The present road was of very moderate and limited width, and of very inadequate capacity for horse traffic and carriage traffic taken together. As this was a gravel road, it could not receive any considerable access of traffic without re-construction; and if thoroughfares here and elsewhere were to be opened through the Parks, the question was who should bear the expense? If they were to be altered for the general advantage of the Metropolis to any extent, was the nation to be at the charge of supplying the Metropolis with that portion of its roads? This was a point requiring a good deal of consideration; and as the widening of the road would require some time, it was not a practical question which concerned the convenience of Members of Parliament during the present Session. In the view of the Government the position of the Parks in reference to the Metropolis was a subject which required serious attention. On the one hand, they should not offer an undue and needless obstruction to the traffic of the Metropolis; and, on the other hand, they should be preserved for their great and primary object—the enjoyment of the mass of the people. That was a serious question; and, in the opinion of his Colleagues and himself, it required careful examination with reference to larger considerations than those embraced in the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend. On that ground, and not because the Government were prepared to say there was no case for consideration, he hoped his hon. and learned Friend would not press his Amendment to a division, for, if so, it would be the duty of the Government to vote for the Speaker leaving the Chair to go into Committee.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he would remind the House that the question of making the Parks the medium of carriage traffic had already been referred to a Select Committee, which recommended one alteration—namely, the admission of carriages to the Park by Marlborough House; but, with that exception, were of opinion that the Parks should be jealously guarded against the admission of carriage traffic.

After short conversation,

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 89; Noes 61: Majority 28.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £30,072, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for the Maintenance and Repair of the Royal Palaces."

MR. AYRTON said, it had been found possible to make a reduction in the item of £15,000 for the drainage works at Windsor Castle. On the other hand, there would be an increased outlay upon Frogmore. The result would be that the total Vote required for Royal Palaces would be reduced from £51,032 to £42,072.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he believed that considerable difference of opinion existed with regard to the plan of drainage for Windsor Castle, and asked the nature of the amended plan adopted.

MR. DILLWYN called attention to the expenditure of over £18,000 upon Royal Palaces not in the occupation of Her Majesty. The House would refuse nothing that was required for the use and enjoyment of Her Majesty; but a large expenditure was incurred in keeping up Kensington and other palaces, which were not used by Her Majesty, and which might be turned to profitable account. Some of them were occupied by Royal and noble persons, but they would doubtless be better pleased with more convenient abodes; some of the palaces might, of course, be regarded as national monuments, and be devoted to national purposes. He therefore simply referred to the matter, in the hope that at some future time the opinion of Her Majesty might be consulted, and a useless expenditure saved to the country.

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works was not warranted in proposing, without Notice, an increase in the expenditure upon Frogmore.

MR. EYKYN said, that very serious difficulty would arise unless the Board of Works carried out a uniform system of drainage at Windsor from the Castle and the town.

MR. MUNTZ said, he had found from experience that the first result of attempting land irrigation by means of sewage was a considerable expense; and the second result was an indictment for a nuisance, together with an application to the Court of Chancery for an injunction. That, at least, was the case in a vast number of towns. He (Mr. Muntz) hoped that the right hon. Gentleman had taken these subjects into his consideration, and he thought that until some plan of sewage irrigation was found by experience to be unobjectionable, it would be dangerous to drain Windsor Castle with a view to irrigation. Eton College was not far from the Castle, and anything which interfered with the sanitary state of the district would be prejudicial to the health of the boys at the College.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN called attention to the neglected state of some portion of the ground outside Buckingham Palace, and would suggest that the dead wall in front of Grosvenor Place should be replaced by an iron railing.

MR. CANDLISH asked for an explanation of the item of £550 for contribution in lieu of rates, and other hon. Members of other items.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. AYRTON said, he had merely proposed a convenient mode of proceeding; but if the Committee objected to the course and required more detailed explanation, the Vote had better be postponed.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, it would be unreasonable that the right hon. Gentleman should be called upon to withdraw the whole Vote, merely because an alteration had taken place in the views of the Department with regard to the scheme of diverting the sewage at Windsor Castle. But it would be satisfactory to have more explanations on the Vote.

MR. AYRTON said, as it seemed to be the opinion of the Committee that he should proceed with the Vote, he would give some further information; but he desired it to be understood that he had no wish to take the Committee by surprise. The plan for the drainage works had been provided by a gentleman outside the Board of Works; but, as it was objected to, it was revised at the Office of Works, where there were gentlemen quite as competent to deal with the question as any persons outside. The result was that it was found that the service could be performed in a more skilful and economical manner. Instead of expensive mechanical contrivances being resorted to, advantage would be taken of the natural incline of the ground, and the whole work would be done by gravitation without machinery, while the irrigation would be removed to such a distance from Windsor Park as to relieve the question from all embarrassment. It was for this reason that the Board of Works had been able to reduce the proposed expenditure. Having been a member of the Committee which investigated different projects for the utilization of sewage, he was enabled to say that the proposed scheme was well considered and could be carried out. If the town of Windsor made any proposal to him on the subject of drainage he should be prepared to consider it; but at present no such proposal had been made, and he thought Windsor Castle should rather set the example in diverting its sewage. As to the increased Vote for Frogmore House and grounds, it would be applied to necessary repairs.

COLONEL BARTELOT observed that there were parties practically conversant with the efficient carrying out of drainage arrangements, and if competent persons were not employed in the first instance great additional expense would be occasioned. He wished to have an assurance from the right hon. Gentleman that persons properly qualified would be employed in carrying out these complicated arrangements. He also desired to know whether contracts were made for such works?

MR. AYRTON said, that all works of any importance, not being mere repairs, were the subject of special contracts. There was a general contract, the result of tender by competent persons; but in cases of special work not within the limits of the running contract, regular estimates were made and put out to tender.

In reply to Mr. CANDLISH,

MR. AYRTON said, that Holyrood Palace was certainly not in a fit state to enable Her Majesty to remain in it one day on her journey to or from Balmoral, and the expenditure proposed to be laid out in necessary repairs was extremely small.

MR. CANDLISH said, he must object to the item of £550, and moved that it be left out.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £550, for Contributions in lieu of Rates, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Candlish.)

MR. AYRTON said, the contribution had been made in lieu of rates, reserving the rights of the Crown.

MR. EYKYN said, he must defend the item. There was a large area in Windsor which, being Royal property, could not be rated, and an additional burden was therefore thrown on the population. It was only fair that such a contribution should be made towards the rate. It was fully justified by the circumstances.

MR. DILLWYN asked, why the contribution was charged in the Vote before them; whereas it seemed to belong to Vote 22?

MR. AYRTON said, he would give an explanation on the Report, and if he was unable to give an explanation they could deal with the matter then.

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN said, that he wished to raise the question of the stud-house at Hampton Court, when

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that he would be out of Order until the Amendment was disposed of.

COLONEL SYKES said, such allowances as that before them should be carefully made; but he thought that in the present instance there were reasonable grounds for sanctioning such a contribution.

MR. RYLANDS said, he thought Windsor had great advantages as a locality, in consequence of the Royal residence and the amount of money that was consequently spent there. But he would advise his hon. Friend the Member for Swansea to be content with the promise that the right hon. Gentleman would give an explanation on this question in the Report.

MR. BAXTER said, the item was not a new one, and that the mistake in placing it in the present Vote was made on the previous year.

MR. CANDLISH, in withdrawing the Motion, expressed his regret that the mistake had been repeated.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN asked for some explanation as to the expense of the stud-house and paddocks at Hampton Court. They were supported by a Vote on the Exchequer, and he wished to know to what account the produce of the sale of yearlings was carried?

MR. AYRTON said, that under the Civil List Act the external service required for the honour and dignity of the Crown was appointed to be carried on by the Office of Works by Votes in Supply. This particular service was necessary for the establishment of the Sovereign. Her Majesty had a Master of the Horse and a stud of horses. There was also a breeding stud, and an establishment of buildings was necessary for that state of things, and that being so, it was his (Mr. Ayrton's) duty only to see it carried out economically. The subject was one that concerned the Civil List only, for the expenses of Her Majesty's stud being paid out of that fund, the profits, if any, which accrued from the establishment in question must be placed to the credit of that fund. The Office of Works was merely concerned in the repairs of the buildings.

MR. MONK said, he could not see why the country should pay for the expenses of breeding racehorses and hunters for Her Majesty.

MR. GOLDSMID said, he thought that if Her Majesty paid the expenses of her breeding stud herself, that House had no right to tell her that she had no business to keep up such an establishment, nor any claim to have anything to do with the profits that might accrue.

MR. M'LAREN said, he must object to palaces which were not used by Her Majesty being kept up at the public expense for the sole use of persons in good circumstances. Hampton Court Palace, which was never used by Her Majesty, cost the country £6,475, in addition to £2,800 for improving the drainage, and £840 for water. That House ought not to be called upon to vote large sums in order to provide handsome houses for the members of the aristocracy.

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN said, that, in his view, the trade of breeding racehorses had nothing to do with the privileges of Royalty, and therefore he begged to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £728.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £728, for Hampton Court Stud House and Paddocks, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Aytoun.)

MR. STOPFORD-SACKVILLE said, he hoped no "screws" would get into the brood stud, though that was more than he could say in regard to that House. He was surprised at this wrangle, which had been raised by hon. Members from north of the Tweed, where Her Majesty was accustomed to spend very large sums.

MR. AYRTON said, he hoped that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy would withdraw his Motion. Whether the balance arising from the breeding and sale of these horses was in favour of or against the Civil List, the matter did not concern the public in the slightest degree, as it was part of a general arrangement which could not be disturbed. He, however, understood that generally no gain resulted from these transactions.

MR. M'LAREN said, he must protest against any hon. Members in that House being alluded to as "Scotch Members." They were all Members of the Imperial Parliament, and had a perfect right to object to any item in the Estimates.

CAPTAIN ARCHDALL said, that, whether Her Majesty chose to make use of the premises in question for breeding racehorses or not, the building itself would have to be kept up at the public expense, and therefore it mattered but little to what purpose it was put. Her Majesty had shown that she was anxious to improve the breed of horses in the country.

MR. FIELDEN could not understand why the item appeared in the Votes at all, and why it was not provided for in the Civil List.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) £76,124, to complete the sum for Royal Parks.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he had to call the attention of the House to the question of the communication, through St. James's Park, between Marlborough House and Storey's Gate. He had brought this question before the House during two or three Sessions, and he had endeavoured to persuade Her Majesty's Government that it would be to the advantage, not only of themselves but of the country, to establish a communication extending across the Ornamental Water. He had good reason to believe that this idea had made considerable progress with the public. He had brought this question before the right hon. Gentleman last year, together with the proposition that a carriage-way should be made from Marlborough House to Storey's Gate. Unfortunately, by a most extraordinary coincidence, the remarks of his right hon. Friend on that occasion did not appear in the authorized version of the debates in that House. The right hon. Gentleman on that occasion, after opposing a proposition for the construction of a carriage-way across the Ornamental Water, referred to the prospect of having to shut up King Street while the Home and Colonial Offices were being built, and said, that in order to relieve the narrow part of Parliament Street from the traffic which would be thrown upon it, and with a view to public convenience, the road from St. James's Street, round the end of the Park to Storey's Gate, would be kept open for private and hired carriages and equestrians. But he (Mr. Bentinck) had found, with considerable surprise, that the use of that road was limited to Members of Parliament, and that even Her Majesty's Judges were not allowed to pass along it in their carriages. The engagement which the right hon. Gentleman made last year had, therefore, not been complied with, and he now wished to obtain from the right hon. Gentleman some account of the reasons which had induced him to change his intention, and to ask, whether the road would be left open to the use of Members of Parliament during the Recess?

MR. AYRTON said, that what he stated last year was, that Her Majesty was anxious that hon. Members should have every facility of coming to the House for the performance of their duties. If he was understood to have said that the use of this road would be allowed to the public as well as to Members of Parliament that was a misunderstanding. As it was, the relief to the public was considerable, because the public road was not now inundated with traffic at particular hours of the day. If the general traffic were allowed to use the road by way of Storey's Gate, the purpose for which the arrangement was made would be defeated, as an obstruction would be created, which would prevent Members of Parliament from getting to and from the House with the least possible delay. When the Session was at an end there would be no obstruction in Whitehall or Parliament Street, and therefore there would be no necessity for keeping this road open to Members of Parliament during the Recess.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, his recollection of what had occurred entirely bore out what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman (Mr. C. Bentinck), whom he had congratulated at the time upon having succeeded in his object. He hoped the road to Storey's Gate would not be closed, but, on the contrary, that it would be thrown open to the public at large, in the same way as the road from St. James's Palace to Buckingham Gate. He had voted in the minority with respect to Constitution Hill; but he trusted that, at a future time, Constitution Hill would be thrown open. He would like that the expense of making the new road to Storey's Gate should be given, as the Prime Minister stated that if Constitution Hill were thrown open the cost would be a great deal.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK observed that the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner must have forgotten what had occurred on the occasion referred to. In order to freshen the right hon. Gentleman's memory, he would read the Notice which he had given. It was to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether any steps had been taken with a view to establishing a communication for public carriages between St. James's Street and Storey's Gate, through St. James's Park? At the same time, he commenced his observations by suggesting that a public carriage-way should be made across the Ornamental Water in St. James's Park, which he pointed out would effect a saving of 500 yards between St. James's Palace and Storey's Gate.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he had always objected, and always would object, against special privileges being given to Members of that House. He did not believe that any hon. Member wished for any special privileges for himself which were withheld from the public. That the road in question should be assigned exclusively to Members of Parliament would be highly objectionable.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, he quite agreed with hon. Members who, having found this road such a convenience to themselves, wished to extend the benefit to the public. When they saw that the carriage traffic ran so easily and smoothly between Pall Mall and Buckingham Gate, there could not be the slightest reason why it should not run as easily over Constitution Hill to Storey's Gate. He believed there was no other city in Europe where the public Parks were so closed to the public as here.

MR. J. HARDY recommended that a carriage-way should be opened over the bridge in the ornamental part of St. James's Park. He did not know with whom it would interfere, and it would be really the proper way of adding to the convenience of the public.

SIR GEORGE GREY remarked that one part of the road to Storey's Gate was extremely narrow, and would not suffice for the traffic, if opened generally to the public. The public, however, had a right to be considered in the matter, for the streets of London were too narrow for the traffic which, owing to the great extension of the Metropolis, was daily increasing. Anyone who went into Piccadilly or Bond Street in the afternoon would find this to be the case. It would be the greatest possible convenience if the road from Pall Mall were continued over the Ornamental Water in St. James's Park, and it was only by that means that the public could have the convenience to which they were entitled, and which the hon. Member for Whitehaven had asked for.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he remembered the late Lord Llanover stating, at the time the bridge was built, that he was so deeply impressed with the necessity of having such a thoroughfare that the bridge was made of a strength sufficient to allow of the additional traffic.

MR. GOLDSMID maintained that if they opened a road over the bridge they would very much damage the appearance of the Park, and would cut up one of the prettiest portions of it. No expense, beyond a trifling sum of £150 or so, would be incurred by allowing the public to make use of the road to Storey's Gate. He hoped Her Majesty's Government would consider whether it would not be possible to leave the road open all the year round.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he should be sorry if the Government came to a conclusion all at once on the questions that had now been raised; but he must earnestly press on the right hon. Gentleman not to lose a single day in pulling down the houses in King Street and widening Parliament Street.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he agreed with the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire that it would be extremely unwise to come to a hasty conclusion as to the questions which had been raised. He rose merely for the purpose of pointing out that his right hon. Friend had undertaken, on the part of the Government, to give the whole of those matters the most earnest consideration. At present, the questions were quite immature.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that one of the great advantages of opening a road over the Ornamental Water was that it would lead directly to one of the principal stations of the Metropolitan Railway. He could not agree with the hon. Member for Rochester

(Mr. Goldsmid) that it would be a great injury to the beauty of the Park.

MR. AYRTON said, the cost of the road from Storey's Gate to St. James's Palace was not put in the Estimates because the road was made after the Estimates were prepared, but the cost of draining and repairing it was £1,250.

MR. O. B. DENISON said, he would assume that the discussion about Storey's Gate had been brought to a close, and before the Vote about the Parks was put from the Chair, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner about the cost of the police employed in the Royal Gardens? He found the total cost put down at £17,702, but turning to another page of the Estimates, he found the total cost of the establishment of the Royal Parks, including the police, was £26,835. These police, he observed, on looking into the details, came under four heads—first, the superintendents and constables; second, the ranger's establishment, and his constables and keepers; third, the metropolitan police, representing a sum of £8,882; and fourth, night watchmen, £2,765. The other day he had made the modest proposal to the House to restore to the Park some land which he believed belonged to it, and one of the arguments used by his right hon. Friend the First Commissioner was that it would necessitate extra police. Another argument used against him was the cost of taking down the rails and adapting it to the other portions. On turning to another page of the Estimates he found that the cost of re-arranging the boundary of Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens figured in the last year's Estimates for £5,760. He wished to be informed of the details of this enormous Vote; what proportion of the metropolitan police was bonâ fide detailed off for the conservancy of the Parks; whether the Parks had the sole control of their services, or whether they were mixed up with the police in the neighbourhood of the Parks; and what was the proportion of the night constables, as it would be a satisfaction and consolation to the people out-of-doors to know, when the argument was brought forward that the present area of the Park could not be added to because of the expense of keeping the police, that the police establishment was already on a large and liberal scale.

MR. BOWRING complained that the north side of Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens, used chiefly by poor people, was neglected, while large sums were spent on the south side, which was frequented almost exclusively by the upper classes.

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked what progress had been made in putting up the fence in Regent's Park?

COLONEL SYKES congratulated the First Commissioner of Works on a reduction of £19,087 in the Vote as compared with that of last year; but he feared that, from economical motives, the Parks had been lately neglected.

COLONEL FRENCH called attention to the grazing of cattle in Hampton Court Park, at the instance of the Master of the Horse. These cattle gnawed the bark of the trees, and some splendid lime trees had been greatly injured. He had brought this subject under the notice of former First Commissioners, and hoped his right hon. Friend, who was formed of somewhat sterner stuff than they, would take steps to preserve the trees which still remained uninjured.

MR. ELLICE said, the diversion of the Broad Walk in Kensington Gardens had exposed them to the ridicule of every foreigner of taste. That walk was a fine feature in the Park, and formed part of the original design; but it had now been diverted, not in a straight, but in an oblique line, to the Albert Monument, and was a standing disgrace to their national taste. He did not blame the Chief Commissioner, who could not be responsible for all details. But whoever was really responsible ought, if in the public employ, to be dismissed from the service. He might be told that eminent persons had been consulted. If so, who were they? Let their names be made known, so that they might go down in history along with this most miserable blunder. The thing was done, and some beautiful trees had been sacrificed to make that opening; but it must not be allowed to remain a standing reproach to good taste, and he wished for an assurance that during the winter, when the proper time came for transplanting trees, the blunder would be remedied. [Mr. AYRTON said, he must call the hon. Gentleman to Order, for the matter in question was not contained in the Estimates.] To put himself in Order, then, he would move the reduction of the Vote by £448, which was the amount set down for two new footpaths.

MR. AYRTON, in rising to answer the various questions, said, those paths had no connection with the change alluded to by the hon. Member for St. Andrews. The charge for police in Hyde Park was £6,124, besides the gatekeepers and constables; and the whole expense of the establishment, from the ranger downwards, was £26,835. That was a very large establishment, and he should be glad if it could be reduced; but the largeness of the outlay was no reason why it should be added to still further. One reason for that large cost was, that while every municipal authority charged with the control of such places had the power of making and enforcing rules for good order, no such power existed there, and a numerous force of police was, therefore, necessary. As to the alleged neglect of the north side of Kensington Gardens and Hyde Park, suggestions for the adornment of portions of the Park were frequently made to him by persons who appeared to be enthusiastic in the public interest; but, on further inquiry, he generally found that they lived near these particular parts, and in this particular instance the south side of the Park was much nearer to people living on the north side of the Park than it was to nine-tenths of those who came to enjoy it from other parts of London. The object was not to make this side or that side of the Park particularly beautiful, but to keep the Parks generally in a good condition. With regard to Regent's Park, arrangements had been made for changing the wooden fence for an iron railing; but it was now intended to restore the wooden paling, which would cost only £7,000, as against £35,000 for the iron railing, and would be considered preferable by the inhabitants of Regent's Park. The grounds at Hampton Court, which were mentioned as being injured by cattle being allowed to graze in them, were under the charge of the Master of the Horse, who would, no doubt, pay attention to any reasonable complaint. He now came to the question of taste, and he had often remarked that, while they spoke with some amount of diffidence on all other subjects, there was this peculiarity with regard to a matter of taste, that every hon. Gentleman thought that anyone who differed from him was profoundly ignorant of the whole subject. This arose from the fact that taste was often confounded with the impulses of the feelings, and those who were carried away by emotions did not allow themselves to believe that anybody could have emotions different from their own. He was bound to say that he accepted the entire responsibility of everything done with respect to Kensington Gardens, and, therefore, he was content that all the observations, however caustic, made on the matter of taste should be applied to himself. At the same time, the difficulties which had arisen in this case were not of his creation. He took office under unfortunate circumstances in reference to the Albert Memorial, because his predecessors in office had consented and advised that it should be placed in the place where it stood, but did not at the same time accept the responsibility of the advice they gave. When he came into office he found the Memorial, which was a wonderful work of art, absolutely growing up right in the midst of a jungle, and close to that work of art it had been decided that there should be a huge structure in a different style. The principle on which the Board of Works had to proceed, in conformity with the wishes of the House, was to destroy as little as possible of the plantations in Hyde Park, and to harmonize what was left with the Memorial without entailing any considerable expense. The Prime Minister having given a pledge that no further money would be expended than the grant voted to Her Majesty, the House would have a right to complain if any greater expenditure had been incurred. The question then arose as to what was to be done with the trees which intercepted the view of the great work of art, and the result was that many trees had been cut down; but all that would bear removal had been removed. As the Park was originally laid out, there was a number of radiating alleys, and one of them came down near the Memorial, producing a grotesque effect, and making the Memorial appear like something put on one side without regard to general harmony. In re-arranging the paths, it was impossible to prevent something from being oblique, and in reference to the path which had been alluded to some persons took a different view from the hon. Gentleman the Member for St. Andrews, and objected to it as not being oblique enough. However, if they entered upon these matters of taste, they might discuss them not for one day, but for several days. The matter was one of difficulty, and had not been decided inconsiderately.

MR. ELLICE said, he was sorry to hear what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman; but he would not persevere with his Motion for reducing the Vote. Some day or other, no doubt, the defect to which he had drawn attention would be removed.

Motion withdrawn.

COLONEL SYKES said, he could not help regarding what the right hon. Gentleman called obstructions as the real attractions of the Parks. The cutting down of trees was decidedly in bad taste. There was a large sum disbursed by the Secretary to the Board of Works, and he should like to know who he was.

MR. MACFIE expressed a hope that some practical advantage would be derived by the metropolis of Scotland from the visit of the right hon. Gentleman the first Commissioner of Works. There was not a city in this country, or, indeed, in Europe, whose scenery possessed such noble and commanding features as Arthur's Seat and Salisbury Craigs, with Ben Lomond in the distance, yet Holyrood Park had not a footpath or carriage drive. He thought some portion of the Vote might be applied there with advantage.

MR. CUBITT called attention to the expenditure of £421, put down for widening the horse-ride between Alexandra and Albert Gates. Considerable inconvenience was suffered by pedestrians. The great nuisance was the barracks, which still remained, although a hope had been held out that they were about to be removed; the footpath passing by them was in a disgraceful condition.

MR. AYRTON said, with reference to Holyrood Park, that directions would be given to plant a belt of trees so as to screen off the houses on the town side of the Park. That was all it required.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE called attention to the necessity of securing an entrance to Richmond Park by Roehampton Gate, and recommended that the property of the lady with whom the Government had been some time since in treaty on the subject should be purchased by them. The land not required for the road could be turned to other uses.

MR. AYRTON said, he could give the assurance that the gate would be made and maintained, but the difficulty was about one mile of road through the Wandsworth district. If the local boards of the Metropolis neglected their duty in applying the proper expenditure for the improvement of their roads, the Government could not undertake to make or maintain them at the public expense. He would take that opportunity of saying, in reply to the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. C. Denison), that the Returns for which he had asked in reference to the employment of the police should be supplied.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he hoped something would be done to remove the inconvenience, which was especially complained of by residents at Richmond.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £99,017, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for the Maintenance and Repair of Public Buildings and Monuments; for providing the necessary supply of Water; for Rents of Houses hired for the temporary accommodation of Public Departments, and Charges attendant thereon."

MR. G. BENTINCK called attention to the fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was absent during the debates on the Estimates, and that his place was occupied by no Member of the Government who was able to enter into the details of the Votes.

MR. HERMON moved to reduce the Vote by the sum of £2,000 in reference to the following items:—The Civil Service Commission, for the erection of additional examination rooms; the Paymaster General's Office, for the erection of two additional pay rooms; and the Admiralty Registry, for preparing rooms, &c., in No. 10, Godliman Street. He also wished for some explanation with regard to the item for cleansing the tombs in Westminster Abbey, which he thought ought to come under the jurisdiction of the canons of Westminster Abbey.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £97,017, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for the Maintenance and Repair of Public Buildings and Monuments; for providing the necessary supply of Water; for Rents of Houses hired for the temporary accommodation of Public Departments, and Charges attendant thereon."—(Mr. Hermon.)

MR. AYRTON explained, with reference to these items, that in order to carry into effect the determination of that House that public appointments should henceforward be distributed by public competition, instead of by private patronage, it had become essential that the new rooms in question should be erected; that the business of the Paymaster General's Office was carried on in the most miserable and inconvenient building, which imperatively required alteration; and that the Admiralty Register Office was connected with the Court of Admiralty. With regard to the item for cleansing the tombs in Westminster Abbey, he had to state that it was a special question, that the tombs in question were objects of national interest, and that in consequence of Westminster Abbey having been granted by the Crown in the reign of Henry VIII. to the Dean and Chapter, without any stipulation being exacted that the latter should keep the tombs in repair, that duty had fallen upon the country. The tombs in question had become very dilapidated and unsightly, and such steps were being taken as were necessary for their preservation.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he would endeavour to explain the precise state of the case. He apprehended that the tombs to which the Vote particularly applied were those of King Henry VII. and Margaret Countess of Richmond. They were, he believed, the finest tombs in the world, having been executed by a celebrated Italian, a pupil of Michael Angelo, in the 16th century. Not long ago a process was discovered by a man of great ability for restoring the monuments to their original grandeur, and that process was successfully applied to the tomb of Margaret, the Countess of Richmond, and another in Westminster Abbey. Those monuments were in King Henry VII.'s Chapel, and not in Westminster Abbey proper. They were, therefore, not properly in the custody of the Dean and Chapter of the Abbey, but rather under the dominion of the Crown. It was only reasonable that this small sum of £255 should be granted for the restoration of objects of such national interest.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE drew attention to the extravagant sum that was paid for the hire of buildings for public purposes—the principal sum of which equalled £1,500,000, which, if capitalized, would suffice to buy the fee-simple of the buildings in question.

MR. MELLOR asked why the profits derived from showing the tombs were not devoted towards their repair?

MR. AYRTON replied that these profits formed part of the income of the Dean and Chapter, who were not bound in return to keep the tombs in order.

MR. CANDLISH said, he would be glad to know why the Vote for erection and maintenance of Buildings in Scotland, and Probate Court and Registries, had so materially increased over that of last year's Estimate?

MR. AYRTON said, he must explain that the Government, in consequence of strong recommendations from Edinburgh, had consented to expend £2,780 in providing a new Equatorial for the Royal Observatory at Edinburgh. These Votes were also increased by the sum necessary for fitting up part of Somerset House for carrying on business connected with the Probate Court, but more than that amount would be realized by the sale of buildings in Doctor's Commons. As to the item for £1,500 for King's College, Aberdeen, that sum was required for a new class room for the Professor of Moral Philosophy.

THE CHAIRMAN having put the Question,

MR. HERMON said, if it were the wish of the House he would withdraw his Amendment. ["No, no!"]

Amendment negatived.

On the original proposition being put,

MR. MELLOR moved the rejection of the item £255 for the cleansing and repairing the Royal tombs in Westminster Abbey.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the Motion could not then be put.

MR. C. B. DENISON observed that there was an item of £2,586 for maintaining, watering, cleansing, and lighting Westminster Bridge, being an increase this year of £197 on that item. He wished to know why that House was called upon to maintain, water, cleanse, and light Westminster Bridge?

MR. AYRTON said, this bridge was built by the nation. Certain estates belonging to the bridge were vested in the Commissioners of Works. The arrangement was one which resulted from the carrying out of a scheme undertaken many years ago for the improvement of the neighbourhood of the Houses of Parliament. The duties of the Commissioners were transferred to the Office of Works, and the duty of keeping up the bridge thus devolved upon the Government.

MR. A. JOHNSTON asked, whether there was any agreement between the Office of Works and the Metropolitan District Railway Company, under which that company could be compelled, within a reasonable time, to erect suitable buildings in the neighbourhood of the Houses of Parliament in place of their present unsightly buildings?

MR. AYRTON said, that property belonging to the Westminster Bridge estate was sold to the company; and he believed the only obligation imposed upon them by the purchase deed was, that the elevation of any building they might erect should be sanctioned by the Office of Works, so that nothing unsightly should be built in the neighbourhood of the Houses of Parliament.

MR. RYLANDS said, he thought that as the respective Motions of the hon. Members for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Mellor) and Preston (Mr. Hermon) were dissimilar, it was competent for the hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne, who objected to the item of £255 for cleansing and repairing the Royal tombs in Westminster Abbey, to move a reduction of the Vote by that amount. It appeared that the authorities of the Abbey took fees for the inspection of these tombs, but refused to pay anything for keeping them in repair.

MR. HERMON disclaimed any intention of moving to reduce the charge for the repair of the monuments.

MR. AYRTON said, he did not propose this Vote until he had satisfied himself that he could not compel the Dean and Chapter to undertake the service. They were not responsible for the Royal monuments.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK thought there was a misapprehension in the mind of the hon. Member for Warrington on this as on many other subjects. The Dean and Chapter were making arrangements to abolish the "tomb money," and last year they commenced this reform by throwing open the Abbey to the public every Monday.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) £10,500, to complete the sum for Furniture in Public Departments.

Resolutions to be reported.

(5.) £60,650, to complete the sum for Acquisition of Lands (New Palace at Westminster).

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £23,078, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for the Buildings of the Houses of Parliament."

MR. BOWRING said, he was glad to observe that the right hon. Gentleman had effected so considerable a reduction in the charges for gas and fuel for the Houses of Parliament—namely, from £9,033 to £8,261. He should like to know why the vote for the official residence of the Clerk of the Parliaments was this year more than twice as much as last year, and also whether the right hon. Gentleman had made any arrangements for exhibiting the electric light during the sitting of the House?

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he had to complain of an act of gross extravagance on the part of the right hon. Gentleman who had come into office as par excellence the economical Minister. When he acceded to office he was possessed with the idea that the most economical method of carrying out the works in the Houses of Parliament would be to employ persons who knew very little about them. He proceeded to dismiss the eminent architect who had previously been engaged on them—an act that had been condemned by the predecessors of the right hon. Gentleman in office, and by everybody in that House. ["No, no!"] Well, by everybody who had given artistic consideration to the subject. Mr. Barry had for a number of years acted as surveyor of the House, looking upon the office as an honorary occupation, for which he received merely a nominal remuneration. After he was dismissed, however, and his plans appropriated and mangled by the Office of Works, Mr. Barry sent in his little bill, which was to be found on page 15 of the Correspondence, in a letter dated December 9, 1870, and which amounted to £2,287 5s. The Assistant Secretary of the First Commissioner wrote an answer on the 20th of December, stating that he was desired by the First Commissioner to forward a check for £119 odd. The balance, however, was paid to Mr. Barry on the 30th of March, 1871; so that it appeared that the result of the action of this economical Minister was that the country was a loser by upwards of £2,100. He maintained that no buildings of this elaborate character could be economically and satisfactorily managed without a competent architect. If Mr. Barry had been insubordinate or inefficient, it was still the duty of the right hon. Gentleman to appoint a skilled architect as the surveyor of the building. He wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman intended that the building should remain under the officers of the Department, and whether the £2,300 due to Mr. Barry was included in the present Estimate?

MR. WHEELHOUSE suggested that something should be done to preserve the stone-work, which in some places was manifestly wasting away.

MR. GOLDSMID thought they ought to be grateful to the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works for so much diminishing the cost of maintaining the building, and for reducing the Vote by £13,179.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he felt with many other Members that Mr. Barry had been very harshly treated. After his and his father's long connection with the Houses of Parliament his removal was very painful, and the right hon. Gentleman had not shown the kindness and consideration which were due to the son of Sir Charles Barry.

MR. STOPFORD-SACKVILLE said, he wished the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works would show a little of the suaviter in modo as well as the fortiter in re. The correspondence with Mr. Barry was, on the part of the Department, most uncour-teous and uncivil, and in future, when a public Department had to communicate with an architect or a man of science, he hoped language would be used more becoming an English gentleman.

MR. RYLANDS said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had discharged the duties of his office with great advantage to the public. In dealing with officials it was necessary that Ministers should express themselves in such a way that there could be no mistake as to their meaning.

MR. AYRTON said, the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. C. Bentinck), who had been so severe upon him in respect of his method of conducting Public Business, would form a different opinion on the subject if he had had more experience. He did not, however, attach much importance to the hon. Member's opinion, because he was probably not aware of the circumstances under which Mr. Barry had been dealt with. What had been written to Mr. Barry had been written advisedly, and with a due regard to the public interest. When anyone desired to get a statement of reasons from a Minister for any course he might pursue, it was not desirable to fall into his trap; but he could say—and a perusal of the correspondence show it—there was not a word in any of the letters to justify a single remark made by the hon. Gentleman. ["Oh, oh!"] He defied the hon. Member to point out a single remark; but, as he had said before, the hon. Member's estimate of what had been written did not appear to be of the least importance. Passing to the position of Mr. Barry, he would remark that his services were by no means disinterested. He had been employed to do certain work, for which he had been paid, and he had ceased to be employed, because the continuance of his services would have been inconsistent with the public interest. It was not merely the question of what was paid to Mr. Barry, but a question of the thousands—the hundreds of thousands of pounds which the House was called upon to supply to meet the cost of carrying out his suggestions. There were now no more of these suggestions, and, consequently, expenditure was less. He regretted to say that he was unable to proceed with his reply, because the time allotted to Opposed Business had come to an end.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again this day.

It being now Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

EUPHRATES VALLEY RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON rose to call the attention of the House to the subject of the proposed plan of connecting the Mediterranean Sea with the head of the Persian Gulf by means of a Railway along the Valley of the Euphrates, and the great advantages offered by that line in the enormous saving of both time and distance, and expense for the conveyance of Her Majesty's Mails and Troops, as well as of Passengers, &c. between England and India, thus showing of what vital importance it is to this Country to secure that additional route to or from our Eastern Possessions; and to move for a Select Committee to examine and report upon the whole subject of Railway communication between the Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf. In bringing the subject under discussion before the notice of the House, the hon. Baronet said, he had no interest whatever in, or connection with, any of the commercial enterprises mixed up in this subject. On the contrary, he brought it forward entirely on public grounds, believing it to be of national and European, nay, of world-wide importance. About a year and a-half ago he had the honour to have at his house the company of the Turkish Ambassador, His Excellency Musurus Pacha, who brought before him the subject of a railway from the Mediterranean along the Valley of the Euphrates to the Persian Gulf, and a considerable amount of correspondence subsequently ensued between them, resulting in a letter in which the Turkish Ambassador gave him assurance of considerable advantages which would accrue to England from joining in the scheme. One of the principal conditions was that the Turkish Government should carry Her Majesty's mails between England and the East entirely free so long as the railway should remain in her possession. Exactly 14 years ago Mr. Sotheron Estcourt, who was then Member of Parliament for the place which he (Sir George Jenkinson) now represented, brought forward the subject. That was in 1857, the year of the Indian Mutiny; and he would point out how vastly important the possession of such a line would then have been to England in the saving of human life, to say nothing of the amount of expense we should have saved if we had had the means of pouring our troops at once into India, with the rapidity which this line would have enabled us to do. In the Crimean War they sacrificed something like £90,000,000; in the Indian Mutiny about £40,000,000; and the expense of the railway would not have been more than £8,000,000 or, at most, £10,000,000. He did not, however, ask the Government to vote money for the purpose of constructing the line, as his hon. Predecessor had done; but all that he asked for was an inquiry into the subject before a Select Committee. The great point for England was to have an alternative route to their Indian possessions. In the event of any complication with a foreign Power the possession of a second route would be most important. Twelve months ago a morning paper stated that, even so long ago as the last century, the Marquess of Wellesley endeavoured to utilize the very route that he (Sir George Jenkinson) was now bringing before the House. In 1834 the question was taken up by the Government, and £20,000 was voted by Parliament for the purpose of exploring the route; and the East India Company voted an additional £5,000, to be applied to the same purpose. Captain Chesney was employed to command the Expedition, which was fitted out to make a survey of that route, and the evidence of that gallant officer was one of the points that he wished to bring before the Select Committee. In 1857 the late Lord Palmerston, speaking of the then projected Canal of Suez, said he considered the scheme to be physically chimerical; that he thought it would not be remunerative commercially; but he added that the main point to which his opposition was directed was that the Canal would be the first step in the separation of Egypt from Turkey, and therefore the first step in the disintegration of the latter country—a point of very serious importance, and to prevent which European Powers had on more than one occasion gone to war, and especially so lately in 1854. If a man of so great acumen as Lord Palmerston was so misled as to describe as physically chimerical a scheme which had since been perfected and was now in full operation, it was exceedingly likely that other persons might be misled in the present day, when they spoke of the difficulty of carrying out the railway—a proposal for which he now placed before the House. He believed that there were no engineering difficulties in the railway, at least none comparable with those surmounted in the case of the Suez Canal, and that circumstance, he thought, afforded a strong reason why England should endeavour to neutralize an evil—a political evil—which Lord Palmerston anticipated 14 years ago. The line would not be in the least degree antagonistic to or in competition with the Suez Canal. The Canal would still benefit the communication with the southern parts of India, and it would still, probably, monopolize all the heavy traffic. But the new line would be of the greatest importance to the North-west frontier of India, the line of the Indus, and the North-west Provinces, which in the case of an attack from without would stand in most need of a quick communication from this country. He understood that the Government would not oppose the Motion for an Inquiry, and that relieved him from the necessity of going at great length into the details and figures and facts on which he grounded his application, and therefore he would proceed as rapidly as possible with only the general heads of the scheme. This line would save, in round numbers, a week in time between England and the North-western parts of India; it would save at least 1,000 miles in distance; it would avoid the pestilential heat of the passage through the Red Sea; would substitute for it the comparatively easy and smooth navigation of the Persian Gulf; and it would expedite the communication between this country and India by a fortnight for the outward and the home journey, which for passengers, and the conveyance of letters to and fro, was a most important consideration. It had been urged against this railway that it would not be all in land under the control of the Turkish dominions, as part of it would go through land belonging to independent Arab Chiefs; but the evidence he could bring before the Committee would show that the Arab tribes, if they were fairly treated and subsidized, always performed honourably their engagements, and only acted in an unpleasant manner towards those who tried to pass through their country in defiance of them. If this line were made, both the termini would be on the open sea—a fact which, so far as England was concerned, was of immense importance, because both would be able to be easily protected by England. Were the line established, he estimated that a great saving would be effected, and one transport out of three now plying between Aden and Bombay would be saved, as two passing to and fro from Bussorah to Bombay or Kurrachee would do the work more efficiently, and at a great deal less cost. That would represent a gain of no less than £46,868; and he was informed that, even if the advantageous arrangement with the Turkish Government to which he had alluded should not be carried out as was expected, the transmission of Her Majesty's mails by the railway between the Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf might be effected at a saving of £60,000 a-year as compared with the present cost by the Red Sea route. Eleven days were allowed to the steamers passing between Bombay and Aden, and they were not always regular. But the fleet of steamers now subsidized by the Indian Government on the Persian Gulf, between Kurrachee and Bussorah, would render the same service in five days, would do it with much more regularity, and the comparative danger of accidents might be estimated by the fact that this fleet never had been the subject of one, while, he believed, it was well known that the Peninsular and Oriental Company had sustained great losses, chiefly from the dangerous navigation of the Red Sea. Not only was the distance of 1,000 miles saved, but, as all persons acquainted with those seas knew, during the south-west monsoons, ships on the course of the Peninsular and Oriental, between Aden and Bombay, had to make a detour of 500 or 600 miles, and therefore there was a much greater economy of distance than even the straight line measurement of the respective courses gave. He did not base his argument on the trade and commercial point of view only, although there could be no doubt that the payment or non-payment of the line, regarded as a commercial speculation, would be far indeed from problematical. In 1869 there was imported to this country from British India 481,000,000 lbs of raw cotton, being more than a third of the whole import, and considerably more than was imported from the United States in the same period. The imports also included 80,750,000 lbs of wool, 10,500,000 lbs of tea; and, from India and Ceylon, 70,000 tons of coffee, these last two being articles which it was advantageous to have conveyed as rapidly as possible, and which therefore furnished an additional reason why the line should be made, if it could be done without risk or injury to the State. The value of the imports from British India last year was over £33,000,000, of which £18,500,000 worth was cotton for the looms of Lancashire; the exports to India in the same period being £17,500,000, of which £10,800,000 represented cotton goods from the same mills. The National Debt of India was £100,000,000, not a third of which was held by Natives; there were other £100,000,000 invested in railways and other public works in India, of which barely £1,000,000 was Indian capital; and this was leaving out of account the large amount of British capital invested in private enterprise connected with the trade transacted by this country in Eastern seas. The trade of India, with England alone, amounted in 1852 to £17,500,000; it had risen in 1862 to nearly £49,500,000; and during the next three years—1863-4-5—it averaged upwards of £66,000,000. Everyone who considered the paramount interests involved in these figures must see the extreme importance of accelerating by a fortnight the passage of mails and travellers between this country and India. Indeed, there could be no doubt that the distance saved would be about 1,000 miles and a week in time each way. The construction of the line, too, was perfectly practicable, according to the testimony of competent men, who had gone carefully over the survey, the only difficulties to be surmounted lying in the first 90 miles from the Mediterranean to Aleppo, from which last place almost the entire route would lie through a flat country, presenting no obstacles whatever. He wished to express beforehand his acknowledgments to the Government, who had agreed to accept his Motion, and to add that he had no other motive in bringing forward the question than to uphold the honour and safety and prosperity of this great country. He begged leave to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to examine and report upon the whole subject of Railway communication between the Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf,"—(Sir George Jenkinson,)
—instead thereof.

MR. T. BRASSEY said, his hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Sir George Jenkinson) had, in his able statement, glanced at all the arguments which could be adduced in favour of the Euphrates Valley Railway, and as he anticipated that the Government would entertain the proposal of his hon. Friend, it was hardly necessary for him to enter upon any further exposition of the merits of the scheme. His hon. Friend had referred to many authorities who had expressed opinions in favour of this railway. If he (Mr. T. Brassey) might refer to one additional authority of great weight, he would quote the Report recently presented to that House by Captain Tyler on the best route for the transmission of mails from this country to India. Although that Report was not made with special reference to that particular railway, yet allusion was made to it in the most favourable terms. His hon. Friend had referred to the high estimates of traffic which had been made by those best acquainted with the country through which the Euphrates Valley Railway would pass. For his own part, he must express his belief that those estimates were not in the least degree exaggerated. The total net traffic which had been estimated represented a dividend of 5½ per cent on the capital, which it was expected the railway would require. The estimate of the cost of the line, however, was framed on the assumption that the gauge must necessarily be the same as was usually adopted for European railways; but it would be possible to reduce the cost by means of the system which had been successfully applied to mountain railways in Norway, and by adopting the Fell system on those parts of the line which presented the greatest natural obstacles. He should be sorry to see this country committed to a subsidy or unconditional payment in support of this railway, as the experience of the Red Sea Telegraph and other enterprises of that kind tended to prove that it was not wise policy for the Government to undertake a fixed payment, irrespective of the performance of certain valuable services. However, if it were proved that the postal and political advantages of the scheme would be very great, he hoped it might be possible to entertain a proposal for sending the mails by this route, on condition, of course, that the service should be efficiently performed. Irrespective of the advantages arising from shortening the period of time expended in communicating with India, and the facilities offered for the transmission of troops, it could not be doubted that it would augment our influence in the East, and enable us to fulfil in a more satisfactory manner than hitherto the task of introducing western civilization into the vast Asiatic Continent.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, he should save the time of the House if he rose thus early in the discussion to state that the Government had no objection to accede to the Motion if such were the general wish of the House. Indeed, it was the opinion of the Government that as this question of communication by one or other of several proposed railway routes between the Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf had been so long discussed, both in England and India, and as many opinions had been expressed, especially in the latter country, in favour of such means of communication being established, it was high time that the whole question should be investigated, with all the powers of inquiry which that House possessed. At the same time it must be distinctly understood that Her Majesty's Government did not commit themselves even to the proposition that any means of communication by railway between the Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf was in any way feasible; still less did they commit themselves to the opinion that any one of the proposed routes was either feasible or desirable. They wished to go into the inquiry with their minds absolutely unbiased. Of course, no one who had given the slightest consideration to this question could doubt that the physical difficulties were very considerable, that the political difficulties were even more considerable, and that the financial difficulties were perhaps more considerable than the others. Still, so many persons of weight had expressed opinions in favour of one or other of these routes that it was at least fair that they should have an opportunity of going before a Select Committee of the House, and of trying to prove that the physical, political, and financial difficulties might be overcome; for most certainly if they could be overcome great advantage would accrue both to England and India.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Question proposed,

"That the words 'a Select Committee be appointed to examine and report upon the whole subject of Railway communication between the Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf' be added, instead thereof."

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, by inserting, after the word "Mediterranean," the words "the Black Sea."—(Mr. Grant Duff.)

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, his hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Sir George Jenkinson) had done good service by bringing this question forward, for it was quite time that a subject so frequently discussed out-of-doors should be considered in the House of Commons. He was glad the Government had granted the Inquiry for which his hon. Friend had asked. His hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India had stated that the Government would not be bound to any particular scheme. His hon. Friend confined his proposal to a route between the Mediterranean and India; but it was well known that alternative routes had been proposed, and that the Mediterranean was not the only sea on the shores of which the head of a railway might be placed. By many very competent authorities it was considered that the best place for the head of a railway would be Trebizonde, on the Black Sea, and certainly some port which might be reached from this country without a long sea voyage would be preferable to a port in the Mediterranean. The ordinary route by the Danube across the Black Sea to Trebizonde would be a much better route, especially as they had lately spent large sums in connection with the St. George's mouth of the Danube, and guaranteed large sums to be paid by other countries. The Committee would have to contrast the proposed route with the Brindisi route and the Marseilles route. The Marseilles route had been obstructed or in danger of being obstructed, and he should think that both that and the Brindisi route were more liable to be closed than that by the Danube and the Black Sea. If a Committee entered upon an inquiry at all, its inquiry ought to embrace every route from Europe to India. It was of consequence that we should, if possible, secure this alternative route, for we had already learnt how much we were at the mercy of the Peninsular and Oriental Company with regard to the carrying of mails. Some time ago an attempt was made to re-open the contract with the Company, and to obtain a better one, but the Company knew they were masters of the situation. They refused the proposed terms, and there was no alternative but to accept their terms. On that ground, therefore, it would be an immense advantage to have this alternative route. Another reason for inquiry was that the advice of the English Government had already been asked by that of Turkey, which had been applied to by a company for a concession with regard to this very route. Upon many grounds it was important that such an inquiry as was proposed should be undertaken. It was premature to pronounce an opinion with regard to the feasibility of the suggested route; but a glance at the map would show that it was the most direct route between England and India, and when the Government of India had completed the Indus Valley Railway and the Moul-tan, and there was continuous railway communication between Kurrachee and the Punjaub and Delhi, it would be the most direct route to the most important points of India. He believed that Mr. Layard, a most competent authority, considered that there would be no difficulty in making terms with the Arab tribes for the protection of the line. Upon all grounds an inquiry could not fail to be of great utility. The Government had acted very wisely in complying with the request made, and his hon. Friend had done good service in calling attention to the matter.

Mr. T. Brassey

SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD said, that the promoters of this scheme had repeatedly asked for the support of the Government, and on one occasion waited on the late Lord Palmerston to seek pecuniary assistance. [Sir GEORGE JENKINSON said, he was not speaking on behalf of any company.] He (Sir Charles Wingfield) considered that it was right to refer to the parties who were bringing this scheme before the public. Lord Palmerston declined to give pecuniary assistance; and in 1857 the promoters asked the Under Secretary of State for India to give a guarantee. Again, so late as 1870, they had requested the Secretary of State for India and the Secretary of State for War to undertake to use the line for the transport of troops. He believed it would be a failure, even if it received that assistance; and, moreover, he must maintain it could never compete with the route through Egypt for the conveyance of merchandise, because it was an accepted fact that through traffic on a long line of railway could never pay, and heavy goods could not bear transhipments. Before the Suez Canal was open only goods of small bulk and great value were sent across the Isthmus by the railway, although the voyage by the Cape occupied 90 days. To show that any expectations of local traffic in the countries which the line would traverse would be disappointed, he would quote the Report upon the tenure of land in Turkey, from the recently published collection of official Reports on that subject, collected for the purposes of the Irish Land Act of last Session. The Report represented that such was the depreciation of land that no creditor would accept a mortgage on his debtor's estate, and that agriculture was waning on every hand. To support a through railway it was necessary not only that a country should be fertile, but that it should be densely populated, and, further, that it should have good roads to facilitate internal communications; but in this instance the country was absolutely destitute of communications, and therefore the enterprise must be financially a failure. He admitted that such a railway, constructed by English capital and managed by Englishmen, would extend our fame and reputation, but, in case of an invasion of India, he did not see what could be effected by means of the Euphrates Valley route. The line through Egypt was quite as much to be relied upon, even if the Canal were not kept open, which it would be; and then there was the alternative route by the Cape, by which we sent out our reinforcements for India in 1857 and 1858, when the Mutiny was suppressed before a single soldier could reach India by the Overland Route. He had the strongest objection to any guarantee or promise being given by our Government, and to our Government allowing its influence to be used in any way to obtain a concession from the Turkish Government. Such assistance led the promoters of enterprises to imagine they had a right to call for interference and help whenever they thought their interests were affected. He knew that European companies in Turkey were engaged in constant altercation with the Government, which they accused of breach of engagement. Further, any official intervention on our part might lead the Turkish Government to imagine that, by granting a concession, they had established a claim to support in case of differences with foreign Powers. The Government had agreed to the appointment of a Committee, but he hoped the inquiry would be limited to the political bearings of the question, to the feasibility of the scheme, and to what advantages would accrue to this country from it. It was not desirable, nor was it competent, for a Committee of that House to enter into the financial prospects of such an enterprise, because as a speculation it should come before the public on its own merits, and not be floated by means of a favourable Report presented to Parliament.

Mr. C. B. DENISON said, he was glad that the Government had granted a Committee, for it was impossible to exaggerate the importance of the question, which had been too long waiting for the opinion of this House. There were physical, political, and financial difficulties, but they could be overcome, and all who took an interest in the matter should have an opportunity of explaining their views before a Committee. He was opposed to the Government giving a guarantee to such a line, although he must admit there was not a single proposition of the nature of the one under discussion, but had for its basis something of the kind; but he would enter upon the inquiry on other points without prejudice.

Sir Charles Wingfield

Mr. DODSON said, he approved the appointment of a Committee, and was glad to observe that the Motion was wider than the notice by which it was prefaced. The inquiry ought not to be limited to the Euphrates Valley. The impression he had derived from travel was that the Tigris Valley would afford the best route of communication between the Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf. Along the Euphrates Valley there would be but little local trade, because, after leaving Aleppo, the railway would for 700 miles pass through a country in which there was scarcely a town of any importance, whereas by the Tigris Valley route it would first pass some considerable towns, and, on the whole, go through a better district, and one that was inhabited by comparatively peaceable tribes engaged in pasture or in agriculture. Then, again, by selecting the east side of the Tigris it would, to a certain extent, be accessible to the roads from Persia, and, therefore, to the travellers who wished to go to the Mediterranean or the Persian Gulf. Anyone who had travelled, as he had, in Asia Minor must admit that it was a country not favourable to the construction of railways, owing to the difficulty of finding passes through the mountains; but the practicability of such a route was a matter into which the Committee should inquire. He suggested that the Motion might be so altered that the Committee should examine and report not only upon the subject of railway communication between the Mediterranean, but also between the Black Sea and the Persian Gulf. He agreed with the remarks that had been made as to the desirability of having a second line of communication to India, but he hoped the Government would not consent to any proposal of guarantee.

Mr. KINNAIRD said, that the hon. Baronet the Member for North Wiltshire (Sir George Jenkinson) had guarded himself against making any proposal for a guarantee, or suggesting any preconceived scheme; all he asked for being a Committee of Inquiry. He (Mr. Kinnaird) hoped the hon. Baronet would consent to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Dodson). It would strike a foreigner as very strange that the Government in acceding to the Motion for a Committee should have thrown so much cold water upon it by doubting the probability of any good arising from the inquiry. The same course was pursued when it was proposed to construct a railway through our own Canadian dominions to Vancouver's Island; but the railway to San Francisco, which had taken its place, was now a prosperous undertaking: and had the Government given the Canadian project any encouragement, Canada might have been greatly benefitted by it. The construction of this railway was a matter that affected the working classes of this country, because England was the workshop of the world; and by encouraging enterprises of this kind, calculated to bring wealth into the country, the Government would do better than by merely offering a guarantee. They ought to take a large view of the interests of this country, as Lord Palmerston would have done. Now, however, only discouragement was offered, a course that he deeply regretted on account of the honour as well as the interests of the country, and yet more on account of the importance of the scheme itself, which he thought no one who had listened to the debate would be disposed to deny.

MR. EASTWICK said, there were many points in favour of the Tigris route, from which there would be obtained a much larger traffic than along the Euphrates Valley. He, however, desired to point out that the route proposed by the hon. Baronet the Member for North Wiltshire (Sir George Jenkinson) had been thoroughly surveyed; but it was not known what difficulties there might be in the Tigris route, and not only that, but it was 300 miles longer than the alternative route. The flatness of a country was not a thing that was a great recommendation in many cases, but in regard to railways it was a most sovereign advantage. Now, the Valley of the Euphrates was perfectly flat, and there was nothing better that could be desired in the matter of levels than those of that route. Having visited various parts of that route, he could state that great facilities existed there for making a good road, and, moreover, one very important point was, that as soon as one arrived in the neighbourhood of Baghdad the roads were crowded with people flocking to or from the great places of pilgrimage, and he could assure the House that the local traffic from Baghdad to Bussorah would pay. He thought it would be quite impracticable, even in these days, to carry a railway from Trebizonde, because of the difficulties presented by impassable mountains. He regretted extremely that the hon. Member for Gravesend (Sir Charles Wingfield) should have taken so very disparaging a view of this great national enterprise; and he hoped that the proposed inquiry would not be limited to the political aspect of the question, but would extend to all its other bearings. He tendered his acknowledgments to the Government for assenting to the appointment of the Committee; and as the Suez Canal must for ever remain as a stupendous monument of French energy and successful engineering science, so he trusted that the wastes of the Euphrates Valley would not long continue to be a memorial of the lack of corresponding qualities on our part.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS said, he must contradict, from facts within his own knowledge, the statement made by the hon. Baronet the Member for North Wiltshire (Sir George Jenkinson), as to the large number of losses that had occurred in the conveyance of the mails from Suez to India by the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Company. Taking a calculation of their amount of tonnage, the number of passengers and of mails which they carried, and the distance that their vessels ran, he maintained that the ships of no company had met with so low an average of losses as those sustained since its establishment by the Peninsular and Oriental Company; and after the remarks which had been made that evening, he thought it was only fair and just that that fact should be stated. The Peninsular and Oriental Company, moreover, insured their own ships, and the profit upon their insurance account was far larger than that of any ordinary insurance company. The losses of that company had been attributable to the extraordinary perils of the navigation of the Red Sea; but now the navigation of the Red Sea had been greatly improved, by the more perfect surveys which had recently been carried out.

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN regretted that the Government had acceded to that Motion, because he thought that the consequences might be serious to the country. The fact that Asiatic Turkey contained only 15,000,000 of inhabitants, as stated by Mr. Palgrave, did not afford any promising prospect to the shareholders in the company. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India said that the Government held themselves perfectly free, but he only understood that to apply to their not committing themselves to any particular line, and he did not say that the Government would not give any money guarantee nor any political support to the company. The truth was, that the company did not wish for a Committee in order to obtain information, and their object, no doubt, was to commit the country to a guarantee of some kind. He should object to any money guarantee, but what he feared most was the political complications which we might be involved in. If the Government encouraged the construction of the line, they would then be told that they must use their political influence to support the route. It was said that they could keep open the line through the Arab territory by paying the tribes, but that would be the worst kind of security; and sooner or later they would be led into hostilities with these tribes. Again, there was the danger of the Turkish Empire falling to pieces, and a pretext would be afforded for involving this country in war to support that decaying Power. The safety of their Indian Empire would be better provided for by their looking to the internal defence of that country. When the Mutiny broke out they had on their hands an expedition to Persia, and another to China which left India denuded of troops; and if that line should be constructed their forces would be employed in keeping open the route. He hoped that some Member of the Government would state that the company should not be led to expect any Imperial guarantee or any political support.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON, in explanation, said, that he had not intended to cast any imputation on the Peninsular and Oriental Company; he had simply stated that they had lost vessels, without intending to make any imputation of any kind.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Question put,

"That the words 'a Select Committee be appointed to examine and report upon the whole subject of Railway communication between the Mediterranean, the Black Sea, and the Persian Gulf,' be added to the word 'That' in the Original Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 86; Noes 10: Majority 76.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, "to examine and report upon the whole subject of Railway communication between the Mediterranean, the Black Sea, and the Persian Gulf."—(Sir George Jenkinson.)

And, on July 4, Committee nominated as follows:—SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, Viscount SANDON, SIR GEORGE JENKINSON, MR. FREDERICK WALPOLF, MR. EASTWICK, MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE, MR. LAIRD, MR. GRANT DUFF, MR. KINNAIRD, MR. THOMAS BRASSEY, SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD, MR. HENRY ROBERT BRAND, MR. M^rARTHUR, MR. DYCE NICOL, and MR. KIRKMAN HODGSON:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that out of courtesy to the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite the Member for Hereford (Major Arbuthnot), whose Motion stood next upon the Paper, he proposed moving again the Order for going into Committee of Supply, that the hon. and gallant Member might proceed with his Motion. But he wished it to be understood that this was not a practice to be regarded as a matter of course, and that it was no part of the arrangement contained in the recommendation made by the Committee, that Supply should be moved on every Friday night. He would again move "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Resolved, That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply.—(Mr. Gladstone.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ARMY—ROYAL ARTILLERY.

RESOLUTION.

MAJOR ARBUTHNOT, in rising to call attention to the state of the Regular Artillery Forces of Her Majesty's Army, both as regards organization and efficiency, and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that a complete and searching inquiry be at once instituted into the same by means of a Royal Commission, or such other court of inquiry, as Her Majesty's Government may see fit to appoint."

said he should be most ungrateful if he did not, at the outset, acknowledge the courteous treatment he had received at the hands of the Prime Minister, which enabled him to proceed with the Motion standing in his name on the Paper. He would observe that while he did not think it necessary to vindicate himself, in anticipation, from even the suspicion of being animated by feelings inimical to that branch of the service to which he was proud to say he belonged, and the members of which entirely approved of his course of action in asking for this inquiry, he, once for all, disclaimed any wish to make that Motion the basis of an attack upon the Secretary of State for War, for though he might have to criticize the policy of that right hon. Gentleman in a hostile spirit in some respects, the subject with which he had to deal was of far higher and wider interest than the mere success or failure of any individual Minister. He therefore trusted that hon. Gentlemen would approach the question in no party spirit, but that they would decide according to the validity, or otherwise, of the arguments which he might adduce. He had said that the members of the artillery service approved of this Motion, and he might inform the House that within a fortnight of his having given Notice of it, he received more than 130 letters from artillery officers of high rank, nearly all of whom expressed similar views to those which he held himself. Everyone, he believed, except those hon. Members who were in favour of total disarmament, must desire to see England in possession of a formidable, expansive, well-organized and efficient artillery service, especially after what had happened in the course of the late Franco-Prussian War. The capitulation at Sedan was necessitated by the fact that the French Army were surrounded and hemmed in by a formidable circle of field guns, through which, as admitted by their own generals, it would have been impossible for them to have forced their way without the loss of half their men. And what saved Metz from any capitulation, save that enforced by the pressure of starvation, was the number and disposition of its heavy guns. But it might be said that we have a force of artillery fulfilling all these conditions. It was because he denied that assertion, because he impugned the efficiency of our artillery, that he stood there to ask for an inquiry. They had heard much during the present Session in praise of the way in which both artillery officers and artillerymen performed their duties. He was quite prepared to endorse all that praise. He would go further. Having seen the artillery of nearly every country in Europe, he did not hesitate to say that both as to personnel and matériel, we were in advance of any. But there our superiority ended; we were deficient in that without which the most enduring personnel, the best constructed matériel, were useless—we had no organization; or, what was worse, what organization we had was of an imperfect or faulty description. He would now give the substance of some letters he had received from highly distinguished officers, as he had before stated, which would serve to show how general was the feeling in favour of the necessity for an entire reorganization, and how deeply sensible the writers were of the deplorable state of things which now existed. One most distinguished officer in writing to him complained that nothing could be worse than their present brigade system, and that the artillery wanted, above all, a recognized and responsible head; another declared that no one but an artilleryman could realize the chaos which at present existed; while a third stated that unless something were done the nation would in time of war lose its right arm in the event of war, and that while they now had no efficient artillery organization, the brigade system was one which was galling in peace and would prove disastrous in time of war. He would not trouble the House by referring in detail to the opinions of his correspondents; but in these complaints they all concurred. In his own opinion the artillery service was in a most unsatisfactory condition, and, setting aside such minor details as the appointment and education of officers, the question of promotion, the amalgamation of the English and old Indian artillery, the question of reliefs, the desirability of having a professional head, and the harmonious blending of the Regular with the Militia artillery, all of which were subjects well worthy of inquiry, and all of which, he might say, were capable of great improvement, there were four simple and practical points connected with it, any one of which, if proved, would, he believed, amply justify him in asking, and the Government and the House in granting, a full and searching inquiry. These four points were—first, the total collapse and failure of the system of organizing by brigades; secondly, the unsatisfactory state of their garrison artillery; thirdly, the inefficiency and inexpansiveness of the field and horse artillery; and, fourthly, the non-existence of any Reserves. For the first two points the Government were not responsible; but in the others, he thought they had committed an error of judgment. The brigade system was originated in April, 1859. Previous to that time a battery, or company, was the tactical unit of the artillery, and a certain number of companies formed a battalion, the commanding officer of which performed merely administrative duties, while the maintenance of discipline was intrusted to the officer commanding at each artillery station. The object which the promoters of the brigade system had in view was, he presumed, to do away with that dual responsibility, and to place both the administration and discipline under the control of one and the same officer. With that view the regiments were re-distributed into horse batteries of five guns, and field and garrison batteries of eight guns, the horse batteries having since been increased to eight guns, and the field batteries to ten guns. At the first blush this was plausible enough; but the result proved that the conflict of responsibility and authority was only intensified, while from the very outset, owing to the size of our Army, the size of our country, and the character of our colonies, the system entirely broke down, and the intention of moving large bodies of artillery from one district to another was found to be impracticable. In 1865, the state of the 4th Brigade proved the absurdity of the system, for that brigade had its head-quarters in England, while it had batteries both in America and New Zealand. Again, in 1866, when the 8th Brigade were under orders for India, one battery was found to be in North America, so that the brigade would either have to go to India with one battery short of its complement, or the battery that was expected home from its turn of service in the piercing climate of Canada would immediately on its arrival be sent out to experience the exhaustive heat of India—a most arbitrary measure; or, if neither of those courses were taken, they would have to draft a battery from another brigade. The last course was adopted; and as the officers were drafted from the battery in question, it could scarcely be said that the plan resorted to was the one best calculated to promote the efficiency or discipline of the brigade. To show the estimation in which the brigade system was held one officer had written to him saying it was rotten throughout, and full of absurdities arising from the dispersion of the batteries composing the brigade; another, that there was no use trying to patch it up, but that it would be better to start afresh on a sound and well-considered basis; another said, whenever you have a chance, try and get the brigade system done away with; another, that he should be glad to drive a nail into its coffin; while the last he should bring under their notice said the attempt to carry on, or rather prop up, the system was the sole cause of the confusion that now existed. Having disposed of those testimonies in his favour, he should now pass on to the second point he had selected—the unsatisfactory state of the garrison artillery, which being of a somewhat technical character he should touch on very briefly. That was, in his opinion, the highest branch of the artillery arm of the service, although it was not generally so regarded, most officers preferring to use it merely as a stepping-stone or passage to the field artillery. He thought that officers entering either the field or the garrison artillery should be permitted, as far as possible, to choose the branch which they preferred to join, and that, having joined, they should be encouraged, or, if necessary, compelled to render themselves efficient, and to remain in the service. Passing on to consider the third and most important point—the question of field artillery—the hon. and gallant Gentleman said there had been for some considerable time a growing conviction in the public mind that this branch of the service ought to be maintained in a high state of efficiency. That feeling first found open expression on the occasion of the Wimbledon Review of last year, when great dissatisfaction was expressed in the Press and elsewhere at the impossibility of a battery being turned out for war service, except by breaking up a second battery, and the Government, instead of taking what would in his opinion have been the wisest course—namely, commencing to form artillery Reserves—proposed to increase the batteries of horse artillery from 172 men and 112 horses, to 218 men and 156 horses; the field batteries to be increased from 170 men and 84 horses, to 182 men and 116 horses. These figures included the depôts; but they had been reduced very shortly before. The officers were naturally delighted with this arrangement, because it enabled them to turn out their batteries in a better manner than they had ever been turned out before, and things went on well until the Franco-Prussian War again raised the question of military armaments, and the feeling of the country reached its culmination when the leading journal, in October last, contended that the Regular artillery should be calculated not merely for the requirements of the Regular Army, but should cover the requirements of both Regulars and Auxiliaries; and that, therefore, it would be no extravagant proportion to provide themselves with a sufficient number of guns to arm 200,000 men, instead of 60,000 men, as Mr. Cardwell boasted. Without going into the question as to the proportionate or aggregate number of guns it would be well to possess, he would point out that, though the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Surveyor General of the Ordnance stated in replying, on a former occasion, to an observation of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), that there had been a large increase in the number of guns, the increase was not likely to be very useful, for the reason that an analysis of the figures and facts proved that many of the guns in the depôt batteries were old smooth-bore arms, and that in many instances there existed great deficiencies in the matter of stores, ammunition, and even gunners, there being only those who were required absolutely to take charge of the guns. There were, to begin with, 366 guns, or 61 batteries, inclusive of 30 depôt guns, old smooth-bore 6-pounders, but without ammunition or gunners. Now, they could not be a powerful addition to the forces of the country. Of the remainder, comprising 336 guns—the actual number of guns in this country—180 guns, or 30 batteries, were old batteries, while 156 guns, or 26 batteries, were either new or converted from garrison batteries, or transferred from a brigade in India. Of these 26, five had—at the time the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Surveyor General made his statement—barely left India, and the length of time which must necessarily elapse before a battery, arriving for the first time in England, became thoroughly efficient, anyone conversant with artillery matters would know. This left 21 batteries to be accounted for. Of those, 10 had no horses and 5 no guns; of the remainder, some had a few horses, but no harness; others had harness and no horses; while some had a few horses with harness, but no artificers to fit that harness, no rough rider to instruct the men in riding; so that, in point of fact, they were no better off than those batteries which had no horses. He did not quote all these facts for the purpose of discrediting the Government, but in order to show that the batteries had been raised out of elements which were of a very indifferent character, and that the Government would have done better if they had devoted their attention to produce fewer guns of a more serviceable character, and if they had acted upon a rational scheme of expansion such as might be found in a judicious amalgamation with the Militia. At the same time he could not disguise his opinion that the Government might have been candid and given the House more precise information on the subject, especially respecting the difficulty experienced in obtaining horses, of which there was, even then, a deficiency of nearly 2,000, and the protest from the colonels commanding brigades of horse artillery as to the want of sufficient strength in non-commissioned officers and men. Neither he nor any other artillery officer was in favour of large batteries being always kept up on a war strength, but it was highly desirable that their batteries should be expansive. Replying by anticipation to the argument repeated ad nauseam, and the validity of which he utterly denied, that their artillery was as well off, in regard to the number of men, as the Prussian artillery, he would point out that the organization of the latter differed in several important respects from their own, and that the men were not required to do so much work when in the field as English artillerymen. He maintained, too, with regard to another point equally persisted in with the former, and equally erroneous, that by the reductions in the number of non-commissioned officers for instruction and barrack duties; artificers, to repair damages; gunners, for the field artillery, and drivers and men in proportion to the number of horses, their artillery was deprived of that character of expansiveness and elasticity which was so desirable. Passing by the testimonies he had received, all tending to the condemnation of the existing system as utterly useless and inefficient, he now came to the fourth point, as to which he had only to say, that no attempt had been made to show that any Reserve existed at all beyond the dépôt which, in fact, was no Reserve, but merely a means whereby the batteries serving abroad might be kept up on a peace establishment. Even that small requirement, they were unable to meet, for demands for volunteers were annually made on the batteries at home. In conclusion, he felt bound to dissent from some remarks made by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, in the speech to which he had before alluded, to the effect that all artillerymen, except horse artillerymen, were interchangeable. If those words implied the old and lamentable system of moving batteries from field to garrison duty promiscuously, he must protest against it. Then, again, it was said that field artillerymen had nothing to mount except the limbers. He would ask, whence came the non-commissioned officers, and had they not to ride? The last observation to which he took exception was, that it was, in his opinion, hardly fair that the whole credit, or the blame, of the late changes, which were certainly not popular, should be attributed to the Deputy Adjutant General of the Artillery, as it had been by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Surveyor General of the Ordnance. Was it not patent to all that the Deputy Adjutant General had no choice in the matter, and that that would have been the observation he would have received at the hands of the Secretary of State for War, if he had raised any difficulty, or abstained from doing his best to carry out a difficult and unpalatable task. While anxious to express his regret at having occupied the time of the House so long, he could not help stating that the difficulty he experienced had been somewhat increased by the fact, that until that evening, he (Major Arbuthnot) had been under the impression that he was to be met half-way, and that an inquiry of some sort was to be conceded, and he still hoped that the Government would consent to an Inquiry. He did not wish to infer that he had been misled by anything which had fallen from the Treasury bench; and even now, he hoped the Government would act on his suggestion. If, however, they declined to take any steps in the matter, he should feel compelled to take the sense of the House; and he would appeal especially to those hon. Members who were jealous of public expenditure, and ask them to satisfy themselves that they were getting their money's worth for their money. If it were argued that it was not the province of that House to interfere in matters of discipline and detail, he maintained that that was neither the one nor the other, but it was entirely one of organization; and hon. Members owed it to themselves and to their constituencies to leave no stone unturned which would secure the best possible organization in every branch of our forces. If it were said that inquiry would be a slur on the artillery, he had very good reason to know that such an Inquiry as he moved for would be received with satisfaction by both officers and men, who would feel that they had advanced one step towards the attainment of that efficiency of the necessity of which they were so deeply sensible, and the absence of which they so deeply and bitterly deplored. He begged to move the resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. HEYGATE, in rising to second the Motion, said, that he should do so from the civilian point of view, and without professing any special knowledge on the subject. It was incumbent on that House to see that they had a proper return for their expenditure; and when they were told upon such undeniable authority that there was a want of organization and efficiency in a part of the service—and an important part—their duty was to institute an inquiry into these allegations. There was, doubtless, every variety of opinion generally on military matters, but he believed that no difference of opinion on the point that a good and effective artillery service was simply indispensable to the Army. Without it, all the other branches of the service, however good they might be, were comparatively useless. Though it might well be that that House was weary of Army debates, it ought not to shirk this subject, and to consider it in no party spirit. He hoped that the Government would not refuse the Inquiry. He observed that an Amendment to the Motion had been given Notice of, under cover of which the Government might escape; but he hoped that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Seely) would make his Motion an independent one. The evidence that had been adduced by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Hereford had clearly shown that Inquiry was required, and he appealed to the House to take care that it should be held.

Major Arbuthnot

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that a complete and searching inquiry be at once instituted into the state of the Regular Artillery Forces of Her Majesty's Army, both as regards organization and efficiency, by means of a Royal Commission or such other court of inquiry as Her Majesty's Government may see fit to appoint,"— (Major Arbuthnot.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR HENRY STORKS said, everyone must admit the importance of the question involved—that of the efficiency of the Royal Artillery. He did not agree with the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Major Arbuthnot) when he impugned the efficiency of the Royal Artillery; but, on the contrary, he believed it to be in a most efficient state as regarded discipline, men, materials, and everything belonging to it. The hon. and gallant Member had stated how the brigade system originated. Before 1859 the organization of the Royal Artillery was by battalions, and the permanent head-quarters were at Woolwich. That arrangement, however, was considered unsatisfactory; one alleged disadvantage of the system being the undue amount of the permanent Staff at Woolwich, to remedy which in 1859 what was called the "brigade system" was established; and experience had since shown that doubts might be entertained whether that system could not be considerably improved. It was sometimes doubtful whether the system had quite answered; and having personally had some experience of the brigade system in garrison duty, he did not hesitate to say that in some respects it was defective. The next point to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman had referred was the garrison and field batteries, and on that point it might not be amiss if he were, perhaps, to give the result of the progress made during the last few years. In 1805, when Napoleon was encamped at Boulogne with a large Army, threatening the invasion of England, we had 336 guns, horsed and equipped; and, so far as he had been able to ascertain, that was by far the greatest number that had ever been maintained in the United Kingdom. During the many years of peace which succeeded the Battle of Waterloo the field artillery was permitted to fall very low, and it was not until 1852 that it once more assumed any adequate proportions. In 1818 we had 50 guns; in 1819, 22; in 1821, 38; in 1828, 47; in 1848, 60; in 1849, 70; in 1852, 120; in 1855, 114, with 92 guns in the Crimea in addition; in 1856, 180; in 1858, 174; in 1860, 180; in 1870, 180. The late Lord Hastings and Sir Hew Ross, in 1856, at the conclusion of the Crimean War, recommended that 148 guns should be maintained in the United Kingdom, to be expanded to 222 in time of war. The Royal Artillery in the United Kingdom at the beginning of 1870 consisted of 10 batteries of horse artillery, with 60 guns, 2,046 officers and men, and 1,236 horses; 20 field batteries, with 120 guns, 3,656 officers and men, and 1,730 horses; 12 depôt garrison batteries, with 1,441 officers and men; 52 garrison batteries, with 5,200 officers and men; and the Coast Brigade, consisting of 1,542 officers and men, making a total of 94 batteries, with 180 guns, 13,885 officers and men, and 2,966 horses. The Royal Artillery in the United Kingdom, in 1871, it was proposed should be as follows:—16 batteries of horse artillery, 40 field batteries, 12 dépôt batteries, 35 garrison batteries, and the Coast Brigade, which would give a total of 103 batteries, 366 guns, 18,392 officers and men, and 5,800 horses. Now, the hon. and gallant Gentleman has said that the dépôt guns were smooth-bore brass guns, and that no doubt was the case; but the guns were not intended for service, and were used only for purposes of instruction for the drivers; but the full equipment of these batteries, as regarded guns, harness, and every other requirement, was ready to be issued at a moment's notice. [Major ARBUTHNOT said, he had asked whether the gunners were also in store?] No, they did not keep gunners in store. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had talked of the want of expansiveness of the field batteries, but he would remind the hon. and gallant Gentleman that in time of emergency there would be 2,627 men in the dépôt batteries, a portion of whom would be available for foreign service and a portion for home service. If more field batteries were required, the men would be taken from the garrison brigades, and they would be converted into field batteries. At the same time we would have for garrison defence the Coast Brigade; 1,542 old soldiers, comprising skilled non-commissioned officers, 15,000 Militia Artillery, and 37,000 Volunteer Artillery; and the value of the two latter auxiliaries, he believed, would be acknowledged by every hon. Member. In fact, we would be able to put into the field 408 guns, exceeding the Prussian proportion to an Army of 150,000 men. Now, as regarded the peace establishment of field batteries, France had 137 officers and men, and 88 horses; Austria had 109 officers and men, and 37 horses; Prussia had 112 officers and men, and 40 horses; while we had 149 officers and men, and 88 horses, which equalled the Prussian war establishment as regarded men, and exceeded them by one more officer in each battery. Then, too, as regarded non-commissioned officers, we had 14 now to 13 we had in the Crimea, and to 12 in the Prussian batteries. With respect to horses, from inquiries he had made he was satisfied that upon emergency we could purchase 5,000 draught horses in a week or ten days—horses in every respect fit for immediate work. The garrison batteries had been augmented to 150 men, in place of 90. With regard to field guns, we shall have, this year, a total of 692, and after taking 336 for field service there would remain 356 in reserve, exclusive of 80 40-pounder guns of position. He did not consider that sufficient, but there was no doubt that the productive resources of the country were such as to give the requisite number within a very short space of time. The Government could produce two batteries a-week complete, and the general trade would be able to supply as many if not more. He would conclude by saying that he was fully impressed with the importance of the artillery as a branch of our military service, and with the necessity of keeping it in a thorough state of efficiency. But he thought that the statement he had made would be satisfactory to the House, and as the attention of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War and of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief was directed to this question, it would not, he believed, conduce to the interests of the service to accede to the Inquiry demanded by the hon. and gallant Gentleman.

Sir Henry Storks

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he must say that his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Hereford (Major Arbuthnot) had called attention to a subject of great importance, and he collected from the observations of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, that the Motion was not an ill-timed one, because that right hon. Gentleman had admitted that the reserve of guns was not so great as was desirable. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the brigade system in the most delicate terms, amounting to an admission that it had broken down, and it was impossible to deny that the artillery generally, and especially the field artillery, was not in that state of efficiency in which everyone would wish to see it. He thought his hon. and gallant Friend had stated fair grounds for an Inquiry, and he would vote for the Motion if his hon. and gallant Friend proceeded to a division.

MR. CARDWELL said, that the artillery was very much larger in the number of men than when the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich was responsible for the affairs of the Army, and the number of field guns when that right hon. Baronet was in office was 180, and it was now 336, besides 30 in dépôt. Therefore the artillery was not in point of numbers in that deficient state which had been described. The Government, moreover, were this year at an expense of nearly £500,000, adding 5,234 men and 2,894 horses to the artillery. They were also taking steps to make the artillery of the Militia and Volunteers efficient, by providing them with officers of the Royal Artillery. He was anxious for the fullest inquiry on the subject, but he was not prepared to hang the matter up by referring it to a Royal Commission, or to any tribunal which would take it out of the hands of the Government. He deprecated, as a general principle, the habit of referring every executive duty to a Royal Commission, and thereby throwing off the responsibility from those to whom it properly belonged. He did not pretend to have any predilection for the brigade system. The battery was the natural unit of the artillery, and when they went beyond that they got into an artificial system. There had been 12 years' experience of the brigade system, and it was now time to re-consider it, and the Government had no desire to do anything except what was necessary for the good of the service.

MR. LIDDELL said, he was glad that the Government took on themselves the responsibility of inquiry, and were not willing to shift it off to a Commission or a Committee. The artilleryman was the highest trained soldier in the service, and he wished to know what had been done to get a reserve of artillerymen?

LORD GARLIES said, he should have been glad if an explanation had been given of the number of gunners and the equipment of the different batteries. The Government had announced that the present state of the artillery was not entirely satisfactory, and that the subject was under their consideration; he therefore thought, unless they stated to the House candidly that within 10 days they would announce what their intentions were relative to the organization of the artillery, his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Hereford (Major Arbuthnot) should press his Motion to a division.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, he wished to take that opportunity of stating, in answer to his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Liddell) the state of the artillery reserves. After completing the whole battalions at the full war complement, there would be left 5,000 Artillerymen for the Reserves.

MR. WHALLEY said, there was a question overriding all these military matters, and that was—What special grounds had we for apprehending danger? It appeared to him that the apprehension of danger arose from the agitation of a great question which at the present moment occupied the attention of most of the States of Europe—namely, the declaration on the part of the Pope of Rome—

MR. D. DALRYMPLE rose to Order. He wished to ask Mr. Speaker whether the Pope of Rome had anything to do with the question of the organization of our artillery?

MR. WHALLEY said, he was out of Order, and would resume his seat to rise again when that Motion was disposed of.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN said, he understood that the Government acceded to the spirit of the Motion before the House—[Mr. CARDWELL assented.]—and he therefore would advise his hon. and gallant Friend to accept the announcement of the Government, and leave them to make an inquiry into the matter.

MR. A. GUEST said, he hoped the Government would consider the subject of forming an artillery reserve, and also the advisability of having a certain number of heavy guns in reserve, so that they should not have to be manufactured when an emergency arose which required their use.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE POPE'S JUBILEE.

MR. WHALLEY then rose, amid considerable interruption, to call attention to the terms in which Her Majesty was said to have communicated to the Pope of Rome her congratulations on the fact that he had completed the twenty-fifth year of his reign. At the present moment Europe had before it a question which completely divided it into two belligerent camps, and that was not a time for such congratulations. If the congratulations offered to the Pope had simply been congratulations as to his being in good health after a reign of five-and-twenty years, it would have been another thing, but the peculiar circumstances of Europe gave a special significance to the mode in which the event had been recognized, for the fact was, there was throughout that country a very strong manifestation on the part of the Roman Catholics in favour of taking an active part towards sustaining the position of the Pope.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 26th June, 1871.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Owens College* (211); Judicial Committee of Privy Council* (212).
Third Reading—Police Courts (Metropolis)* (125), and passed.

Their Lordships met—

Earl de Grey and Earl of Ripon, K.G., having been created Marquess of Ripon—Was (in the usual manner) introduced.

OWENS COLLEGE BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for confirming a Scheme of the Charity Commissioners for the Owens College at Manchester, and for other purposes connected therewith—Was presented by The LORD PRESIDENT; read 1^a. (No. 211.)

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF PRIVY COUNCIL BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to make further provision for the despatch of business by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—Was presented by The LORD CHANCELLOR; read 1^a. (No. 212.)

And having gone through the Business on the Paper, without debate—

House adjourned at half past Five o'clock, till To-morrow, half past
Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 26th June, 1871.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee—Resolutions [June 23] reported.
PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Sea Coast Fisheries (Ireland)* [216].

Mr. Whalley

First Reading—Betting [213]; Lunacy Regulation Amendment [214]; Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act (1870) Amendment* [215].
Second Reading—Public Libraries (Scotland) Act (1867) Amendment* [209].
Committee—Elections (Parliamentary and Municipal)(re-comm.) [103], debate further adjourned; Tramways Provisional Orders Confirmation (re-comm.) [197]—R.P.; Sale of Liquor on Sunday [48], put off.
Committee—Report—Promissory Oaths [169]; Public Health (Scotland) Supplemental* [189]; Sequestration (re-comm.)* [208]; Local Government Supplemental (No. 3) (re-comm.)* [211].
Third Reading—Kingsholm District Boundary* [185], and passed.

THE HERRING BRAND.—QUESTION.

MR. MACFIE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government has determined to decline to enter into any arrangement with the Government of the Netherlands for abolishing the herring brand?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, the Government has not declined to enter into arrangements with the Netherlands Government for the abolition of herring brands; but the Netherlands Government has been informed that the question could not engage the attention of Her Majesty's Government this Session in consequence of the pressure of Public Business.

IRELAND—NATIONAL TEACHERS—LABOURERS' HOUSES.—QUESTIONS.

SIR FREDERICK W. HEYGATE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, When he will state to the House the decision of the Government on the subject of the claims of the Irish National Teachers to an improved position and remuneration; and, whether the promised measure to facilitate the erection of labourers' houses in Ireland will be introduced in time to become Law in the present Session?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, the most convenient course would be that he should state the intentions of the Government with respect to the claims of the National School teachers to additional remuneration in moving the Irish Education Vote, which would be done probably at the end of this or the beginning of next week. With regard to labourers' cottages, he was extremely anxious to carry a measure to facilitate their erection, and he was not without hope of being able to introduce it in a short time, so that it might become law during the present Session. He had found the greatest difficulty in the consideration of this question, for, as he understood, it was the desire of many hon. Members that the measure should go considerably beyond that known as Sir William Somerville's Act. Although suggestions had been made very liberally during the debate on the subject, when he came to ask how those suggestions were to be carried out he found that, with the exception of the hon. Baronet himself, hon. Gentlemen were extremely chary in explaining how it was to be done.

ARMY—THE HOUSEHOLD REGIMENTS. QUESTION.

LORD GARLIES asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he can state how many of the thirty-eight candidates who were examined for commissions in the Household Regiments on the 5th of June last have been reported as qualified; whether he is aware that the conditions for such qualification were materially altered, but a very short notice having been given to the candidates of such intended alteration; whether it has been brought to his notice that the examiners read the portions for dictation with rapidity, and that the candidates were given no time for correction, punctuation, or writing a fair copy before their papers were collected; and, whether in these circumstances he will be prepared to allow the candidates who have failed in passing this examination to have another opportunity afforded them for qualifying within a reasonable period?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, I am informed that out of the whole number 16 have been qualified. At the examination in July last it was notified that any future examination would be under new regulations. When the present examination was asked for new regulations were issued accordingly. The principal alteration was that some knowledge of one modern language, either French or German, was required. I have not received an official reply to the letter which I have directed to be written to the Civil Service Commissioners, inquiring into the circumstances referred to in the third Question of the noble Lord; and, of course, it will not be right to presume in the meantime that any miscarriage is to be attributed to them. If the candidate is of the proper age, and has not had three trials, he will be allowed to try again, according to the usual practice; but, until I hear from the Civil Service Commissioners, I must decline to pledge myself to any special permission.

RECEIVER GENERAL OF INLAND REVENUE.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked, Whether any objection exists to the production of the Report upon the duties of the Office of Receiver General of Inland Revenue; and, whether the noble Lord recently appointed has had any training to fit him for the discharge of any duties which may attach to the office?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he was not aware whether his hon. Friend had in view any particular document of an official character to which the name of a Report would apply. [SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: It was alluded to in the recent debate.] At all events, what had happened with regard to the recent appointment was this:—When the vacancy occurred two questions were examined—first, whether the office should be abolished; and, secondly, whether, if an appointment should be made, it was desirable that it should be made from within the Department. It was the opinion of the Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue that the office should not be abolished, and also that it would not be advantageous to make the appointment from within the Department. The office was one of duty, which might, perhaps, be sufficiently discharged by a gentleman of character, intelligence, and knowledge of business, who was also able to find security for a large sum of money. The noble Lord who had received the appointment had special facilities for becoming acquainted with the duties of the office from his experience as a member of the Board of Treasury when he was himself Chancellor of the Exchequer.

EDUCATION—INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS. QUESTION.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether his attention has been called to the scanty supply of Industrial Schools throughout the Country; and, whether the Government are prepared to enlarge the powers given by the Industrial Schools Act (1866), so that a "prison authority" may build, as well as contribute to the building of, a certified Industrial School?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, in reply, that in common with all who took an interest in the question of education, he had had his attention called to the subject; but he scarcely felt qualified to form an opinion how far there was or was not a scanty supply of industrial schools until he should have an opportunity of comparing the results of the inquiry now being made into the state of education generally throughout the country. Power was given by the Act to school boards to build industrial schools, and they were put in a different position from prison authorities. The Secretary of State for the Home Department, to whom the Question ought to have been put rather than to himself, agreed with him in thinking that it would be impossible to introduce this year any amendment into the Act, so as to give other authorities this power, and that the Government would be in a better position next year, when they knew the actual requirements.

THE REVISED STATUTES.—QUESTION

COLONEL TOMLINE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, By what authority two Volumes have been published by the Queen's Printers in 1870 and 1871, purporting to be "The Statutes, Revised Edition, by Authority," from Henry the Third to the tenth year of George the Third; and, if the contents of these two Volumes are now the binding Statute Law of the Land?

MR. GLADSTONE said, in reply, that the circumstances connected with the preparation of these two volumes had been stated in Papers which had been laid on the Table, and in the preface to one of the volumes. They might be briefly given as follows:—It was under the authority of Parliament itself that the work had gone forward. Parliament had no less than three times expressed its desire for the preparation of a revised edition of the Statutes, and measures had been taken accordingly. It was, in fact, with that view that Parliament had been engaged in the task of repealing obsolete Statutes. The work had been carried down to the tenth year of George III.; it was intended to carry it further, and Bills had been prepared for the purpose. When a certain stage had been reached the Lord Chancellor of the day expressed an opinion that it was desirable to go on with the preparation of the revised edition, and the consent of the Treasury was obtained. The first and second volumes had been produced, and they comprised all the unrepealed Statutes up to the date he had named. The third volume would, he understood, comprise all the Statutes down to the present time.

ARMY—MILITIA OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

MR. J. S. HENRY asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is intended that no Militia Officer for the future shall be appointed a Field Officer unless he has served in a regiment of the Line; and if the rule is to apply to the Militia Officers whose regiments were embodied during the Crimean War and Indian Mutiny, and served side by side with regiments of the Line under the same generals, in Gibraltar, the Ionian Isles, Portsmouth, Aldershot, and other places?

MR. CARDWELL: No doubt, Sir, it is desirable that a fair proportion of the field officers of the Militia should have served in the Regular Army; but there is no intention of laying down a rule that no qualified Militia officer shall be promoted to be a field officer unless he has served in the Regular Army.

ELECTIONS (PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL) (re-committed) BILL—[BILL 103.]

(Mr. William Edward Forster, Mr. Secretary Bruce, The Marquess of Hartington.)

COMMITTEE. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [22nd June], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair;" and which Amendment was, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Cross,)—instead thereof.

Mr. J. G. Talbot

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. JAMES said, that as the subject of the Ballot had been discussed almost annually for nearly 40 years, he should have been content to record a silent vote were it not that he wished to direct attention to some practical questions connected with the matter. He admitted that there was not sufficient abstract superiority in the system proposed by the Bill over the existing method of voting to induce him to support the measure; and he made the concession that those who thought with him on that point, and supported the Bill only as a remedy for existing evils were bound to prove that there was a necessity for the change, to show what the existing evils were, and that the proposed measure was the best remedy for them. He approached the subject with mingled and varied feeling, for, to his mind, when the Ballot became the law of the land, it would be a day of humiliation, and bitter humiliation to the whole nation; not because there was anything humiliating in recording a vote in secret, but because, by adopting this measure, they as a people, confessed that from causes and conduct which ought to be within their control they were compelled to drive the electors of this country into secrecy, and were unable to permit them to record their votes in an open and public manner. He would state why, with some hesitation and doubt, he had been forced to the conviction that it was impossible to avoid adopting the enactments of the present Bill. The corrupt practices existing in the present electoral system were three—namely, bribery, treating, and undue influence; and he was ready to acknowledge that, if there was no other evil but the single one of bribery, he should not be a supporter of the present measure. He believed the Ballot would be the means of destroying that great and grievous evil of bribery; but still if that were the only evil he would leave it to the more natural remedy which had come into action, and which had done much to destroy the existence of bribery. He spoke the almost unanimous opinion of his professional brethren, whom he had consulted, when he said that there had been no General Election in the memory of man, probably none since the accession of the House of Hanover so free from bribery as the Election of 1868. Increased powers of detection were, no doubt, afforded by the legislation of 1868. Though 111 Members were Petitioned against, yet only in one English borough—Bridgewater—and only in one Welsh borough—Brecknock—were traces of the old regular system of bribery to be found; although, undoubtedly, in other instances, there were cases of individual spasmodic corruption. He believed that public opinion, which ever followed the law, would, as in the instances of duelling and slavery, in the end destroy bribery. When a Peer of the Realm stood at the Bar of the other House in practical danger of loss of property and liberty, in theoretical danger of the loss of life, duelling ceased to exist in this country. When a British merchant stood at the bar of a Criminal Court in danger of transportation for having assisted in the slave trade, we heard no more of British merchants indulging in the practice. And so he believed would it be with bribery, through the influence of public opinion. One sentence would be sufficient to dispose of the second evil to which he had referred—treating. That was nothing more than diluted bribery; and when it ceased to be encouraged by direct judicial decision, it might be hoped that, as the shadow followed the substance, with bribery it would pass away. He now came to the far more serious evil, which was increasing rather than diminishing, and on account of which he thought this Bill should pass. It was most difficult to demonstrate the existence of that evil in its full extent. In its origin it might perhaps be traced to that strong determination in the Anglo-Saxon character to reach success in any object which Englishmen had in view; but whatever its cause or origin, it had been in existence in this country from the very first day of our Parliamentary history. Parliaments were young, indeed, and Parliamentary life had been but short, when 600 years ago the necessity existed for this Royal declaration—

"In order that elections may be free, the King commandeth that no great man, or other, shall by force of arms or by malice or menace do aught to prevent anyone from having free election."

And 40 years later it was felt necessary to "pre-ordain" that—

"Every elector should freely vote, and that neither prayer nor oppression should be used to prevent his doing so."

That showed that at that early period undue influence existed as a great blot upon our electoral system, requiring special enactments. Time passed on, and the influence of great men somewhat passed away. But when towns increased, men became more obedient to the power of corruption, and in the reign of Elizabeth, when our commerce had grown great, money became more abundant, and bribery obtained superiority over undue influence. Constituencies became contracted; boroughs were bought and sold, and the sum of money received outweighed the indirect benefits of undue influence. But times had changed. The force of money had passed away, but the malice and the menace, the prayer and the oppression, remained. The Reform Act of 1832 had increased the amount of power given to the people; the constituencies were enlarged; it became difficult to bribe, and more easy to exercise undue influence. It then sprang for a second time into strong and clear existence; and then it was that reasoning and patriotic men came to regard the Ballot as desirable. But when the legislation of 1867 still further enlarged the constituencies of the country, that which was desirable after the Reform Bill of 1832 became an absolute necessity if the franchise was to remain in its present condition. He had said that the proof of the existence of undue influence was very difficult. He was not going to be anecdotal on the subject. Anecdote, to be worth telling, referred generally to an exceptional state of things, and to found legislation on an exceptionable state of things was most objectionable. But he would appeal to the judgment and knowledge of hon. Members, not to those whose lot had fallen in pleasant places, not to those who represented the Universities, whether English or Irish, not to those having a remote traditional right to represent certain constituencies in that country; but he would appeal to every hon. Member who had fairly fought a doubtful battle in a borough constituency, whether he had not, during and after the contest, had to listen to the sad tale of injury, misery, and half starvation incurred by an honest vote accorded in his favour? Evidence of this kind might be found by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Mover of the Amendment from borough Members near to him connected with the county he so well represented. No one could doubt that at the General Election of 1868 a strong Conservative feeling existed among the working class in the county of Lancaster; a vast number of the employers of labour entertained Liberal views; these came into conflict with those whom they employed, and what was the result? After the elections were concluded, did the Conservative opinions of the hon. Members for Staleybridge (Mr. Sidebottom), Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Mellor), Preston (Mr. Hermon), and, crossing the border, of Stockport (Mr. Tipping) remain unchanged? Confining himself to these four instances, was it not remarkable that within the small circle of one district they should be able to find so many converts to the Ballot from their own practical experience in borough elections? The hon. and learned Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. A. Cross) in effect denied the existence of undue influence, and stated that the Judges who were examined had come to the conclusion that it did not exist, forgetful of the fact that three Members had been unseated on that very ground. But he (Mr. James) would point out that the evil was one which never could be brought fully under the influence of the law, proof being almost impossible to get. No hon. Member could be unseated unless either himself or his agent had been guilty of undue influence. But the offence was never committed by a Member or his agent, but by employers of labour interested in the candidate's success or defeat. But before a Petition could be successfully presented, the persons desirous of presenting it had to show that the man guilty of undue influence was an agent, and this was the reason why the Judges had so little cognizance of undue influence. If the offence had been brought to the knowledge of the Judge, and so within power of punishment, he would hope on and trust to the law to repress it; but it was because the offence could not be reached he supported this Bill. There was much undue influence which the law could never touch or stay. If a customer passed a tradesman's shop and did not deal there he committed no crime, and if an employer conducted a candidate through his manufactory and afterwards put moral pressure on the men, who knew that they might, when an opportunity arose, be dismissed from their employment, no crime was committed. If undue influence was brought within statutory enactment, yet from the nature of the offence it would be impossible to prove it, and therefore impossible to inflict punishment; what hope, then, could be entertained that undue influence would come to a termination from natural causes? Exactly the reverse was the case, because as they diminished bribery so they increased undue influence. The man who had received money was on that account comparatively careless about dismissal; but, in the absence of a bribe, he was the easier prey to remote influence. It was admitted by the opponents of the Ballot that the influence of wealth ought not to be exerted; but they said the Ballot would deprive intelligence and education of their influence. He argued that such influences ought to exist as much as virtue should seek to control vice. The Ballot would assist such influences, for their object and end were to produce conviction and right political judgment, but they were now defeated by corruption; whereas, if we had the Ballot, no influence could come between the voter's conviction and his vote, so that the Ballot would really assist those who wished to attain their objects by conscientious conviction. If the opponents of the Ballot would be content with the influence of intelligence—

Mr. James

"With winning words to conquer willing hearts And let persuasion do the work of fear," they would have far more influence in the future than they now had. Men found it difficult to draw the proper line between persuasion and power; they did not perceive where they ceased to convince and commenced to compel, and they passed involuntarily from the exercise of persuasion to the use of force. He honestly believed that the extension of the franchise had rendered possible such an amount of undue influence on the part of employers over workmen—an amount far greater than that over possessed by landlords over tenants, and which would be so dangerous unless it were checked and controlled—that the present opponents of the Ballot would be the first to regret the success of their opposition if it were possible it should succeed. The public trustee argument, first used by Sir Robert Peel, was fallacious. It was generally the case that a trustee was a person who had no beneficial interest in that which was the subject of the trust, but it was not worth while to go into that view of the question. That there were public duties attaching to the exercise of the franchise no one could doubt; but so there were to many other things, such as the education of their children, and the disposal of their property so as not to interfere with the welfare of the State, which had to be done in private. But if there were a trust in relation to the vote, what was it? It could not be that the voter should vote abstractedly right or wrong, for who, save himself, was to determine between the two? nor to vote according to the opinion of the majority of non-electors, for, if so, all political responsibility in the voter would be at an end—the only suggested trust could be that the voter should vote as he deemed to be right according to his own conscience; but, under the present system, he could not always do so, and it was, therefore, absurd to say to the voter—"Fulfil your trust, which is to vote according to your conscience," and yet deny him the means whereby that trust could be performed. He had never heard or read a speech which more strongly convinced him that the Bill ought to pass than that which was made against it by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket). In 1838 the then Leader of the Opposition (Sir Robert Peel) in that House opposed the Ballot, because it would destroy the influence of property, and the hon. and learned Member who had been reading that speech, for he quoted it, went further, and used an argument which ought not to pass unnoticed. He said that the Members returned under the Ballot in Ireland would be far different from those who represented it now. There were now Irish Members who were returned by certain influences; the hon. and learned Member spoke of them as due influences, and no doubt, in his opinion, they were due influences; he did not refer to spiritual influence, which he detested, nor to that of intelligent persuasion, but he referred to territorial influences—the influences possessed by those who owned the land in Ireland. The hon. and learned Member admitted that there had been wise legislation with reference to the Irish land, and he almost allowed it to be inferred from his speech that there had been wise legislation with reference to the Irish Church; but he asserted that such legislation had been the work of those who were not the representatives of the people of Ireland, but the nominees of a class. The hon. and learned Member, calculating as if he were an election agent, told the House that if secret voting were adopted and the influence of that class destroyed, 70, 80, or even 90 of the future Irish Members would be Nationalists. Well, if those were the real opinions of the people of Ireland they had better be expressed, whatever might be the consequences. The hon. and learned Member further urged that the present system should be retained until the people had been educated; and thus, while history repeated itself, Parliamentary discussion contradicted itself. Some 50 or 60 years ago there was in that House a Member who belonged to that “moderate and respectable party” over which his hon. Friend’s sarcasm so pleasantly played on the last night of the debate; but he was a Member whom Irishmen revered and Englishmen respected, and whose name the hon. and learned Member himself would delight to honour, for he bore his name and was of his line and race. The Mr. Plunket of that day, in discussing a Motion upon Irish education, told the House that there were matters of even greater importance, for they must first afford to the Irish people a paternal government, and freedom of political power, or education would only enable them to count the property they did not possess, and read of the freedom that they did not enjoy. Yet the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin, the Mr. Plunket of the present day, would not pass a measure unobjectionable in itself, lest it should give the Irish people power to freely choose their Representatives. Thus they might learn how it was that Irish disaffection had seldom been manifested towards the English Crown, but always towards the English Parliament. That disaffection would never be removed until an English Parliament included more than two Representatives of Irish opinions. Let Ireland send whomever it would—the most uneducated peasant or the greatest bigot of any religion—and he should be welcome as long as he really represented the Irish people. He regretted to have to pass now to some technical objections to the Ballot, but they were worthy of consideration. It was objected that the secret Ballot would prevent a scrutiny, and that a vote, however bad, would have as much effect as a perfectly good vote. Such an argument, if not affected by an alteration in the law, ought to have some weight; but he could show how this objection could be met. No one could doubt that a scrutiny was objectionable, and might be used by a wealthy man for the oppression of one who was poor. In the course of 14 years only 10 or 11 hon. Members had been seated on a scrutiny. A vote was struck off either because the elector had been bribed, or had no proper qualification. The process now was to prove that a voter had been bribed, and to strike the vote off the poll-book, whether he had voted for the bribing candidate or not. Why, then, should they not adopt a suggestion made last year, and whenever a candidate was proved to have bribed strike off one from his poll? It would be perfectly fair to adopt this proposal; for, probably, the vote would follow the bribe, and, if it did not, the candidate who had bribed ought not to complain, for he had corrupted the voter, and had done his utmost to obtain a vote by illegal means. It would also act as a deterrent, for men would grow weary of paying for a vote they may not get, and yet, using an Irishism, lose it, although they never had it. This suggestion would not go so far as that made in 1867 by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), by which a Member who had bribed would have been superseded by the next candidate on the list no matter how great might be the disproportion in the number of votes given for each. The proposition to which he had just referred, of striking a vote from the number given in favour of a candidate for every voter, he or his agent, was proved to have bribed, was the one that Her Majesty’s Government had adopted in Clause 22 of their Bill from the Amendment Paper of last year. As an illustration of the working of this system, he regretted to be compelled to use the only instance the last General Election afforded, for he had to refer to a borough he did not often mention, and to a Member he but seldom referred to, for he had to speak of the borough of Taunton, and of that Member who was its least worthy Representative. He (Mr. James) was the only Member in that House who owed his seat to a scrutiny at the last General Election. In that case a Petition for a scrutiny was presented, and proof of bribery, although of a very verbal description, having been given, the votes of those who had been bribed were struck off; the Member petitioned against was dispossessed of his seat, and he (Mr. James) was placed in his present position. Exactly the same process would be applied under the Ballot system. The same proof would have been given, and the same result would follow. He had also to deal with votes without qualification, and the remedy he proposed for that was, instead of trying votes in many instances after the election before a Judge, to try them either before the revising barrister, or by appeal before the election. He would then make the register conclusive. It might be said that many persons left their residences during 12 months, or received parochial relief, but as under the present system a man might have to wait two years and five months before obtaining a vote, he did not see any harm in leaving him a vote for a few months after ceasing to occupy his house. But there was one objection which he admitted had force and weight, and which he could not get rid of so easily as the others. The opponents of the measure had a right to say that, if a bad vote was made of the same value as a good vote, there would be more inducement to personate and to place bad votes into the electoral urn, and there might be a far greater amount of personation than there was before. But it ought to be recollected that if bribery was stopped personation was also stopped. He had never yet known personation without bribery. It was necessary to bribe a man to personate, and in all our records of personation there had seldom been found a case of hostile personation without bribery. ["No, no!"] Of course he was speaking under correction, but he believed that was the case. It would be well for the House to consider whether the South Australian system should not be brought into existence. Let the voter's face be seen and his name mentioned, and any personation would at once be detected. He also suggested that personation should be made felony, and if the police had the power of arresting a man without warrant that would act as a great deterrent. He had treated this as a practical question, but he could not forget the appeal that had been made by the hon. and learned Gentleman who moved the Amendment—that that House would discuss this Bill without reference to party politics. He had obeyed that behest, and in return he had to make an appeal to hon. Members opposite, for on them chiefly rested the responsibility of determining whether or not this Bill should pass into law. It was given to the Parliament of 1867, but especially to those hon. Members who supported the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, to afford to the people of that country an extended and a full franchise. Upon those who commenced that work was now cast a duty, and that of no imperfect obligation, of completing what they had begun, by rendering that franchise a reality, by protecting the defenceless and strengthening the weak. To obtain that result some sacrifices must be made. They must cease to speculate upon the prospect of party gain; they must let the bonds of party ties lie lightly upon them, and they must cast aside traditions, old habits, manners of thought, and even expressed opinions. For any who hesitated thus to act let this be their reassurance, this their recompense, that in achieving this result they would be enabled to boast, and in that boast, the truth to tell, that they were of that reformed Parliament which, for the first time in the annals of this country, had afforded to its people the means and power to record a pure, free, and an unfettered vote.

Mr. James

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: It was expected by those who are acquainted with the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. James) that he would offer to us some remarks of great force upon a subject in which he is so much interested, and he has addressed himself to it in a spirit of both reasoning and argument, having a desire, as we all have, to come to a right conclusion, but I cannot say he has displayed that amount of enthusiasm which in former times made the Ballot for so many years one of the articles of belief and one of the watchwords of a portion of the Liberal party. I cannot help calling to mind the course through which this question has run, and the difference in its position now from that of some few years ago. In 1865 the Ballot was treated as an absolutely dead question, and Lord Palmerston, in a speech he then made, and which I remember, refused to take it up as a real one. The hon. Member for Bristol (the late Mr. Berkeley) said he was very willing on that occasion to hand it over to anyone, but he could get no one to take it, and he said he was willing to hand it over to the Government; but Lord Palmerston said he did not know any Government who would take it. It is singular that in a few short years that feeling, which was so cogent and so overpowering as to prevent this House from then adopting what had been put forward for many years by Mr. Grote, Mr. Berkeley, and others, should have passed away, and that a large party on the other side of the House should now be combined together upon this question as they have never been combined before. I am not going to enter into any party aspect of the matter, but it is impossible not to consider how it has come about that there should have been so complete a change, because the conversion of platoons is either by miracle or pressure. I cannot help thinking that when I see a conversion so great within a short period of time—when I see the followers of Sir Robert Peel combined with the old Whigs, and these again combined with the Liberal party below the gangway—it is impossible for me not to see that there must be some reason other than argument, because the arguments addressed to us to-night were all addressed to us before, and it is impossible to import anything new into the subject. If, then the arguments were unconvincing before, what has brought this change about? I have seen some instances of pressure even within these few days. Only the other day my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Vernon Harcourt) was complaining that the Government would not give way as to the Endowed Schools Act, but in the next week, on a question of precisely the same principle—that of Harrow School—they yielded, and unanimously walked out into the Lobby with the hon. and learned Gentleman as they had walked out against him the week before. Under these circumstances one cannot help thinking that there must be some reason other than argument for this extraordinary cohesion. I quite admit that there have been a few conversions. After a closely-contested election, candidates are apt to consider that they have been ill-used if they have not attained all that they desired; they are apt to lay stress on the statements that voters make for not having supported them, and they are inclined to believe that pressure has been used. Thinking too much of themselves, they give credence to these stories, and many of them think that the only cure for what has happened would be the Ballot. But are such cases reasons why we are to have this great, and, as the hon. and learned Member for Taunton admits, humiliating change? He (Mr. James) has not spoken of one point which has been much put forward by others—namely, that the Ballot would secure peace and order at elections. I freely confess that I think much might be done to secure greater peace and order on the day of election. I believe the publication of the state of the poll is calculated to create disorder, and that it is desirable it should not be published. I would further advocate a means by which you would ascertain more fully the opinions of the whole constituency of the country than by any other that you could adopt, and which would also be just as effectual in promoting peace and order—namely, the system of voting papers. I know hon. Members may say that pressure may be used under that system; but that is a question of time and opportunity, and if the voting papers were issued as they ought to be, objections would be obviated and peace and order preserved. You propose to get rid of nominations, and that, though a doubtful matter, would at least conduce in some degree to peace and order. As I understand the hon. and learned Member there is only one thing for which you are to have recourse to the Ballot, and that is the repression of certain kinds of undue influence. But what is your motive for abandoning the manly system of open voting? Is it to improve this House, or is it to improve the conduct of elections? Now, I wish to ask hon. Members—“Which of you it is who is the extra Member?" Three gentlemen were once driving in a cab, and one of them put the question to the cabman—which of them was the extra member—and the cabman could not answer. I do not think anyone here would be willing to admit himself to be the extra Member, or that he came into this House by undue influence, or by any undue means whatever. Either this House represents the country or it does not, and it seems to me an extraordinary thing that hon. Members should begin by maligning the House to which they belong. An hon. Member who preceded me has admitted, with respect to bribery, that there never was so little; and I may undertake to say there never was so little undue influence. With respect to Ireland, it should be remembered that there was no evidence before the Committee whatever which was of any effect in showing the existence of undue influence there. What is the meaning of the Land Bill, if undue landlord influence is to be alleged to exist in Ireland? It seems to me that a tenant is as much an owner now as the man above him; he is no longer under the possibility of oppression, and if you can arrive at this conclusion without the process of the Ballot, it is far better to bring it about by the ordinary operation of the law than by a process of this kind which is an injury in itself. The hon. and learned Member says that the great desirability of the Ballot lies in this—that you obtain an absolute secrecy of voting. I do not think this is the occasion for entering into details on a point which will come before us in Committee, but I would say in respect to his (Mr. James's) plan of striking off votes for bribery nothing could be more unjust. It may be perfectly just where the agent may have bribed, or where the candidate may have bribed; but supposing that neither the one nor the other has bribed, but some person for whom they are not responsible, are the votes to be struck off to the prejudice of the candidate at whose instance the bribery was not given? And with regard to personation, it appears from the statements of those acquainted with Australia that, even in those places where you would expect every man to know the other, personation is prevalent, in some instances, to a considerable extent; and you know that it largely exists in America, where, no doubt, the Ballot is not secret, because the American citizen would despise the notion of concealing any vote that he gave; and, voting as they do in America for as many as 30 or 40 candidates, voting by "ticket" is really the only way in which they can vote with any effect. But by the mode now proposed the Ballot is very much like bribery, because it treats every man as having in his vote a personal right—not a privilege. The vote has been called a "trust;" but in the Amendment which I ventured to move in the Committee elsewhere, I particularly avoided the use of the term "trust," and spoke of it as a public duty for which the voter was under a public responsibility. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government has stated that his reason for always voting with Lord Palmerston against the Ballot was that he held the argument as to the franchise being a trust as conclusive, although the right hon. Gentleman thinks that argument now no longer applies, for a reason to be noticed presently. What is it then you are doing by the Ballot? You are changing what is a public duty—for which the elector is responsible—first to his conscience and then to his neighbours and everybody about him, into a system of distrust, and in its place you are making hypocrisy an absolute duty. ["No, no!"] You are telling him that he shall not go to the poll openly—that it shall be an offence for him to tell for whom he is voting. ["No; not for speaking."] Not for speaking. No; speaking will be a matter perfectly indifferent, for you are going to set up a system of lying. The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) made some amazing statements, which I made a note of at the time, giving the notion that the tribunals, and almost all the officials of this country are governed simply by penal motives, because he said that in cases in which the State does not sufficiently remunerate a man for the discharge of the public duty, it calls in the aid of secrecy for his conscience, while the man who is remunerated has to discharge his duties openly. Was there ever such an assertion made in regard to the Judicial bench as that it only gives its judgments openly because it is paid? What is to be said of all those other officers who are not paid—for instance, the unpaid magistracy, the guardians of the poor, and the members of various local boards? Then, the hon. Member spoke of the deliberations of the Cabinet being kept secret; but who ever heard of its being necessary that they should be disclosed? It is their acts which are important, and each Member of the Cabinet is held individually responsible for that which is brought forward or done by the collective body. The hon. Member also said the Press is anonymous. Well, it is generally so, though not always; but the newspaper itself is under a responsibility and has to give security. Moreover the Press seeks to affect public opinion, not by the force of a name, but by force of argument; and the influence which its articles may have depends upon the strength or the weakness of its arguments. The subject of anonymous writing may, therefore, be perfectly open to discussion, but it has no bearing on the question now before us. It seems to me that the hon. Member treated conscience—a word constantly used in this discussion—not as that which makes us firm and resolute, but as that which “makes cowards of us all.” It appeared to be supposed that we are to be so low in patriotism, so degraded in feelings, as to be ashamed or afraid to do anything that involves self-sacrifice and self-denial. The President of the Poor Law Board told us, indeed, that he believed we are to arrive at bravery through cowardice, and that that is the only way of arriving at it. Then you must alter the teaching in your schools, and cease to tell the young that honesty is the best policy, because dishonesty and concealment are to become the best policy. If you teach one thing in your schools and another at your elections, you will do all you can to promote dishonesty and selfishness. The poet says—

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

“Give unto me made lowly wise,
The spirit of self-sacrifice.”

But you say—“Give us the spirit of selfishness; let that be the ruling principle on which everybody is to act.” If that is to be the rule acted upon at the elections, why is it not to be acted upon in this House? The Notice of Motion given by the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. C. Bentinck), for taking votes by Ballot in this House, caused some laughter; but there was rather more to be said for it, perhaps, than was supposed. In the French Chamber once men voted by Ballot, as they were elected by Ballot. I do not see that the practice showed any good results in the one case or in the other. But the public duty of the men who are sent here by the constituencies to discuss and pass laws, because it is impossible for the constituencies to attend here personally themselves, is to make use of their consciences and their judgments; and why are hon. Members of Parliament to have their names set down and published in a division list, if the electors are to give their votes in secret? It may be said that public opinion might not have a good effect on the voter; but any public opinion is useful in some sense, and it is far better that a man's conscience should be subjected to the test of public scrutiny, because, as Mr. Mill justly says, if the voter has to bear the test of public scrutiny, he is not likely to adopt opinions, unless he feels that there are good grounds for them. Instead of saying to him—

“To thine ownself be true,
And it must follow, as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man.”

The whole argument for the Ballot is that a man is not to be true to his opinion, but to his interest. [“No, no!”] Well, if he is true to his opinion, he has the means of giving effect to it by an open vote; but by the Ballot you tell him that he is not to risk any consequences—that he is to be false to any man that he may be true to himself. A speech by Sir Robert Peel has been referred to, and it may be that speech has some lingering influence on the minds of those who heard it, among whom, perhaps, was the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, who doubtless listened with delight to its classical allusions, and followed its conclusions almost with conviction. And what was the case then? Had this thing been tried? It was tried in Rome, and it is a remarkable thing that from the time of the establishing Ballot Law, whatever may have been the cause, whether or not it was the corrupt state of society which led to the decadence of Rome, things got worse and worse until we come to the time when Pliny gives a most accurate description of similar results to those likely to follow from the adoption of the right hon. Gentleman's Bill. We are invited to manufacture a free elector, described by an old Whig as—

“The elector free, free to think one way and act another; free to profess friendship and gratify enmity; free to advocate openly certain political opinions and sacrifice them to feelings of personal friendship or personal hostility; free to consult his own selfish purposes, while loud in his praise of conscientious political integrity."

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

That is what you want to get; and now let us see how Pliny describes these free and independent voters. He says—

"Poposcit tabellas, stilum accepit, demisit caput, neminem veretur, se contemnit."

Sir Robert Peel, commenting upon this, said—

"The reverence for authority was gone, the fear of public opinion was removed, the aspect of a grave magistrate—the living lesson (as Gibbon calls it) to the multitude—ceased to encourage or rebuke, and the voter retired from the Ballot conscious, perhaps, of the violation of a promise, with the sense of shame in his demeanour, and the feeling of dishonour and degradation in his heart. And be assured that if this feeling be introduced here, if you accustom the voter to the violation of a solemn promise, if you make him believe that a lie told to a landlord is of little comparative consequence, you will dearly purchase the advantage of a secret vote at the price of promises disregarded, truth habitually violated, the sense of honour destroyed, and self-esteem extinguished."—[3 Hansard, xl. 1212.]

That is the description of the voter who takes the voting paper and retires to the little recess in which there is a pencil which is to be tied with a strong piece of tape for fear, as appears from the Australian reports, that he should steal it. That is the estimate the Prime Minister has of the conscientious voter; he wishes the pencil to be tied by a strong piece of tape—red tape, I suppose—for fear he should carry it away. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. James), like most other speakers on his side, gives up the case of bribery. He has not fully admitted that bribery will go on in the same way, and probably it would not be the case; but a comparison in this respect between England and the colonies could scarcely be permitted. They have there a suffrage which is wider than the suffrage of this country, and that makes a most material difference in the position of the two. The contests for seats in the colonies also are not so stubborn and obstinate as they are in this country, and party feeling does not there run so high; and yet still Sir James Fergusson, in a letter on the whole favourable to the Government's view, says that the system has never yet experienced a full and strong trial. Do you believe that in the contests which will arise for seats in this House, so long as a seat is valued as it now is, and so long as such great efforts are made to obtain it, that there will not be bribery and personation? My hon. and learned Friend says personation never exists without bribery. I know of many instances in which it has been proved to have occurred, especially in municipal elections, and there is nothing in the Bill to put a stop to it. It is said that it is idle to talk of clubs or secret societies as instruments for turning elections, but in Ireland, especially where the oath of the secret society is respected, this Bill would give the undue influence of such combinations full power and destroy the due influence of mental superiority. With respect to treating, I read in The Times the other day an account of an election in Melbourne, in which the treating was described as "excessive;" the treating was apparently conducted very much in the same way as in England, so that it appears the Ballot has not done much to put an end to treating. Do you imagine, also, that canvassing will be stopped by the Bill, or that people will cease to ask for votes, or trust to promises; or do you imagine that the tyrants whom you suppose to exist so generally among the constituencies will not be very much like other people; that they will not arrive at conclusions "from information which they have received?" Do you suppose that secrecy will be so absolute, even in the domestic establishment, that a landlord's agent will not arrive at what has taken place; and do you suppose that these great tyrants, as they are supposed to be, will be less scrupulous than they now are? If you do so suppose, I think that you will be very much deceived upon this point. The truth is, with regard to the great majority of the people in England, that they do not want the Ballot, and will not have secrecy, and it will only be used by people who want to conceal what they do for motives of their own. You say that you are going to give them a choice of evils. An advocate of the Ballot says that it is "a necessary evil;" the hon. and learned Member for Taunton says that it is a choice of evils; and the Prime Minister also offers us, as he said last year, a choice of evils, and he offers us the worse. As is said by one advocate of the Bill, it is a necessary evil and a humiliation. What is the evil of the present system? The present system results in a sin against the law of the country by an individual; you offer us a legislative evil; you would do evil by the State that good may come of it; and you say that evil done by the State is better than evil done by the individual. When the State seeks to mend a breach of its law, by altering the law itself, it does a wrong to itself, and leaves the criminal unpunished. But the Bill is inconsistent in itself. It begins by asserting that every man has a right to secrecy in the exercise of his privilege as a voter; and yet, with respect to the City of London, for instance, the Bill requires over 80 persons publicly to declare their preference for particular candidates. Of course the Bill does not require them to vote according to their declaration, for, of course, they may vote differently from their declared preference if they please. Ten men upon each occasion are to come forward on behalf of each candidate, and are to deprive themselves of secrecy, and to place themselves as marks for the shots of the mob. Again, do you believe that men will keep secret their votes? An hon. Member says that after voting rioting begins; but at Chippenham houses were wrecked before the voting began, and so it was again in Monmouthshire. All the rioting also was on one side, and there was nothing but the opinions entertained which could have rendered the parties liable to the violence which they suffered. Under the present law parties who were so injured can obtain no compensation from the hundred unless the rioting is of that character that amounts to a felony, which, I think, is a very great injustice. Is it supposed that that sort of thing will be stopped by the present Bill? I have not heard one word said as to rioting, and you are going to mark out ten persons for each candidate who shall be put forward as the victims of the party. Now, is it the fact that in the most secret of Ballot countries the secret as to voting is really kept? Candidates will always be able to know the opinions of all those who are worthy of any consideration at all. Patronage, too, will go on. The party opposite made great protestations that patronage was not to be one of their weapons; but a careful examination of their proceedings has shown me that patronage has still its old meaning, and that it has not fallen from their hands, like the dew from Heaven, upon the evil and the good; it falls upon the good only as the word "good" is construed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. The question as regards undue influence in Ireland is whether under the Ballot that influence will be still brought to bear. I am firmly convinced as the result of my examination of witnesses who came before the Committee, that illegal influence will still be brought to bear in Ireland, notwithstanding the adoption of the Ballot in that country. I do not say that this influence will be brought to bear through the confessional, but there are plenty of means by which those who use the confessional—and would not, I may admit, use it for any improper purpose—might ascertain what was going on, and use their influence very strongly in support of the views which they held. I wish hon. Members would read that part of the evidence in which the Bishop of Limerick showed what was the meaning of the denunciations which sometimes are made from the altar. The Bishop stated that disobedience to an injunction conveyed in a denunciation from the altar by a priest was a mortal sin; and he said, further, that there were certain questions of such importance, and which were so clearly understood by all Roman Catholics, that persons supporting them in any way would also be guilty of mortal sin, except under very exceptional circumstances. I do not go further than to say that this presents a means of getting at the consciences of the voters, which may be liable to impressions alike from priests, and from some of the secret societies in Ireland, which the Ballot will not counteract. Where publicity exists in a country, and has existed so long a time that it may be said to have become, as in our own case, the vital breath of the Constitution, you ought not to do away with it except for the very strongest reasons. Bribery and treating are given up, intimidation is the only difficulty remaining, and even that has been proved not to exist to anything like the extent to which it formerly did. It has not been proved to exist to an extent sufficiently injurious to affect the character of this House; to render the constituencies unfit to discharge their functions, or, except in very rare instances, to press harshly upon individuals. I say, therefore, that the Ballot is bad in itself, because if you call it a choice of evils

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

you make that admission; that it is injurious to the character of the constituencies, because a constituency being made up of units, anything which renders the units degraded, dishonest, and corrupt similarly affects the whole; and that it is injurious to public opinion, because it destroys the means by which a healthy and wholesome expression of public opinion may alone be obtained. You cannot tell with the Ballot whether the opinions which a man expresses is that which he really holds, because, by your own assumption, there are certain persons in this country afraid to express their opinions, and who will express opinions which they do not entertain in order to escape some possible punishment which they think hangs over them. I take upon me the whole responsibility to which the hon. and learned Member for Taunton has adverted, and, having contested one borough and sat for another, I say, without hesitation, that to my knowledge the circumstances to which he referred did not occur in either of those constituencies. I am convinced, therefore, that there are a great number of hon. Members of this House who, not listening to the idle tales of those voters who came to them with excuses for not having supported their candidature, would come to the conclusion that the elections in this country, as at present conducted, are as fair a reflex of the opinion of the public as could be obtained under any system of secret voting. But this Bill would, if passed, have further consequences, which cannot, to my mind, be regarded with any feelings than those of apprehension. Sir Robert Peel foretold those consequences in the speech to which I have adverted, when he said—

“When you have got the Ballot then will come the demand, even now plainly foreseen and foretold, the demand for extended suffrage as the necessary consequence—nay, as the only remedy, of the special evils of the Ballot, for suffrage not circumscribed by arbitrary rules as to residence on property, but for suffrage co-extensive with population and restricted only, if at all, by the age of 21.”—[3 Hansard, xl. 1213.]

A few nights ago something dropped from the Prime Minister which may have been thought by some to have been at the time laid hold of and commented upon unfairly, but which was, as I can convince the House, entirely in accordance with what fell from his lips in more lengthened sentences last year. The right hon. Gentleman at the time to which I am alluding said he had changed his opinion with regard to the Ballot, because the argument of Lord Palmerston that the vote was a public trust, and that the voter was a trustee, for those who are not represented, had passed away, and the right hon. Gentleman stated his reasons for this change in the following words:—

“When we have adopted household suffrage we have, I think, practically adopted the principle that every man who is not disabled in point of age, of crime, of poverty, or through some other positive disqualification, is politically competent to exercise the suffrage, and it is a simple question of time and convenience when this suffrage shall be placed in his hands.”—[3 Hansard, cciii. 1030.] Whose time and whose convenience? Are we to wait for some new disruption, some new period of difficulty, in order to reach the period of time when it will be convenient to carry out the views of the right hon. Gentleman? The argument of the right hon. Gentleman was that the country and Parliament were placed logically in the position when manhood suffrage, and, as I will presently show, female suffrage also, must be conceded. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded to say—

“There is no longer, properly so-called, a limited constituency acting and exercising a trust on behalf of the whole people; but that the basis on which Parliament desires to found the representative system of the country is a basis not less wide than that of the entire nation. Setting aside those who may be subject to positive disqualifications; and, consequently, that the trust which is exercised by the father of a family, or by an adult male, in giving a vote for a Member of Parliament, is practically a trust which he holds mainly on behalf of his wife and children, all other persons being presumably entitled to act with him on a footing of equality in giving a vote.”—[Ibid. 1031.]

There is no doubt that last year the right hon. Gentleman was strongly opposed to female suffrage, for he came down to the House and assisted the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilnarnock (Mr. Bouverie) to throw out a Bill which would have conferred it; but this Session he came down and said that if the difficulties of women going personally to the poll could be got rid of the franchise would well be granted to them. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] All I can say is that I am correctly stating the impression left on my mind by the speech; but if the right hon. Gentleman intimates that I have misapprehended his meaning, I will not press the matter further. Passing from that question, it is safe for me to say that, according to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman himself, this Bill would unsettle the suffrage and open new questions in regard to the franchise, and that is, to my mind, an undertaking of so grave a nature as to justify me in voting against the Bill. This measure would not, if passed, confer any advantage upon the public generally, but would simply act as a cloak to the mean, the cowardly, and the dishonest among the electoral body, because unless a man is consistent in his lying the Ballot can be of no use to him. I will be no party to any such proceedings as those to which I have alluded, and as I believe the Ballot to be bad in itself, and likely to lead to renewed agitation in the country, I shall unhesitatingly record my vote against the Motion to go into Committee on the Bill before the House.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. G. Hardy) has taunted hon. Members on this side of the House with having been very rapidly converted to the Ballot, but will he say that any single one of such conversions has been half as rapid as that of himself and of a great number of those who sit behind him upon the subject of household suffrage? In order that the House might forget the rapidity of that conversion the right hon. Gentleman quoted from a speech in which Sir Robert Peel resisted the Ballot, for this reason, among others, that it would cause a demand for extended suffrage; but he did not add that, thanks to himself, the demand for the suffrage has preceded the Ballot. The right hon. Gentleman dwelt, with all the honest energy of his disposition, upon what he thought would be the falseness and the hollowness in the electoral mind which would result from the adoption of the Ballot, but I must say that I see no reason for any such gloomy anticipations. I feel convinced that if this Bill passes many men will profess their political opinions and work as ardently as ever in their support; and, in saying that, I would point out that the right hon. Gentleman was inconsistent enough to say that the majority did not want the Ballot, but would proclaim their political opinions as much as ever. If so, there would be no real reason for the exercise of meanness, falseness, or dishonesty on the part, at all events, of those who held warm political opinions. The question, however, which the Government had to consider was, what protection could be afforded to the large number of persons who did not hold such warm political opinions as to induce them to proclaim them from the house-top, and who at the same time wished to exercise their privilege apart from the influence of their landlords or employers. I cannot see that the Ballot will create or foster meanness or dishonesty, because men will leave off asking questions to which they know they can get no certain answer. They will be content either to accept the assurance of the voter as to the way in which he had voted, or not trouble themselves about the matter at all. Once the Ballot comes into operation in a country there is no longer such a thing as inquiring how a voter has voted; there is no longer such a thing, even, as assuming that he has voted in a particular sense. The idea of exacting a vote, or punishing a voter in any way for exercising the franchise, never enters into the head of any man; and the consequence is that ultimately voting becomes almost as open under the secret system as it was before. We have heard a great deal of voting being a trust. I have no doubt that to many hon. Members upon both sides of the House that argument is extremely interesting, but it seems to me that it is an argument of too speculative a character to have much weight upon the decision of this House. I think the House and the country will be guided far more by what they think will be the practical effect of this measure than by any argument of that kind. I do not think it at all necessary to concede that the Ballot will be an evil; but I am prepared to admit that, although we shall gain a great deal more than we shall lose by its adoption, still there are certain advantages which we shall have to relinquish. For instance, there will be so much uncertainty as to a candidate or an agent obtaining any consideration for the money that he pays that few men, I think, will be found to risk their money for so doubtful a result. That will be a very great gain. On the other hand, the hon. and learned Member for South-west Lancashire, in his able speech the other night, certainly put his finger upon what, as it seems to me, will be the only thing that we shall lose—the facilities given by the publication of the votes to a petitioner for putting his hand upon cases where bribery has been committed. If a voter has voted in a manner contrary to that which was expected or promised, no doubt this may put the petitioner upon the scent, but I do not believe that is the way in which bribery is usually detected. I am happy to say that I have never had any experience either of petitioning or being petitioned against, but in those cases of which we commonly hear, the operation seems to be somewhat of this kind: when money is being freely spent in a contest, it is impossible that this can be done with complete secrecy; the thing is whispered about and talked about, there is a prevailing impression—something in the air, as it were—to the effect that there is money going. After the election is over, if the defeated party thinks it worth while, these rumours are traced, and further inquiry is made; and as both the bribers and the persons bribed must be persons of extremely indifferent moral character, it is not generally a very difficult operation to find a traitor in the camp, and when once a clue has been obtained further discoveries become much more rapid. It is in that way, I believe, that petitioners are put upon the scent much more frequently than by the publication of the poll-book. Then, as to personation. I quite agree with what was stated by the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Mr. James) that personation is only another form of bribery. It is impossible to suppose that anybody will expose himself to the enormously severe penalties which he will incur if detected, without any consideration other than the anxiety which he feels for the success of one of the candidates. Under the Ballot you weaken the inducements to personate, because, though the bribe may be given and taken as before, the candidate or the agent can never know with certainty that the vote has been given in the sense that is desired. Several phrases have been repeated over and over again in this discussion to which weight apparently attaches, but which appear to me to represent nothing but fallacies. We are told that the Ballot will encourage bribery and personation by making them impossible to detect. How is that shown?

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

In the present day you must trace the money from the agent to the voter; or in a case of personation, you must prove that a certain person, A. B., voted for and represented another person, C. D. These things will be as capable of proof under the Ballot as under the present system; for it is no part necessarily of the offence that the briber or the personator shall have voted for any particular candidate. Another argument which seems to have a great effect upon the minds of hon. Gentlemen is the tremendous operations which will be resorted to for bribery by results. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University (Mr. G. Hardy) alluded to this when he spoke of bribery by clubs. But if that be such an admirable mode of bribery, I want to know why it is not practised now? I do not believe that there is any reason to suppose that this conditional form of bribery will be more easily practised under the Ballot than it is at present; and I have never heard of its being extensively resorted to. It is true that the candidate would not pay his money unless he were returned; but, on the other hand, what would there be to prevent the leader of a club of 300 or 400 men from making his bargain with the candidate on either side, and thus securing his money whichever was returned? One or two bargains of that kind would, I believe, soon deter candidates from expenditure of so useless and unprofitable a character. Then as to intimidation, without going into details, I think I may say that, for all the ordinary and coarser forms of intimidation—such as intimidation of tenants by landlords, of tradesmen by customers, or of workmen by trades unions—the Ballot would be a complete cure. Against all these undoubted gains, what have hon. Gentlemen on the other side to put? It is said that we shall lose the salutary effect of public opinion upon the mind of the voter. I should very much like to know what that means. I admit that very frequently it happens now that a voter who has always voted “blue,” or has always voted “yellow,” and whose family have always voted in the same way, does not like to vote differently, because he would be supposed to have turned his coat, and it is very possible that under the Ballot, instead of continuing to vote as he and his family had always done before, the voter might vote for the candidate he personally preferred. But I do not think that would be a very great loss. What I want to know is, how public opinion is brought to bear upon the voter so as to exercise a salutary effect upon him. I believe that a corrupt voter votes now for some corrupt motive, and under the Ballot he will probably continue to do the same. But I do not believe that the honest voter is always thinking about his being clothed with a trust for the benefit of the nation, of the duty which he owes to his country, or of the salutary effect which public opinion exercises upon him. I believe what the honest voter thinks of is, who will best represent his political opinions, and who will make, in his opinion, the best Member for the county or the borough. I should like to offer one or two remarks upon the very able and eloquent speech which we heard the other night from the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket). Much as there was to admire in that speech, there were two points by which I was particularly struck. The first was, the intense admiration that the hon. and learned Member appeared to feel for his own profession. According to his view, there was nothing like leather. For admitting that the evils which had prevailed before might still continue to prevail, the hon. and learned Member dwelt upon the great change which had been made in the tribunal that was to try the offences. Formerly, he said, you used to try these cases by a tribunal which was corrupt, and which, perhaps, sympathized to a certain extent with the criminal. An investigation by an election Judge ought, no doubt, to have an extremely deterrent effect on an intelligent criminal; and, indeed, I have heard that during the progress of the last General Election the prospect of such an investigation being made did have a considerable effect in restraining malpractices which would have otherwise prevailed. There was a general apprehension that the Courts would be much more severe than they turned out actually to be, and that it would be impossible for any person to resort to corrupt practices with such impunity as he could before. Since then, however, I have heard even hon. Members of this House say it would be extremely easy to spend a great deal of money, and to use a great deal of influence at future elections, without coming within the reach of the law. Besides, I believe that no tribunal, however excellent, even if it were a great deal better than the present tribunals of the election Judges, would entirely remedy the evils which are complained of. I believe that the very worst cases did not come before the Judges at all, and that even when a Petition was presented, the petitioners did not always make out so strong a case as they might have done. There was a good reason for this. It was well known that if too strong a case were made out against the opposite side the character of the borough would be taken away altogether, and consequently the borough would thenceforth lose the right of being represented in the House of Commons. I think the fear of disfranchisement may have operated in several instances so as to prevent the strongest possible case being brought under the notice of the Judges. The hon. and learned Member indulged a great deal in prophesy, and described to us not only the inherent evils of the system, but likewise the results that would follow its adoption. First of all, he predicted the extinction of the party to which I hope I have the pleasure of belonging. Now, I need hardly say, that, with the hon. and learned Member, no one can look upon such an event as an unmitigated calamity more than I should, but I confess I do not feel myself wholly cast down by the prophesy of the hon. and learned Member. I believe that the Whigs have been always distinguished by a sincere love of free institutions, and that they have always sought to reform rather than to pull down the institutions of the country. I believe, in short, that they have been consistent and sincere lovers of freedom and popular progress. Well, if that be a correct description of the principles of the Whig party, I do not see what reason they have to fear a system which would place a large amount of political power in the hands of persons who take a calm and at the same time a liberal view of the institutions of this country and of public events. I think the politics of the large body of the people would answer precisely to the description I have just given of the politics of the Whigs, and I do not see why enabling persons to vote as they wish, and not compelling them to vote as somebody else wishes, should lead necessarily to the extinction of the Whig party. But even if the hon. and learned Member be a true prophet, I do not think I am wrong in saying that those who still call themselves Whigs do not desire to sit in this House or to take a share in the Government of the country by means of corrupt practices. The hon. and learned Member next prophesied that the most disastrous results would ensue from the adoption of the Ballot in Ireland. I think he was rather rash to touch on the subject of Irish elections, for if there be one part of the United Kingdom where a change is required more than in any other it is Ireland. Without any hesitation, I say that the present system of Irish elections is a disgrace to a civilized community, and as an instance, I will briefly refer to the case of a county election and of a borough election. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy) stated that no case had been proved where intimidation by landlords was exercised in Ireland; but surely he must have forgotten the case of the Sligo election, where it was proved by a Roman Catholic priest who came before us, and who certainly was not contradicted in a single item of his evidence, that intimidation of the grossest and most flagrant character was practised at that election. This witness cited instances where tenants had received threatening letters from landlords, telling them that if they did not vote in a particular way they would have to pay increased rent, or else go to America. Then we heard that some days before the polling-day two or three resident magistrates had to be sent into the county in order to keep the peace. A large force of constabulary, and even of troops, was likewise sent there, and for days before the election, escorts were sent out in order to bring voters into the polling-places. These precautions were, I believe, absolutely necessary in consequence of the intimidation practised by the landlords and the equal amount of intimidation on the other side. We were told of armed parties going about the country threatening electors with dreadful consequences if they gave an unpopular vote. Such was the state of the county of Sligo prior to the election. It was a struggle in regard to which I cannot take upon myself to decide who was right and who was wrong—a struggle between the landlords, the priests, and the mob. In most instances individual voters had no free choice as to the way they would vote; and consequently, in most instances, only an unwilling share in the result. I will now take the description of the Drogheda election, which was investigated by Judge Keogh. It is impossible to read anything which conveys a more vivid description of what an election ought not to be than the account given by that learned Judge of the election for Drogheda. It is sufficient to say that for three or four days the town was in a state of such violent tumult that the unpopular candidate did not venture to make his appearance at all. On the morning of the election, a mob proceeded to the railway station to prevent his voters from going to the poll. I forgot, however, to mention that at the nomination the tumult was so great that the returning officer had to ask a person present whether anybody had proposed and seconded Sir Leopold M'Clintock, and if so, whether any body had demanded a poll. The riot on the following day was so serious that a large number of electors were unable to record their votes at all, and it was only by a miracle that many lives were not lost. Now, is it possible to conceive a state of things more completely removed from freedom of election than is depicted in the accounts of these two elections? And I appeal to hon. Members who are acquainted with the facts to say whether these are altogether exceptional occurrences. It appears to be a recognized practice at an Irish election to hire a mob. Both sides usually have mobs, and the peace of towns is thoroughly disturbed by their proceedings. I think the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin said that voters would be attacked under the Ballot just the same as they are under the existing system, because their opinions would be just as well known. If the Ballot were introduced, I do not believe that mobs would be made use of at elections as they are now. It seems to me that the object of employing mobs at these elections is to excite terror in the minds of the voters, and to warn them of the consequences that will happen if they give a certain vote; and if it is never known what votes the voters give, it appears to me that the motive in the employment of a mob will almost altogether be done away with. We have been told that the adoption of the Ballot has entirely removed the violence that used to prevail at elections in some of the colonies, and I do not know why we are to assume that the adoption of the Ballot in the Irish elections should not have a similarly good effect. We are told, however, that in Ireland there is one species of intimidation over which the Ballot will have no effect—and that is spiritual intimidation. Hon. Members speak on this and many other points as if the adoption of the Ballot would deprive us of all the other means which we now have of checking unfair proceedings at elections. It is not proposed to take away any of the powers which the Judges or the House now have in such cases. Bribery, intimidation, and corrupt influence of all kinds will be just as much prohibited and punishable by law after the Ballot has been established as they are now. Spiritual intimidation will be one of those classes of intimidation which it will be perfectly open to the law to take cognizance of, and if used to a certain extent such intimidation will invalidate an election. Judge Keogh laid that down very clearly in his judgment on the Galway election. Judge Keogh said that spiritual intimidation could be proved in the same way as intimidation of any other kind, and that if it were proved to exist, in his opinion, the candidate in support of whom it had been used would be deprived of his seat in the same way as the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. G. H. Moore) was deprived of his seat in 1857. I admit that the Ballot is not a specific remedy against spiritual intimidation, but if you adopt the Ballot you will not take away any of the existing powers of the law. We are told that the effect of the adoption of the Ballot will be the return of a great number of Nationalists to this House. I have some doubt upon that subject; but I do not know that even that would be as great a misfortune as allowing things to go in their present state. I cannot conceive anything that could have a worse effect on the minds of the people than their seeing that scenes of violence at every election can occur almost with impunity. The people see a large force—magistrates, constabulary, and troops—assembled for the purpose of preserving order. The people think—though I believe entirely without reason—that this force is employed in the service of one side. Of course it happens that one side needs more protection than another, and the minds of the people naturally become filled with the idea that all this force is intended for the assistance and benefit of one side. For that, among other reasons, I believe if we had the Ballot it would be much easier to put down riots. There would then be no longer any excuse that the employment of violence was necessary. At present it is said that violence is employed to meet violence on the other side. I do not know why the adoption of the Ballot would be followed by the return of a large number of Nationalists. It is not proved to my satisfaction that a majority of the Irish constituencies profess Nationalist opinions. I believe that the individual opinions of the Irish voters have very little to do with an election—that the voter votes as his landlord or his priest tells him to vote, or because he is intimidated by some violent or overbearing section of the people. But a large proportion of the Irish constituency is composed of small farmers, or small traders and small shopkeepers in country towns, and it appears to me that there is no class on the face of the earth one would naturally expect to be more Conservative than a class of that description. It is admitted on both sides of the House that some good was done last year in giving to that class some security in their tenure. They are now very much the same class as that class of small proprietors in France who have always constituted a thoroughly Conservative body in that country, and I do not know why you are to suppose that the feelings of the small proprietors or small leaseholders who regard themselves as proprietors in Ireland, are different from the feelings of small proprietors in other countries. At any rate, nothing has occurred to show that the feelings of the majority of the Irish constituencies are Nationalist. We know very well what sort of proceedings have occurred in the Tipperary and Meath elections. We know that intimidation by certain supporters of the Nationalist party was carried to a great extent, and that voters who would have ventured to oppose what they chose to call the popular vote would have done so at very great risk to themselves. If the adoption of the Ballot should lead to the return of 60, 70, or 80 Nationalists, then I can only say, although I may deplore it, by all means let them come. If they come, they will find how strong, how unalterable, is the determination of the people of this country to maintain the integrity of the Empire. They will find that our determination is just as strong as was that of the people of that country to which we are told their eyes are always turned—the United States of America—that their Union should not be discovered. At the same time they will find, if their minds are not wilfully prejudiced, that the people of this country are willing to do Ireland justice, if not more than justice. I do not believe that even Nationalists will permanently resist an influence of that description. I do not believe that the majority of the Irish constituencies desire separation from this country. I must, however, admit that in such a case the difficulty of governing Ireland will be considerably increased, but it will not be so great as many hon. Members appear to anticipate. Should, however, that state of things arise, we must meet it as best we can. There was neither sense, advantage, nor prudence in crying peace when there was no peace; and it would be much better to give free representation to the people of Ireland than leave it in the hands of the landlords and Roman Catholic Bishops.

The Marquess of Hartington

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: I confess that I cannot accept with that great equanimity which the noble Lord who has just sat down (the Marquess of Hartington) appears to manifest at the prospect of 60 or 70 Nationalists from Ireland in this House merely that we may show them what is the united feeling of the English and Scottish nation as to the maintenance of the Empire. In the first place, the united feeling of the Irish Nationalists, met by the counter united feeling of Englishmen and Scotchmen, would be something very like civil war; and, in the second place, knowing, as I do, what the composition of the Treasury Bench is—knowing the mysterious way in which it works out its conclusions, knowing with what alacrity and even fierceness its Members can advocate, when that advocacy involves giving a rap to their own terrible left wing, opinions which they had themselves opposed, with every appearance of conviction, only a year or two before—I believe that the presence of 60 or 70 Nationalists from Ireland would lead the present men in office to take a very different view of the question from that which they at present profess. I dismiss, however, that part of the question, for I wish to take up the subject from the point of view of a former English borough Member, and not as the representative of a University. I have sat for boroughs; I have won my election and I have lost my election in boroughs; and I propose, therefore, to consider this question from a borough Member's point of view. The first charge which I bring against this Bill—and it is a very grave one—is the way in which it is made to combine two distinct issues, and to take the second step before the first is made good. The Bill might have been a measure solely intended to enact the Ballot. Well and good. I should have respected such a Bill, though I could not have agreed with it. A Bill for improving the procedure of open elections I could have cordially welcomed. But I protest against a Bill which embodies provisions, good as far as they go, for making our elections more quiet and orderly and peaceable—provisions which contain matter enough for our discussion during the remaining Session—being overweighted, crushed, and stifled by other provisions dealing with the empirical theory or crotchet of secret voting. This is not a statesmanlike proceeding—it is not conducive to a good solution of the question of election reform. What is the reason for this policy? Where is the great cry for the Ballot throughout the country? Where have there been meetings which demand any recognition? Where is the crowd of Petitions? You cannot point your hand to any such demonstrations; and, by general admission, the last General Election was more pure than any that ever went before it. The only notable difference is that Mr. Mill, who was a great supporter of the Ballot, has become its decided opponent. With the exception of that difference we all stand on one old ground; but the truth is, that the party opposite have been sorely tried for want of a cry. There is the Army Bill, to be sure; but then it could not serve for the whole of a Session. You have pulled down one Church; but you did not yet feel yourself strong enough to attempt to pull down another. You have revolutionized the tenure of land in one country; but you did not care to venture to repeat the experiment in another. There was an ugly gap which must be filled up somehow; and so it was determined to toss in the Ballot. I have listened to appeals to the Ballot Blue Book of 1869, and much has been made of the seeming concurrence of witnesses before that Committee in favour of the change. But if we investigate that evidence calmly and dispassionately, we shall observe one remarkable characteristic running through all the witnesses. Some were Liberal, some were Conservative; but everyone of them bears testimony to a great amount of malpractices at elections—to a great deal of bribery and treating. But, invariably, everyone of them is found to maintain that these practices exist in the party to which he is himself opposed; while, upon the side of which he is the agent and the advocate, all was straightforward and virtuous. The fact is that there is a great deal in the electoral system of the country which wants to be mended—that is what every witness has said. No doubt many said also we want the Ballot. But what they intended to say was this—something is wrong; we want a remedy; we have heard of the Ballot, and we wish to try it. The plain English of such evidence is—we are very ill; we are sick; the doctors have done us little good; let us try Holloway's pills. The Holloway's pill-box of the present Ministry is the Ballot-box. Why is it that on this side of the House every speaker has as yet protested against the innovation, with the solitary exception of my hon. Friend the Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. B. Cochrane), who alleges, as the reason for his vote, that we ought to give the working man the Ballot in order to show we have confidence in him; as if the old constituencies, to whom we never thought of administering it, were not equally entitled to that confidence? Why is it that with this single difference we, who still cherish opinions which were held by all public men with just enough exception to make the real unanimity conspicuous only a few years ago, and who object to the Bill as dangerous to the commonwealth, because prejudicial to personal honour, truth, and morality, find ourselves shut out by the ingenious legerdemain of a party duel? We have now had the confession that it will be passed by those who, in passing it, believe that it will be in a great degree inoperative. ["No, no!"] I say, yes; the noble Marquess says that in a few years we shall get into such a halcyon state that no man will dare to hide his opinions, and so we shall have open voting just as before. I noted his words at the time, and I now assert that they prove that the overt object of this Bill is factitious and unreal. But I thought it was an admitted axiom in politics—that to legislate merely in order to meet a cry and not to supply a real need was immoral and dishonest, and an action calculated to bring legislation into contempt. We have been engaged, during a part of this Session, in erasing out of the Statute Book an Act which, in the opinion of most of us, was the most impolitic and unstatesmanlike that ever was passed—the Ecclesiastical Titles Act. We are about to repeal that Act; and I trust it will soon be numbered with the other obsolete statutes which have successively disappeared. Take care that in passing the Ballot Bill you do not commit a still more gigantic mistake, and one still more calculated to bring the law itself into contempt by open, notorious and audacious instances of its violation. We all listened, I am sure, with the greatest sympathy and pleasure to the address of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Mr. James). But that address was tainted—like all the addresses in favour of the Ballot are tainted—by a belief in abstract theory, coupled with ignorance of, and contempt for, the delicate and manifold springs of human nature. To assume that the Ballot must necessarily mean secret voting, you must assume that men not of high education, not living in the eye of their neighbours, not accessible to those influences of public opinion which control men in a higher station in life, are to manifest a self-command which would be well nigh impossible for any of us to exercise. Those whose means of subsistence are precarious, whose position in life is humble, whose training is defective, can—if one believes you—be encouraged to avail themselves of their new political franchises, can be encouraged to attend political meetings, to cheer or to hoot as the case may be, to hold up their hands or to hold them down as the case may be, to accompany one party or another as the case may be; for you do not abolish canvassing by this Bill, as you cannot abolish canvassing by any Bill you may frame—and then each unit of this impulsive mass is to troop along with his fellow-citizens up to the very point of recording his political opinions; till finally, at the last moment, by the legerdemain of going into a sentry box and making a few scratches on a Ballot paper, that shouting, lie-convinced, gesticulating man suddenly becomes a proud, self-reliant, self-respecting, silent citizen. The thing is ridiculously absurd—it is an insult to common sense. One of two things he must do. To be sure, a picked man may hold his tongue; but that is what such a man will not do. The mass of men are not gifted with silence. He must either speak the truth or tell a lie. If he speak the truth, what have you gained by your Bill? If he tell a lie, then your Ballot Bill is only an expedient to demoralize the people. It is true he may fence with questions that are put to him. But to put a man on the wrong scent is not a very elevating process; it has a taint of immorality about it, at the least. But even to fence with a question requires a certain amount of education; it argues an acquaintance with the science of words which the ordinary voter does not possess—for be it remembered that I am dealing with the question of the poor voter, for a voter in the higher classes the Ballot is of no value whatever. It is a poor man's question; it is a social question; it is a super-Wednesday question—it belongs to a class of questions that we agree to deal with, as not possessing a political but a social value, in the middle of the week; and though I have a great respect for such discussions, I believe that we—especially at this period of the Session—have many more important topics to discuss. But dealing with this as a poor man's question, and stripping it of all that grand phraseology which has no reference to humanity and to the rights of flesh and blood, the question comes to be—how is it possible to secure secrecy? By one way—and one way only—I reply. Make the profession of a Member of Parliament less honourable and respected; degrade the character of this House; put the representation in the hands of trading politicians and scheming lawyers; let them, as in America, be members of the ring, which makes the candidates out of its conspiracy; let no one but professed politicians sit for any constituency, and then you may work your plan. But so long as a seat in this House is regarded as a title of honour, not in this country merely, but throughout the civilized world, so long will it be an object of intense anxiety to secure the dignity, and so long will every machinery be put in motion by the man who wants to get in, and who would condescend even to the mean ingenuity of agents, whom he is compelled to employ, even while in his heart he despised them. Do you believe it would be impossible for such an unscrupulous agent to extract from a poor and uneducated voter, however averse he might be, from a little known voter, perhaps a boosey voter, the way in which he gave his vote. When I have sketched the voters' class character, you will confess that there are tens of thousands of such in the kingdom for whom this Bill is meant to work. He is not a better man than his neighbours, far from it; but he is not much worse. He is employed at a mill; his employer is an active member of the Liberal party, who keeps up his list of voters pretty sharp. But he must sleep at night. He sleeps at a cottage, which has been run up by the roadside by a bustling builder on the Conservative side. He solaces himself with beer at the "Three Jolly Pigeons," where the landlord is on the Whig side. But he cannot live on beer only, so he runs up a score at the grocer's for tea and sugar. The grocer is a teetotaller, and having strong notions on the licensing system, is anxious to return a Member of his own views. But our labourer also possesses a wife, and she does a bit of charring at the house of the squire, who is a bluff old Tory, while the squire's wife is a good-natured lady, much given to blanket distributing at Christmas. Then comes a General Election, and our typical citizen is canvassed by his employer and canvassed by his landlord, he is beset by the landlord of the public-house, and pressed by the grocer, while the squire and the squire's lady remind him of his obligations. Yet you have the effrontery to tell such a man to give his vote in secrecy, and that he may step out of the polling compartment erect and noble, the master of himself and the keeper of his own secret for all time to come. Have you considered what a purgatory it must be for such a man to keep a secret? The only person in history to whom he will bear any resemblance is Samson, when the Philistines tried to worm his secret out of his Dalilah, only that our imaginary voter will be no Samson, but only a weak-kneed and rather stupid working man. You will only convert him into a mean sneak, if not into a liar. He may, under our present system, have voted openly, and yet voted from one motive or from another, all of them mean and ignoble; but at least the poor fellow will have done one good thing in his life—he will have voted openly, and the truth of the vote will stand on the record. But if he votes in secret and then persistently lies about it, he will have made himself a worse man than if he had been brought dead-drunk to the poll; that would be evil, but the evil would be patent, and have its limit; the life-long falsehood has no limit to its mischievous influence. This imaginary voter is no Phoenix, he exists and is to be found at the corner of every street of every borough. Is it, then, a light thing if you demoralize tens of thousands of such men for the sake of carrying out a philosophical crotchet? I sympathise with those who hold by the Ballot as a remedy in the face of all the evils and abominations which I cannot reprobate too strongly—that exist in our boroughs at popular elections. But I hold that it is bad policy, and displays an ignorance of human nature, to try to extirpate a proved evil by the forced enactment of the extreme opposite. I will give you an instance of what I mean. In the Middle Ages the extent of clerical immorality excited the indignation of many able, strong, and stern-minded men, and so those men attempted to meet this evil of immorality by forcing general celibacy upon the clergy. Now, I hold that to force on the Ballot in order to cure political corruption is a mistake of the same kind as the enforcement of celibacy, immorality; or, if the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) will pardon me, I would say that it is a mistake of the same kind as forcing total abstinence upon a man in order to cure him of drunkenness. It is at all times bad policy to meet one extreme by another. There was, indeed, one gentleman who appeared upon the Committee—I must give his name, for he deserves not to be forgotten who defends the system of promising a vote to one man and giving it to another. That gentleman is Mr. Darwell, the Town Clerk of Windsor. The voter, according to him, would after all only be acting like Galileo, when he averred, contrary to his convictions, that the earth did not go round the sun. Well, I make the gentleman a present of Galileo, though I think that it is more likely we shall find more Gallios than Galileos among our constituencies.

Mr. Beresford Hope

Reference has repeatedly been made to the electoral system of Australia. In fact, the Australian argument lies at the root of all that has been urged in favour of this change; and the appeal to Australia was repeatedly made by the noble Marquess opposite. Now, let me point out that the Ballot has been in existence in Australia for the enormous period of 13 years; and it has worked for that long series of 13 years without coming to a dead-lock. But yet that discovery, to my mind, contains no element of an argument on the possibility of the Ballot succeeding here. In England, society is altogether different from that of Australia. England is an old settled country; Australia is new; in England the various classes are divided, vertically so to speak as well as horizontally, by lines numerous, minute, and of old standing; in Australia there is only one class of persons who are all tolerably secure from want, and who are not possessed of much cultivation, except at Melbourne, and at Melbourne, accordingly, the evils of the Ballot are beginning to be felt. The questions that divide us here have no existence in Australia. Look, for instance, at the despatch of Sir James Fergusson, who showed how thoroughly democratic the whole composition of society was in the colony of South Australia. Take the case of that colony. What is the fact in South Australia? Why, throughout the whole colony there were only 28,000 votes—not more than might be found in one of our manufacturing borough towns in England. The questions they had to deal with were few; they had no foreign questions, no treaties to discuss, no high politics to approach—nothing of that class of business which inures us to the discussion of great questions. In fact, if I may say it without disrespect to the Australian Legislatures, they are hardly more than large Town Councils, elected for a district which spreads over a large extent of country. That, Sir, is the model which is now held up for an old Imperial State like this, with all its varied and complicated interests, national and international, to follow. One of the witnesses examined before the Ballot Committee is a gentleman whose opinion we shall probably hear to-night—the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. R. Torrens)—who, while he was in South Australia, was several times a Cabinet Minister, and who told the Committee that in that magnificent nation of 28,000, the only question that divided them was between the “ins” and the “outs.” The hon. Gentleman further stated that the average existence of a Government there was about seven months. No doubt the Prime Minister will take the opportunity of informing the House whether that among others is one of the practical advantages of the Ballot which he looks forward to obtaining by the present Bill. This evidence of the hon. Member was backed up by that of another official witness, who said that there were no party politics there, and that in consequence there was no parity between England, which was an old country, and a new colony like Australia. One statesman of considerable eminence, and who had been a Minister for the large and important colony of Victoria, gave important evidence, a portion of which I shall read. Mr. Verdon said, in reply to the question—

Mr. Beresford Hope

“You stated, did you not, that the Ballot had put down bribery very much?—Yes; but let me rather say that it has prevented it; it has literally come before it. There never has been any great amount of bribery in Victoria, nor will there be in any new country, especially when the franchise is very extended. It is too large a matter, even if candidates were to be found willing and able to bribe; it would be such a very costly business to bribe a sufficient number to turn the scale that it would be hopeless, even if persons were so disposed. Although men there value the honour of being elected Members of the Legislature, it is not so great an honour as to justify them in expending a very large sum of money.”

The fact is, that in a new country without any great varieties of social condition, one expedient is as good as another for voting. But as Sir James Fergusson wisely says, in his despatch, the strain has not come yet. In the course of 13 years, with 28,000 voters, with no great international questions to disturb their serenity, stress cannot be felt for some time. Again, Governor Du Cane says, in his despatch, that in Tasmania there is great apathy, and no desire on the part of persons whom we should call the leaders of society, to enter into politics. If the same feverish desire to obtain a seat in this House which now exists continues under the Ballot, and if candidates continue to be as reckless and unscrupulous as they now show themselves, they will bribe by results, and in order to secure the voters who will give those results, they will marshal and bring them up in squadrons; the wire-pullers will have a good time of it, and all the other baser classes of electioneering, of whom we hear so much across the Atlantic, will then be all powerful in manipulating the contest. You will find your model not in Australia but in America; and if I had no other reason than the evidence of all which is done systematically in the United States of America, it would be a sufficient reason for me to oppose this Bill. On this head, the evidence of Mr. Hankel, of South Carolina, is much to the point. He was asked—

“Did personation take place to any extent?—Any quantity, to an unlimited extent. Was the system of what is called in this country bottling voters known there?—Very frequently, if it was an excited election at all. Was there any corruption? Unbounded, I should say. Of what kind?—Treating and bribery in money payments, or in any form in which you may conceive bribery to be carried on. Do you know of a fact that persons often voted over and over again at the same election?—I think there is not the slightest doubt of it. The term ‘early and often’ is quite a common term at all elections—north, south, east, and west.”

You see what is the system of the Ballot in America. You may tell me that the Ballot in America is not the Ballot in Australia. I grant that, and I will tell you the reason why. The Ballot in Australia is the Ballot in a young and thinly-peopled country, which has never had an opportunity of losing its character for purity, where strong party questions have not grown up, and where the absence, arising from its natural wealth and its sparseness of inhabitants, neither the very rich man nor the very poor man makes his presence felt. America is a comparatively old country, where the suffrage has existed for generations, till under it men have grown up with as strong party feelings as here, or rather with stronger and fiercer, while the artificial distinctions growing out of the unequal distribution of property exist in almost exaggerated prominence. It would be Quixotic to expect that there will never be the same characteristics in Australia; certainly the mere fact that in 13 years such a result has not been reached is not the slightest guarantee that it will not prevail, and even sooner than any of us here have reason to expect. In a word, the state of things in Australia is the strongest conceivable reason for not now forcing the Ballot upon the mother country. It has not yet had an adequate trial; it has had no trial at all worthy of the respect of an ancient and settled country like ours. If you really wish to study the working of the Ballot in Australia, and not to use it as a debater's argument in support of a foregone conclusion, that would be a reason for postponing this Bill till a day when you can appreciate a little more accurately than you can do at present its working in this distant colony. In the meantime there is much work to our hand in which we may profitably engage. There is the abolition of public nominations—that is a reform in which I entirely concur. There are means to be devised for taking the poll without the Ballot as quietly, orderly, and regularly as any form of the Ballot would secure. In the University of Cambridge there is absolutely no nomination at all, and the voting is done by cards, on which the voter writes his name and his vote, and then hands them up to the returning officer, who reads them and then puts them into a bag. This system of no nomination cannot, of course, be applicable to ordinary elections; but it is at least a hint as to the mode of making them private and not public. Then there is the multiplication of polling places. There are, in fact, an infinity of improvements that might be carried out as a first experiment. Why, then, this hot haste for the Ballot, when there is no visible chance of an election this year, and no reason for one during the subsequent year? Why press on this peculiar crotchet of a small sect of philosophers?—why force on a question for which there is no demand in the country, merely to crowd up an already over-crowded Session? Give the electors more polling places—give them more quiet and orderly nominations—you will probably have single elections enough in the meantime to test the operation of these improvements. We are told by some of the advocates that the Ballot will make no great difference; that the same parties will come in as before. I neither affirm nor contradict the statement. Then why force on the question?—why not give the next General Election the opportunity of being an open but a quiet and orderly election, and let us see the results? The world is not coming to an end so very soon. Let us go on improving our elections without the Ballot, and if all other means fail, you will then have some colourable reason for offering to the country this nostrum, which, however, I believe to be in its essence so wrong, so degrading, and so demoralizing, that I shall never cease to denounce its introduction, if not to deplore its adoption.

MR. M'CLURE said, he hoped the House would allow him for a few minutes to remark on the probable effect of the leading propositions in that Bill, upon that district with which he was best acquainted—the province of Ulster. He was glad that it was proposed to abolish public nomination. At the nomination for the last election for Belfast, the tumult was so great that the mayor adjourned the proceedings until the day following, so that those who took pleasure in a row had two days' enjoyment of tumult and confusion. As to the question of vote by Ballot, he would certainly prefer, if every voter were in an independent position, that he should give his vote openly and above-board; but when they had reason to believe that many dare not vote according to their conscientious convictions, without the fear of losing or diminishing the means of support for themselves and their families, the question arose—should they leave them in that most difficult and trying position? Now, what was the fact in the counties of Ulster? Was it that any person aspiring to represent the county gave consideration, or attached almost any weight as to what might be the feelings and opinions of the great mass of those electors to whom the law had confined the trust of electing hon. Members to serve in that House? No; it was notorious that the views of the great bulk of the electors were scarcely taken into account; a few large landowners were consulted, and, if they gave their adhesion, the candidate felt quite confident of success. Sometimes the virtual nomination of the county was in the hands of two or three large landowners; frequently some of those who exercise hereditary legislative power in “another place;” but in almost every case a very small room would contain all the real electors for an Irish northern county. If these electoral potentates agreed, the matter was generally considered to be settled, and there was no contest; but if they did not agree, or their decision was called in question, then the too usual course was for the landlord to intimate his will to the agent, and the agent directed the bailiff to give orders to the tenants for whom they should vote. But they were told all that coercion was now at an end, as the Land Act had given the tenants protection from eviction without compensation; but a tenant who was out of favour at the rent office might suffer in many ways short of eviction. Allowances and accommodation given to other tenants might be withheld from him. He might be the best farmer in the neighbourhood, but he would get no encouragement, if he set an example of political independence. The tenant-farmers were placed upon the county registry without any act of their own. If rated, they were put on the roll as electors; they had no option. In point of fact, they were a great jury empanelled by the laws of their country. Most of them, under present circumstances, would be glad to be excused from giving any vote; but when there was a contest, they were not permitted to escape. To most men it could not be without some feeling of humiliation that they should receive, through the bailiff, an order how they should vote; but when compliance with the command was known to their families and neighbours to involve the violation of their most cherished convictions, and, as in the case he had mentioned, their promises, it became a painful degradation to inflict upon sensitive and intelligent men. It was bad policy to break down the spirit of manly independence and moral responsibility which they should desire to see animating that great and important class who cultivated the land. He believed that the removal of the present arbitrary control, which was not consistent with the spirit of their free Constitution, would prove beneficial to the character and proper social feeling of both landlord and tenant. The man of property and station would be led to respect the views and sentiments of his more humble neighbours, and the interchange of opinion on public questions would be likely to soften down asperities and bring about a better understanding and more spontaneous co-operation. It was painfully evident to those who observed the growing jealousy and alienation of classes, that there was danger of the line of demarcation becoming broader and more marked. This was a matter deserving the attention of statesmen, as the safety and welfare of the Commonwealth required that there should be common sympathies and recognition between different classes of their mutual dependence on each other. There were hon. Members who sat for Ulster counties who were held in respect and esteem in their own neighbourhoods, and who, if they would trust themselves fairly to the popular voice, might be returned to that House, not by the nomination of a few landowners, but by the free votes of thousands of electors; and, if so, would occupy a more dignified position, and their course in that House would be entitled to carry greater moral weight, as they would be really the representatives of the people. In fact, that measure, if carried into law, might prove in Ulster an Emancipation Act not only to tenant-farmers from the political serfdom they are under, but also to the county representatives from the thralldom in which they were held by their nominees, who, from class associations and other causes, perhaps, took rather too narrow a view of general policy in public matters. He would be sorry to detract from that legitimate influence which a considerate and improving landowner should fairly exercise in his own county and neighbourhood; but he would be unworthy of the place he held, being returned by the free and uncontrolled votes of the electors of the capital of Ulster, if he did not protest against and denounce in the strongest manner possible the system of coercion in election matters too often practised on the tenants in the North of Ireland. He trusted that the result of that measure would be to give the hardy and industrious sons of Ulster the proud feeling that they were really free citizens of that great Empire, entitled to exercise an influence on its councils through their Representatives, and that all, in every part of the kingdom upon whom the Legislature conferred the franchise, would be protected in the conscientious discharge of the duty thus conferred upon them. Believing that the proposed measure was fitted to effect that object, he was prepared to give it his hearty support.

MR. LIDDELL said, that after the many very able and exhaustive speeches which had been delivered on the subject, he was afraid that he could offer only a very few common-place remarks to the attention of hon. Members. The measure before the House came recommended by high sanction. It had been recommended by a Committee largely composed of Gentlemen formerly opposed to the Ballot, but who had become converts to the system in consequence, he supposed, of what they had heard in that Committee. The House had just listened to a very able speech of the noble Lord who was Chairman of that Committee (the Marquess of Hartington), and he (Mr. Liddell) went thus far with him—that if he thought the effect of adopting secret voting would be the extinction of that party whose principles and history he had sketched, it would be an additional inducement, if he wanted such, to make him oppose this measure. But the noble Lord seemed also to base his advocacy of the Bill on its special applicability to Ireland. Now, they had already had a great deal of special legislation for Ireland—rather too much; but it was because he thought the measure was specially inapplicable to England that he would offer it his most strenuous opposition. The Bill was not only recommended by the Committee, it had received, they were told, the unanimous support of the Liberal party. He wished to call attention to the fact that the advanced Liberals had always recommended this measure. In addressing a deputation lately, the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Committee of Privy Council told them he was glad they liked his Bill, “because it was always a matter of pain to him when he found himself differing from the thoughtful men of the age.” Well, it was precisely because this Bill was advocated by the advanced Liberals that he was induced to ask that House to think seriously before they adopted it. With great respect to the advanced Liberals, his complaint was that they did not think enough, and were too apt in their enthusiasm for change to forget consequences, and keep results out of view. That House was in a favourable position to judge of the results of secret voting. They had the example of America before them, and it was a peculiar circumstance that the Committee forbore taking much evidence from America, although that was the birthplace of the Ballot. There was only one witness from America who had had a great deal of experience in that country and also in England, and he said that he preferred the English system. Why? Because it was carried on openly, secured greater purity of election, and afforded greater facilities for detecting political abuses. The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham), on Thursday night, finding that his case, resting on American experience, was very weak, found a great deal of fault with a distinguished man in this country—Mr. John Stuart Mill—unfortunately because he was dead against the Ballot; and said that with regard to any arguments against it drawn from the operation of the Ballot in America, he would make a present of them to the Opposition. Now, what was the great argument raised upon the operation of the Ballot in America? The impracticability, if not the impossibility of imposing on a free country a compulsory secret Ballot. What was the fact? It was optional with every citizen to vote either secretly or openly for whomsoever he pleased, and he preferred to vote openly. What was the case in Massachusetts? The law of that State had twice declared that voting should be secret, and twice had the people rebelled against that law, and open voting was now the practice, although the law enacting that it should be secret still remained on the Statute Book. There was but one spot on the habitable globe where the Ballot was said to be attended with success, and that was Australia. In Victoria it had been distinctly shown that the abuses which the Ballot was intended to correct had never existed, and he therefore declined to accept the case of Victoria; moreover it was not secret voting in Victoria, for every vote was ticketed to correspond with the voter's number on the register. South Australia was the only place where the Ballot was secret. The evidence showed what was the effect of secret voting on the election of Members, and also the class of persons it was likely to produce as representatives, and it was the composition of the Chamber that was really the important matter. He would ask the attention of that House to the evidence of a warm advocate of the Ballot, the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. R. Torrens), who was asked if the political opinions of those elected remained much the same, or had been altered in accordance with the change in public opinion. He replied that their political opinions had been altered—that a man could not be consistent under such a system as he had described—that if his opinions ran counter to public opinion he would lose all his power, he would be turned out of office, and would be unable to obtain a seat in the Legislature. He supposed the hon. Member would say that that description of the operation of the Ballot in South Australia must be taken in connection with universal suffrage. [Mr. R. TORRENS: Hear, hear!] Although they had not got universal suffrage, they had a very extended suffrage, and he would be a bold man who could say that an attempt would not be made to make it universal. There were three great results obtained by a widely extended suffrage in connection with the Ballot in South Australia. One was the extinction of party; the next was the instability of public opinion, which showed itself by seven months' Ministries—that being about the average duration of a Government in South Australia; and the third was the political immorality of the representatives, who might be described simply as political adventurers. Now, he did not wish to see such men finding their way into that House. It had been argued that the Ballot was a necessity. But it had not been shown in what that necessity consisted. One of the great arguments in favour of a large and extended suffrage was that there was safety in numbers. It was said that there had been great corruption and vice amongst the small constituencies under the Reform Bill, and that if they were swept away, they would be free from bribery and corruption. But now it was stated that the Ballot was a necessary corollary. Then it was stated that there had been a vast amount of intimidation, and that assertion was backed by the authority of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board. Now, what did the Judges say on that point? Mr. Justice Blackburn, speaking not only his own opinion, but the opinions of two other of his learned brethren on the Bench, said, that although intimidation was alleged in every one of the nine Petitions which had come before them, there was only one case in which it had been made out. Now, where was it that intimidation was said to exist so largely, and to have been exercised so detrimentally? How was it that the Liberal party at the last election obtained a majority of more than 100 in that House if that intimidation had been exercised so detrimentally to their party? There was some remarkable evidence from Wales on that point. An Independent minister from Merionethshire stated that there were two great landed estates in that county where coercion had been practised at two elections to such an extent that the Tory candidate in each case was returned; but when it came to the last election there had sprung up under the Reform Bill a new class of voters—working “quarrymen”—who had acquired the vote in respect of their houses, and who had offered such a bold front to the enemy that they frightened the Tory candidate out of the field. If those independent quarrymen were honest without the Ballot, and could frighten the Tory candidate out of the field, what became of the argument that the Ballot was absolutely necessary for the protection of the working men? He believed that they were quite able to take care of themselves, and he should therefore be no party to any special legislation on their behalf. The hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. B. Cochrane) stated the other night that he had such confidence in the working men that he would gladly trust them with the Ballot. Well, he (Mr. Liddell) also had confidence in the working men—he had confidence in their independence, in their hardihood, and in their straightforwardness; but he thought it was an odd way of proving one's confidence to pass a special Act of Parliament in order to protect them when they went to the poll. One witness stated before the Committee that if the Ballot were adopted in Wales it would put an end to all contests there. But what did that mean? It simply meant the extinction of political life, and the creation of a dead level of thought and opinion out of which no one would care to rise. What had been the result in other countries of a wide suffrage and vote by Ballot? The result had been to withdraw from public life those men who were most capable of doing great and good public service. That was a state of things which he should very much deprecate. His great objection to this measure—and he was not ashamed to avow it—was, that it was destructive of all influence, and that was designedly its purpose. Now such a destruction of influence was a thing to be deplored, because there were all sorts of influence—both good and bad influence. [“Hear, hear!”] Perhaps that cheer meant that with the Ballot the good influence would not cease to have its effect; but it should be remembered that men themselves were of two classes—good and bad—and if a voter were withdrawn from all influence of public opinion the result was to encourage the bad motive that lay at the bottom of all political corruption. It was not to be imagined that by throwing the cloak of secrecy over the vote that men’s minds would be purged of corrupt motives. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board said the other night that though, when the suffrage was restricted, this measure was a Radical one, yet now that the suffrage was widened, it was a Conservative measure. But the suffrage was still restricted, and until it reached the point of universal suffrage, the Ballot never would be Conservative, whatever it might be then. He would not argue the question as a party question, however, for he thought that one of the pleasantest features of this debate had been that the subject was discussed on higher grounds than those of mere party. He objected to the Bill because it was a democratic measure in the true sense of the phrase, involving, as the term did, the government of the country by those who were least competent to govern. He thought it was of the greatest value and importance that the lower class of voters should be left to the influence of the example, the education, and the intelligence of those above them. He knew it was said that all that would remain as it was before, but what he maintained was, that where there was a corrupt motive in a voter’s mind, that motive would be encouraged and increased by enabling the man to record his vote in secret. Nobody yet had ever attempted to explain why it was that the only man to be withdrawn from the wholesome influence of public opinion was the public voter in the discharge of his political functions. But the Committee had ably summed up all the objections to the Ballot, including the statement that the vote was a public duty, and should involve public responsibility; that the adoption of the Ballot would lead to hypocrisy and dissimulation; that it would do little to restrain treating; that it would increase bribery by rendering its detection difficult; that it would be wholly inoperative against spiritual intimidation; and that it would facilitate personation. He did not wish, indeed he was unable to add anything to that sweeping bill of indictment against the Ballot, but he could scarcely understand how the Committee could come to the feeble conclusion, that on the whole they thought the Ballot possessed many great advantages. These, then, were the reasons which induced him to oppose this measure, and he trusted that they would weigh with many of those hon. Gentlemen whose minds might yet be wavering on the question. If that measure became law, he believed it would aggravate the evils in the electoral system. No doubt it would cure some, such as intimidation at the poll, and riot, but those were not all the evils of the system, and the Ballot, he believed, would be attended by much greater evils than it professed to cure. History showed that the Ballot had been accompanied by all sorts of corrupt and shameful practices from the time of Pliny downwards, and if unhappily such should be the result of the adoption of secret voting, he would say to the Prime Minister, in the words of that eminent and accomplished writer—

Mr. Liddell

“Quo te violas que remedia conjuras ubique vitia remediis fortiora.”

MR. PLATT said, that from his own experience in a large and populous borough, he believed there were other persons besides landowners and manufacturers who brought influence and intimidation to bear upon voters. At contested elections in his own borough, for many years the small shopkeepers and tradesman, for fear of violence, had had to place in the windows of their houses the names of the candidates for whom they intended to vote, and sometimes pickets were actually stationed near a tradesman’s shop to stop customers and try to induce them not to deal with them. This was what was done by those turbulent and unscrupulous men who formed a minority of the operatives in large and populous boroughs, and who were at the bottom of all strikes. The great body of the operatives were often forced into strikes by these men in opposition to their own inclinations, and to what they believed to be their own interests. Only the other day a strike occurred in the borough he represented, and it was universally admitted by every manufacturer in the borough, that if a Ballot could have been taken among the workmen, there would have been no strike at all, but the operatives would at once have accepted the arbitration which was offered by the masters. The conclusion, therefore, that he drew from the proposed adoption of the Ballot was quite opposed to that drawn by the hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Liddell). He believed the Ballot would have a Conservative influence, because it would eliminate from the elections the rowdyism which now existed, and would take away the power possessed by small sections of the working classes. The Trades Union Bill, which would soon become an Act, would make trades unions legal, and the two parties which would come into competition would be their delegates and the employers of labour. If those trade societies once got into the hands of turbulent men there would be a great evil to overcome, and the Ballot would act as a protection to the more reasonable members, and help to curb the powers of those who wanted to create disturbance. At present, when a decree went forth from one of those societies, it originated with a few persons, though the great body of the members of the society felt bound to obey it, and support their executive; and it was well known that if they had the protection of the Ballot—that being the universal opinion in regard to the strikes which recently took place in the borough he represented—the mass of the artisans would prove in favour of moderation, and accept, for instance, the arbitration which in the case referred to had been offered by the employers.

MR. J. HARDY said, that when the late Mr. Berkeley brought forward his annual Motion, he used to take up his place on the front Opposition bench, whether anticipating that it would one day become a Cabinet question or not, he (Mr. J. Hardy) could not say. Then the question was disposed of at once.

and the House divided shortly after Mr. Berkeley sat down. It was truly wonderful that that question, after being despised and rejected of men, should become a Cabinet question, and that the Prime Minister should take up the crumbs and scraps of the Chartists, and make them into a sop to throw to hon. Gentlemen below the gangway, who were always hungry and thirsting for change. He (Mr. J. Hardy) had listened with great attention to the speeches which had been delivered, especially to that of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Mr. James), who was, however, obliged to admit that it would be a humiliating day for England when such a measure as the present was passed. Judging by his own experience of elections the Ballot would not put a stop to bribery, as there would always be people clever enough to manipulate the constituencies, and to give a hope to the corrupt electors that if their candidate was successful they would be rewarded. The evidence in regard to the Norwich election revealed a class of men who did not care on which side they voted, and who could not even be moved to the poll without some promise of money or drink, and such men could easily be influenced, whether the Ballot existed or not. Indeed, a cloak would only be thrown over such action by the Ballot. He believed every man should be allowed to vote according to his conscience, but that public opinion should also be permitted to exercise its legitimate influence. Why should constituencies have to bear the odium of returning a man sympathizing with Fenianism, to talk in that House treasonable sentiments such as they had recently heard from one of those benches? He was surprised that the measure should be supported—nay, adopted—by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government after opposing it throughout a long life. The Conservatives were sometimes taunted with changing their opinions; but if they changed their minds once in ten years, that was a different matter from changing them every time they changed their clothes, as was the case with hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, when he wanted to extend the franchise, had nothing but flattery for the working classes—they were then “his own flesh and blood;” but now, when he desired to pass this measure, to please his restless followers below the gangway, he had no faith in them, and was about to confess to Europe that he had no confidence in his countrymen, so apt were they to be intimidated, so steeped in bribery, so impossible to trust. This cloak of hypocrisy should be thrown over them that they might be able to perform their duties; and in order to pass such a measure, which had hitherto been treated with contempt, all legislation was brought to a standstill, the Ballot being made the keystone of legislative procedure. He begged the House to pause before they passed such a measure, for which nobody had asked, and in favour of which no Petitions had been presented to that House, nor had there of late been any public meetings held approving of its becoming an institution of the country. All allowed the Ballot would be a doubtful good, while the evils attending it were such as to make them pause before they took a fatal step which they could not retrace.

MR. R. TORRENS said, he would confine his remarks to his experience in Australia. He had the honour to be elected for the City of Adelaide under the Secret Ballot, and had repeatedly recorded his vote both in municipal and Parliamentary contests, and his experience was that the Ballot was the best remedy for most of the evils which marked the electoral system in this country. It would at once put a stop to rioting, which had arisen in Australia to a height almost equal to that of Ireland. Before the Ballot he had seen, on election days, brickbats flying about, heads broken, and men carried off on stretchers to hospitals. After the Ballot the elections passed off so quietly that no stranger passing through the street at the time would have been aware that one was going on at all. Intimidation and bribery were entirely put an end to by the Ballot, though prior to its introduction there had been a great deal of bribery. When he said that elections to the House of Assembly had cost, in some cases, considerably over £2,000, though the constituency was only between 2,000 and 3,000 strong, hon. Gentlemen would understand from their own experience that the expenses were not of the most legitimate description. Since the Ballot he believed that no contested election had cost £250. The right hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G.

Hardy) appeared to think that a man who recorded his vote under the Ballot would walk away, after doing so, with a feeling of degradation and shame. Now, he must say, that though he had repeatedly voted under the secret system no such emotions had accompanied the act; and, further, that the many high-spirited and honourable and educated gentleman whom he had known in Australia had been equally free from them. The hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Liddell) had asked several questions, which he would answer to the best of his power. The hon. Member had begun by saying that it was not extraordinary that persons should give evidence for the Ballot who had always advocated its introduction. He begged to say that he did not fall within that category. He had consistently opposed the Ballot in Australia, under the influence of the arguments of Mr. Mill, Lord Palmerston, and others. But he had been converted in favour of it against his previous convictions by his personal experience of its advantages. The hon. Gentleman had also asked what sort of persons would be returned under the Ballot, and had referred to some observations of his (Mr. R. Torrens's) upon Parliamentary institutions, which he had exclusively directed to the effects of responsible government, combined with universal suffrage; and he could assure the hon. Gentleman now, that if ever the question of universal suffrage—at all events, prior to the advent of universal education—was brought before the House, he should be one of the first to offer it all the opposition in his power. As to the working of the Ballot, perhaps the House would allow him to narrate his own experience. He was first elected Member for the City of Adelaide after a residence of 17 years in the colony in connection with its government. He was looked upon as the Leader of the Conservative party, because he had always opposed the introduction of universal suffrage and the Ballot, and had always been in favour of State aid being given to all Christian denominations. Those were the three great questions which separated the so-called Conservative and Radical parties. He was absent for more than six months prior to the election; and being looked upon as the opponent of the working classes—as a politician who wanted to withhold from them the suffrage and the Ballot, the odds were thought to be 20 to 1 against his being returned. His friends put him up as a candidate in his absence, and he arrived at Adelaide the night before the election; and he was returned at the head of the poll far above any other candidate by about 3,400 votes. He thought that that example ought a little to encourage hon. Gentlemen opposite. He confessed freely that he believed he should not have been returned if the Ballot had not been in existence. He thought that there was much more hypocrisy in open than in secret voting, and that hundreds of men supported him on the occasion in question who would have been ashamed in the face of the working classes, openly to vote for the candidate who was supposed to be opposed to them. Reference had been made to a statement of his, that there were no Whigs or Tories in Australia, and hence it was contended that the Ballot there might be a very different thing to the Ballot here. But that was not so. For the purposes of this argument it mattered not what the parties were called so long as party feeling existed, and upon such questions as the appropriation of waste lands, denominational rule or education, and State aid to religion, a highly excited public opinion had given its decision under the Ballot. With great respect for the experience and ability of Sir James Fergusson, he must therefore disagree in toto from his assertion, that the Ballot in Australia had not been put to any severe test to try its efficacy; for having himself gone out to the colony when it was yet a forest, and having taken a part in raising it from a handful of people to a large and thriving settlement, he might, perhaps, put his evidence in competition with that of a colonial Governor who, however able, had resided there only a couple of years. He could not tell what Sir James Fergusson might deem a test of the Ballot, but if he meant that questions of a character to bring popular opinions and passions into play, and to excite party collisions, were not raised in that country and decided under the Ballot, he was greatly mistaken. Though he was unable to coincide with the main arguments in the speech of the hon. and learned Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. A. Cross), he was glad to bear his testimony to the clearness and force with which the hon. and learned Member had demonstrated the utter inutility of the non-secret Ballot as practised in France and America. The truth was, that the Ballot admitted of no compromise—no middle course. It was not enough to provide measures which might possibly afford protection for the vote of the elector. It was further necessary to adopt such a measure as would afford him absolute assurance that the side on which he cast his vote could by no possibility be discovered. The proofs of personation and bribery were entirely independent of the question as to how the vote had been given, and therefore there was no necessity for tracing out the vote. It had never been argued that the Ballot would check personation although it did not afford greater facilities for the offence than the present system. The remedy for personation lay in the publicity which was given to the act of claiming the vote; and he would caution the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill against carrying the idea of secrecy in voting beyond what was absolutely necessary. Secrecy was necessary in regard to the party in whose favour the vote was being cast. To the fact that the man had voted the utmost publicity should be given, and, therefore, he had placed on the Paper an Amendment, to the effect that the voter should stand before the polling-booth with his hat off while his name and qualification were called aloud. With severe penalties for personation, proposed in the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton, he could not conceive that any man would run a risk of detection for any moderate bribe. He was glad to see the improvements which had been made in the Bill as it now came before the House; and it was because he saw in it a counterpart of the measure, with the effects of which he was so satisfied in Australia, that he should give it his cordial support.

DR. BALL*: Sir, it is not my intention to follow the course pursued by some previous speakers in this debate, who have discussed the question of secret voting from an Irish point of view. This is not because I dissent from the opinion expressed by more than one of them—that the measure is likely, in the peculiar circumstances of Ireland, to operate disadvantageously upon its representation in this House; but because I am opposed to exceptional legislation for that country—whenever it can be avoided—as tending to foster the notion that there exists some radical and unalterable difference between the circumstances and nature of the English and Irish people, necessitating different laws and institutions, and justifying the great demand for separate Parliaments, as alone capable of dealing with the essential diversity of their social condition. Moreover, if the districts in Ireland most affected by influences calculated to render the practical working of the Ballot injurious, be compared with the remainder of the United Kingdom in wealth, population, and general progress, their relative proportion will not be found such as would justify, on their account, any peculiar provisions. One only further remark in reference to Irish affairs, I desire to make—that, if the sentiments expressed to-night by the noble Lord now Chief Secretary for Ireland (the Marquess of Hartington), discountenancing the existing mischievous agitation for legislative independence, have been correctly reported to me—for I had not the good fortune to hear them—the best Irish measure that has proceeded from Her Majesty's Government was the appointment of the noble Lord to his present office. Approaching, then, the proposition to take the votes at Parliamentary and municipal elections by way of Ballot, and regarding it irrespective of local incidents and circumstances, I agree with the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Mr. James), who spoke with such ability and candour in favour of the Bill this evening, that discussion of the abstract question of secret voting is exhausted. It was exhausted long before this debate began. It is as old as Greece and Rome. You heard the opinion of Pliny cited to-night by my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford University (Mr. G. Hardy); and, to refer to another great writer and statesman of antiquity, Cicero, in one of his treatises, has presented the opposing views and arguments current in Roman society upon the subject. The practice, too, of secret voting is equally old, for, at Athens, Ballot was used in the judicial tribunals, and at Rome, in the election of magistrates and the confirmation by the people of laws. Coming to modern times—the political thinkers of France and England have contributed whatever illustration learning and philosophy can bring to the controversy. In this House for 40 years—ever since, in 1830, Mr. O'Connell proposed to insert in the East Retford Bill a clause providing that the votes of the new constituency should be taken by Ballot—there have been nearly annual debates upon the subject, the more important of them conducted with consummate ability. Accordingly, with the exception of two new subjects, and the topics connected with them, the present debate has proceeded very much upon the old illustrations and arguments. These two new subjects are—first, the Report of the Select Committee on intimidation and bribery appointed in 1869, and the evidence upon which it is based; and, secondly, the alteration in the character of the electoral body caused by the extension of the franchise under the recent Reform Act. Both are much relied upon by the advocates of the present Bill, to strengthen and maintain their position—the Report as giving the sanction of the majority of the Committee to its provisions; and the extension of the franchise, because it introduces into the constituencies a class less able to protect itself, and also because it is said to remove the reasoning which, so long as the right to vote was confined to a limited number, required publicity in its exercise with a view to supervision by the excluded portion of the community. With respect to the Report, it has already been pointed out that its recommendations are not unanimous; that except such of it as relates to the working of the Ballot in the Australian colonies, the balance of the evidence is doubtful; and in particular that with respect to the degree in which bribery and intimidation operated in the English constituencies at the last General Election, the testimony of the Judges of Election Petitions who were examined before the Committee tends to the conclusion that there has been much exaggeration. And, as to this last observation, I do not understand the hon. and learned Member for Taunton much to dissent from it, so far as it purports to sum up the result of the evidence before the Committee, but rather to meet its force by re-calling to our recollection that the most universal form of intimidation—the undue influence of the superior upon the inferior, is of too subtle a character to be always tangible and capable of cognizance by legal tribunals, and to assert that this particular form is most extensively and oppressively used at English elections. An assertion of that kind confined to England, made by one whose legal experience gives him peculiar sources of knowledge, I do not think an Irish Member the proper person to controvert; and I leave it to be dealt with by others more intimately acquainted with the facts by which it must be tested. For that reason, and not as conceding the accuracy of the statement, I pass from it to consider another subject of evidence before the Select Committee—namely, the example of our Australian colonies, which has been pressed in support of the present Bill, by the speaker who immediately preceded me (Mr. R. Torrens), himself a high authority upon the matter, from his experience as a Member of one of their Parliaments. I think it must be conceded that the testimony from Australia, given before the Committee, established that, so far in that country, secret voting has worked satisfactorily. I admit also, that the despatches from the Governors in Australia, which have been laid on the Table of the House, and to which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Stansfeld) referred, support the same conclusion. But granting this, what additional weight is cast into the scale in favour of the present Bill? Little or none. For who can contend that that new information suffices to annul previous reasoning, or is even of importance enough to modify it—one instance, brief in time, limited in extent, peculiar in local circumstances, to overturn the conclusions of an induction embracing the greatest nations of every age. Looking even merely to a comparison of Australia with the mother country, the social condition of each is so wholly different, that no precedent for the latter can be drawn from the legislation of the former. There you have society in its growth—no artificial or complicated relations to deal with; questions, not of vital interest; men rather than measures; the voters independent; owners, not tenants of the soil; and workmen not seeking, but sought, for employment. Here you have old institutions; a highly artificial state of society; a competitive struggle for the rewards of labour; the owners of land and possessors of capital few; the occupiers of land and the employed of the capitalists out of all proportion numerous. The contrast has, however, been already this evening pointed out in the acute observations of the hon. Gentleman the junior Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. B. Hope), and I pursue it no further. Sir, if the assertion had been that secret voting was in all times and places to be condemned, that under no circumstances was it justifiable in principle or expediency, the precedent of Australia would be of importance in answering or qualifying it. But I do not understand this to be the conclusion of history or philosophy. Open voting is preferable—nil in suffragiis roce melius. Such I believe to be the opinion of statesmen, both in ancient and modern times. It was not denied by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister last year, nor is it now denied by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Stansfeld). Such also I believe to be the instinctive feeling of the people, whose sentiments are expressed in the sentence of the philosopher—"Everything that is secret is at least ambiguous in character." But policy and circumstances may require the adoption of a less perfect system. No uniform inflexible rule of conduct can be laid down. In like manner, it is impossible upon a historical review of the practical operation of secret voting in different countries, and under varied social conditions, to arrive at any uniform judgment. Not referring to colonies, even though they may give promise of advancing into nations, but confining illustration to three great countries—Rome, France, the United States—in all of which Ballot was adopted, the results are not the same. At Rome its introduction was a grave political error. Gibbon and Montesquieu—and when they agree, I have little faith in the dissentient—concur in reckoning it among the causes of the decline and fall of the nation; while in France and the United States, there seems no reason to suppose that the course of affairs or the current of events would have been altered by public voting. Even in the same country the period of its history, when the experiment is tried, may have no small influence upon the result. In the early stages of national progress, when habits and manners are unformed, and custom a thing unknown, it is comparatively easy to mould and fashion modes of procedure; but how different at a later, when all is fixed and hardened and, as it were, incorporated into the very frame and body of your social life. These general conclusions, the Australian example does not disturb—it adds another, but not an important item in the aggregate of instances on which they are founded. Then, if used as being itself a guide for this country, the conditions of the experiment in each place are necessarily so dissimilar, that no certain inference can be drawn. Both before the Select Committee, and in this debate, its value has been overrated. It may, however, be said, and not unfairly said, that although in this way I may make some progress in disposing of the existence of Australia when urged to show the safety of introducing secret voting here—yet that does not meet the proof it affords, that by Ballot the evil practices attending elections such as bribery and intimidation are diminished. But, Sir, the former and not the latter is, I acknowledge, to my mind, the paramount consideration. Before entering upon details, practical benefits, or advantages, it is to be shown as a condition precedent to entertaining the proposition at all, that it is consistent with our institutions. For it is to be remembered that we are not seeking a Constitution; we are not engaged in an inquiry whether one form of government is superior to another. No, our lot has been cast under that mixed system, the dream of antiquity, realized in Great Britain alone; Monarchy with hereditary succession; a Legislative Chamber with hereditary succession; an elective Legislative Chamber; and no matter what compensating effects a measure may bring with it, if it peril the existence of that Constitution, all these advantages avail nothing to recommend it. Our primary, our immediate duty is to reject it. Sir, when I come to observe upon the recent extension of the franchise, and the present circumstances of this country, I shall offer some reflections bearing upon the tendency of secret voting to lessen the security of our institutions. But, previously, I feel called upon to notice the claims advanced on its behalf, as a remedy against prevalent evils. These have been classified by the hon. and learned Member for Taunton under the three heads of treating, bribery, and intimidation, including within the last what perhaps is more correctly termed undue influence. With respect to the two first, he seems to me not to rate highly the remedial operation of secret voting, and to rest his case in its favour, almost altogether upon its efficiency to terminate intimidation and undue influence. Now that against one species of intimidation it will afford considerable protection, I think must be admitted. It will, in my judgment, largely abate, if not altogether terminate, the use of violence and force during the time of polling to compel an elector to vote according to the popular feeling. But as has been already pointed out by my hon. and learned Colleague (Mr. Plunket), in instances where the violence is intended not to coerce, but to prevent a vote, and to hinder those whose opinions are known to be antagonist to the popular sympathies from coming to the poll, it supplies no motive or reason for its discontinuance. Such a case was the election for Drogheda, already alluded to in this debate; where clergymen and gentlemen out-voters, notoriously Conservative in opinion, notwithstanding an armed force accompanying, where assailed not in order to affect, but to obstruct their votes. I also am not prepared to deny that in large constituencies, if in such there existed the exercise of influence by the superior on the inferior or dependent, vote by Ballot would tend, and probably be effective, to its diminution and perhaps extinction. But I cannot extend that admission to small constituencies, because in such I believe the detection of the vote neither difficult nor improbable. Now, what is the exact value to be placed on these results. The first is not much demanded by actual occurrences; for instances of open force and violence are rare. It might, too, be attained by other precautions. The presence of an adequate force to keep the peace is generally found in Ireland sufficient. Besides, the fear of subsequent judicial proceedings and of punishment, particularly since the recent Corrupt Practices Act deters. Thus, since the masterly judgment of Mr. Justice Keogh in the Drogheda case, explaining the law and vacating the seat on the ground of intimidation, notwithstanding many exciting election contests subsequently in Ireland, there has been no repetition of similar violence, the people feeling that the law could not be violated with impunity. Then as to the second—protection against influence is more needed in small than in large constituencies, for when the electors are numerous it is more difficult to interfere with them, and they afford courage and aid to each other. There is also room for apprehension, lest with the Ballot there arise a demand for enlarged constituencies in order to give it the most effective operation; and can anyone doubt that such an increase of the areas and numbers of the electoral districts will be attended with consequences different, no doubt, in kind, but not less pernicious than any the Ballot is intended to prevent? The noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland (the Marquess of Hartington) who also spoke to-night in support of the Bill, is, however, more disposed than the hon. and learned Member for Taunton, to consider the prevalence of bribery such as to require a remedy, and to rely upon vote by Ballot as that remedy. The noble Lord thinks it improbable that the candidate will bribe, when the vote being concealed, he cannot feel certain of it. The answer has been given before. Public opinion deems a promise binding—hence promises will be asked, will be relied upon, and rewarded—further, in the great majority of instances will be kept. It was for bribery at a Ballot, preliminary to the election, and not at the open voting of the election, that recently a successful candidate for Bristol was unseated. Then there is such a thing as bribery for results, rewards for success, whereby it becomes the interest of the elector not merely to vote, but to canvass. The greatest experiment ever made of vote by Ballot was at Rome, where it was introduced about 600 years after its foundation, and continued for centuries. There it diminished the influence of birth and station, and ultimately increased that of wealth and corruption. Within 70 years after votes began to be taken in secret, six laws, each more stringent than the former, were obliged to be passed to stay the bribery universally prevailing. But they were passed in vain, for the system only became more and more perfectly organized, and was carried out not by dealing with individuals, but with the leaders and managers of combined bodies of electors. Look at the picture of society at Rome after all these laws, and with secret voting, as drawn by the hand of a master. I cite from a work of much learning and research, illuminated everywhere by a penetrating and inquiring spirit worthy of Montesquieu or Tacitus—The Life of Cæsar by the Emperor Napoleon—several instruments of electoral corruption had functions and titles almost recognized. Those who bought votes were called divisores; the go-betweens were interpretes; and those with whom was deposited the purchase money were sequestres. Numerous secret societies were formed for making a trade of the right of suffrage; they were divided into decades, the general head of which obeyed a supreme head, who treated with the candidates and sold the votes of the associates either for money, or on the stipulation of certain advantages for himself or his friends. These societies carried most of the elections."

This, Sir, is an example more pertinent than the experience of a colony or new country. Rome at that period resembled us in extent of territory, established renown, great inequalities of rank and fortune between different classes, and was engaged with many of the social problems and difficulties that now encompass our progress. I do not, however, mean in referring to it, to deduce that Ballot of itself creates bribery; although it is true that some increased facility is afforded by the attendant secrecy, and some fresh impulse given by the removal of that influence, be it due or undue, which excludes its presence. For there is truth in the saying of Gibbon, that bribery is an infallible sign of constitutional liberty since the elector subject to control can no more sell than he can make any other free disposition of his vote. I am content should the precedent suffice to establish the more limited proposition, that if a people be corrupt, in vain will you enact laws or decree secrecy; that beans and Ballot-boxes avail nothing to prevent bribery. If one man is willing to sell what another covets, despite alike of penalties and secret voting, the traffic will proceed. On these topics, however, I delay no longer. This of all portions of the subject, has been the most discussed in the present as well as former debates. What is new now more demands our attention. Have there since the old decisions, at which this House under the guidance successively of Earl Russell, Sir Robert Peel, and Lord Palmerston, by large majorities arrived, rejecting the Ballot, been alterations in our electoral system, rendering it necessary or expedient? Do the Reform Bill of 1867, and consequent extension of the franchise, as is alleged, in themselves warrant a review and reversal of those decisions, however correct, when made? The first result said to follow from the increased numbers admitted to the right of suffrage, is that it disposes

"The elections had for a long time been the result of a shameless traffic, where every means of success was allowable. The sale of consciences had so planted itself in public morals, that the

of an argument much relied upon by Lord Palmerston and, if I mistake not, also by Sir Robert Peel against the Ballot. The franchise is a trust; the electors stand in a fiduciary relation to the unenfranchised portion of the community; the latter have a right to know and to scrutinize how the duties connected with the trust have been discharged by the limited portion in whom the whole community vested it. But now, when much the greater proportion of the people have obtained the right to vote, the residue, in respect of whom alone this fiduciary relation arises, are so few that the obligation to them either ceases, or is reduced in extent and amount to a degree not deserving to be taken into account. It has been shown already by my hon. and learned Colleague (Mr. Plunket) that, as a fact, the enfranchised still bear but a small proportion to the unenfranchised. The number of the former has been increased, and of the latter in proportion diminished. But mere variation of number, even if it were more than has occurred, cannot destroy a relation of this kind. If there were a trust, it must continue so long as any objects, be they more or less numerous, continue. It is absurd to talk of the addition of a million or two from the whole population to the electors, being capable of terminating the responsibility of the latter, if it ever existed. To effect this, strict logical reasoning would demand the total absorption of the whole community into the electoral body, in other words, universal suffrage. But the truth is, reasoning of this kind is fallacious, and illustrates the danger of determining great questions by arguments drawn from analogies, and the incidents of what appears analogous. Nullum simile est idem. What is like is not the same. See, for a moment, where such a line of reasoning leads in respect of the subject in hand. The franchise is a trust; therefore the limited number of electors must surrender their convictions to the demands of their cestuis que trust, the masses of unenfranchised; the franchise is a privilege, therefore the elector may use it for his own personal advantage. Accurately speaking, the franchise partakes of the nature of a trust, and of the nature of a privilege; but it is not strictly one or the other; certainly not so as to engraft into its own nature all the incidents of either, or enable its existence, or the conditions of such existence, to depend upon reasoning applicable to those incidents. Probably, if for illustration, the aid of analogy be sought, power more nearly than either trust or privilege meets what is required. But from this substitution the advocates for a secret and irresponsible vote gain nothing, for in created intelligences power must be accompanied by a sense of duty in its exercise, and accountability for its right use. It is, however, neither, Sir, from illustrations nor analogies that we can decide the effect of the extension of the franchise upon this question. As with every other political subject, so here also we must presume the inquiry among realities and practical results. From this point of view, another reason given for holding this extension to necessitate secret voting is important and requires examination. It is said that as you descend in the social scale, when fixing your standard of electoral qualification, improper influences increase in force, and the voter becomes more and more in need of protection. If only a small number had been admitted, there would be greater force in this argument. But when, as has happened, the additions from this class are numerous, the very number prevents influence being exercised, and affords a defence against it if it be. But, Sir, the truth is that in discussing this topic, as well as others connected with vote by Ballot, the error of its advocates lies in exclusively fixing their attention upon external impediments to the right use of the suffrage—on the intimidation that coerces, or the bribery that corrupts it. They overlook that there are internal impediments, of even more mischievous tendency, which secret voting not only does not abate, but, by withdrawing counterbalancing influences, promotes and strengthens. Private interests, individual advantages, local and temporary passions and prejudices, obstruct or overpower the unbiased consideration of the public welfare. But so long as the vote is open, these inferior motives of action are counteracted by the effect of example, the public opinion of the educational classes, the desire of esteem, and the apprehension of censure. This is what Gibbon pointed at, when he spoke of “the aspect of a grave magistrate being a living burden to the multitude.” What Pliny, when in reference to the Ballot, he exclaimed—

“Multi famam, pauci conscientiam verentur.”

Dr. Ball

It is in the isolation of secrecy the instincts of selfishness awaken. How strikingly confirmed, if the statement of the authorities cited by the hon. and learned Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. A. Cross) be true, that but for secret voting the American States would not have repudiated their debts! To lower the franchise, it is plain, increases the application and force of these topics. The poorer the voting class, the more direct the conflict between private interest and public welfare; the less educated, the more liable to mistake the social inequalities inevitable to our condition for political grievances. The reasoning of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister from the increased number of electors to the inference that Lord Palmerston's argument, founded on the franchise being a trust, no longer prevails, leads, if Ballot be adopted, at once to universal suffrage. Not resting upon fanciful resemblances or nice distinctions, experience and statesmanlike foresight have before induced Earl Russell and Sir Robert Peel to predict that Ballot will be followed by a much enlarged electoral body. Take it as it will on these suppositions be, or even take it as it is, and reflect what questions are now impending. Land is owned by few, occupied by many; taxation is strained to the utmost—much of it to pay obligations contracted by men of other times for the objects and interests of their own day; capital dominates over and subdues labour. Those several relations, we are told by philosophers and politicians of no mean eminence, demand review and rearrangement; while the electoral power is owned by classes on whom what is complained of in these arrangements presses. Can you, in the period approaching, afford to surrender a single agency—a single influence—legitimate, of course, for what is illegitimate brings weakness, not strength—that can infuse among the people a sense of justice or a feeling of moderation? It may be said that I exaggerate the difficulties surrounding the future administration of affairs in this country. ["Hear, hear!"] Have those who cheer read the remarkable speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Stansfeld)—no mean authority on the powers, aims, and objects of the working classes, made so late as January last, at Halifax, to his constituents? Speaking, of course, with the caution of a Member of the Government, he pronounced that—

"The working people of England were only just awakening to a consciousness of their power and of the responsibilities of that power. There were men now, politicians, moving with light hearts upon the crest of that great tide, little conscious of the rate of progress at which they were moving, and of the direction in which they tended."

Allowing for the imagery, is not this very much what I have been saying—that popular power has advanced and is advancing; that as it comes to the perception of its own strength, its aims, now unsettled, will take shape, and demands as yet unasserted, come to be made? And if this be true—if, to continue the metaphor of the right hon. Gentleman, there be approaching nearer and nearer, and with a still increasing flood, that "great tide"—is it in darkness or in light that we desire to meet it, ignorant of impending dangers, ignorant who aid or fail, or with all exposed to view, able to see the sources of our peril, and use every influence that can animate the exertions requisite for our safety? Sir, it has been said by Montesquieu that whatever may be thought in reference to nations with aristocratic or limited forms of government, it is a fundamental law of democracy that voting shall be open, for some such reasons, I apprehend, as I have feebly applied to our position under an extended suffrage. Following at, however remote, a distance in the footsteps of this profound thinker, I ask the House to pronounce that so far from any existing or future increase of the electoral body furnishing a justification of the introduction of secret voting, such increase supplies additional reasons and motives, of all the most irresistible, against a system which, in the language of the historian, without preventing corruption, admits mistake, excludes responsibility, and hides shame.

MR. MAGUIRE*: Sir, the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Dr. Ball) who has just sat down, is not anxious to accept an analogy which does not suit his purpose or convenience, but endeavours, on the other hand, to establish an analogy between two states of things which have no resemblance whatever. The right hon. and learned Gentleman disdains to accept a lesson from New South Wales, yet he is quite willing to travel back even to the days of Numa

Pompilius, and thence draw a picture with which to terrify this Parliament from accepting this Bill at the hands of the Government. The question, however, is not what state of society existed in Rome 2,400 years ago, or, in some centuries later, what took place under the Kings, the Republic, or the Empire; but this—Is the Ballot necessary for the present state of things in this Empire? The question is, not what was good or bad in ancient Rome, but what is absolutely essential to the United Kingdom. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, or those of them who oppose the Ballot, affect to believe there is no evidence to guide the House as to its operation and effect in other countries, because it has been tried only for 13 years in South Australia, and there in a modified form. But they have altogether forgotten Belgium, where secret voting has been in operation for 40 years; and we have never heard of it working prejudicially to the public interests, the liberty, or the progress of that country. Were one to rely implicitly on what has been asserted this night by the opponents of secret voting, one would be led to believe that once this system of voting were established, there would be an end to every useful or valuable influence—that rank, station, authority, property, even wisdom and virtue, would cease to exert any salutary influence on the voter. And why? Because with the Ballot in operation, the poor, the humble, the dependent and the helpless would be enabled to vote according to their convictions and the dictates of their conscience. Pliny has been quoted to depict the degradation of the Roman voter who quitted the polling-place after depositing his Ballot in the voting-urn. But have we in these modern days not witnessed a spectacle really degrading—the voter driven to the poll by the irresistible force of power, and there openly recording his vote against his conscience? This degrading spectacle has been witnessed in almost every borough and county of the United Kingdom. [“No, no,” and “Yes, yes!”] As a rule it has been witnessed, though I am willing to extend liberally the number of alleged virtuous exceptions. Hon. Gentlemen are keenly alive to the degradation of the poor man giving his vote in secret—that is, in security, and without risk to himself and his family. They revolt from the pitiable spectacle of this humble voter returning from the voting-place with the consciousness of having recorded his vote in accordance with his principles. But what say they to the voter—this proud holder of a great constitutional trust—being compelled to vote against his known feelings and principles, to his own deep humiliation, and to the contempt of those whose esteem he desired to preserve. Sir, the material question is not whether the franchise is a trust, a privilege, or a right. The law gives it to the possessor of a certain qualification; and none have done more in the way of extending the franchise than the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), and those who act with him; but the real question is this—whether the man in an humble or dependent position can exercise the franchise freely and in safety to himself and those who belong to him? That is the real question, and not whether that which the law confers upon him is a right, a privilege, or a public trust. According to the theory of the Constitution, he is supposed to exercise this power of voting with perfect freedom; and what we have to consider is, can he do so more freely with the Ballot than without it? Now, my belief is, that for all persons in humble or dependent circumstances the protection of the Ballot is essential to their safety, and therefore I give to it my support. A strange misconception appears to have gone abroad, I know not from what cause, as to the course which the Catholic Members of this House would adopt in reference to the Ballot. I, myself, was asked by more than one hon. Member whether I had not changed my opinion on the question, and if I did not intend to vote against it, in deference to the wishes of the Roman Catholic Bishops and priests of Ireland. I said, in reply, and I now repeat, that since I entered this House, now 19 years ago, I voted for the Ballot whenever it was brought forward, though at times it has been treated as an annual farce; and I voted for it because I believed it to be necessary for the protection of the humble and defenceless. If, therefore, the Bishops and clergy of my Church had changed their opinions with respect to the Ballot, I would not on that account have changed mine. But, as a matter of fact, they had done nothing of the kind. I vote for it because I think it right and necessary, and that I do not believe it will have the effect of degrading the people of England or of Ireland. So far as I know anything of the Irish people, they are consistent supporters of the Ballot, because they have witnessed and felt the mischief and misery which has resulted from the present system of voting—from that manly, and upright, and fearless expression of opinion which so often brought ruin on those who exercised a so-called constitutional privilege, or discharged a so-called public trust. I express my solemn belief that there has been more misery and mischief inflicted on the people of Ireland by this so-called “manly” and “English” mode of voting than it is possible for tongue to describe or pen to record. It was hoped that with the change of tribunal there would be a change in the character of elections—that the knowledge of the tribunal, as it it were, following the offence and the offender, would strike terror into the evil-doer, and render elections pure and peaceable for the future. But has that been the case? Let hon. Members look to the records of the elections which have taken place since then, and they will find that violence, corruption, intimidation, and all the evils that existed before the change have been as active and as rampant as ever. Then the change must not be limited to the nature and locality of the tribunal, but must extend to the mode and manner of taking the vote. We are told that this secrecy will degrade the voter, and that he will himself regard the Ballot as an insult and an indignity. It is also said that the protection of the secret mode is unnecessary in these more improved times, in which an enlightened public opinion is exercising its benign influence on political contests. But, Sir, strangely enough, the people loudly clamour for this protection, and are most willing to endure this insult. Then it is asked, where are the Petitions in favour of the Ballot? The answer is simple—the time for petitioning is passed—the country takes the passing of the Ballot as a thing already granted. The majority of hon. Members in this House, and of candidates at the last election, were pledged to the Ballot; and surely we can have no more convincing proof of the popular feeling on this question. Sir, the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) has endeavoured to alarm the House by stating, as his belief, that if you give the Ballot to Ireland you would see 60 or 70, or possibly even 90 Nationalists returned to Parliament by the Irish people. I desire to speak freely on this point, which, I admit, is one of the very greatest importance. There is at present a wonderful amount of misconception in the minds of Englishmen with respect to what is termed “Home Rule.” I am myself a Nationalist, and in favour of Home Rule; but, at the same time, I am a loyal subject of Her Majesty, attached as a Monarchist to the Crown and Constitution, and I desire to see this Empire strong and flourishing, and the people of Ireland thoroughly united to the people of England. There are thousands of men in Ireland, Protestants as well as Catholics, who are Nationalists in the same spirit. The noble Marquess the Chief Secretary for Ireland has said to-night, in reference to the statement of the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket), that if these anticipated 90 Nationalists were sent from Ireland to this House, they would here find a strong and resolute determination to resist the separation of the two countries. With that representation of English feeling I entirely agree, and I hold the same opinion against the separation of the two countries, as strongly as the noble Marquess himself. Then the noble Marquess added, at least in substance—“Look at the people of the United States! they would not allow the Union to be dismembered; and the very same spirit which animated the American people with respect to the Union will animate the people of England in relation to Ireland.” Of that I am convinced. But what is the case in the United States? There are now as many as 40 States in the Union, and each State does its own local business, and manages its own affairs; and from each State there is sent to the Imperial Congress at Washington its Representatives, to deal with all matters of general or Imperial importance. By that federal principle, which unites all in one whole, while it secures to each State its freedom and independence in the management of its own affairs, the whole of that vast Continent—for such it really is—is made stronger, more powerful, and more united. Nay, such is the vitality of the principle of this Federation that a violent and devastating Civil War has been unable to destroy the Union. The great machine was rent asunder, cut in two by the war; but once the war was at an end, once the passions to which it gave rise had time to slumber and subside, the great machine was joined again together, and has since been working in harmonious action. Then let it be distinctly understood that, Ballot or no Ballot, at the next General Election there will be at least 50 men returned from Ireland pledged to what is called "Home Rule"—or, in other words, to the policy of Ireland governing herself for all local purposes—to that federal principle which has worked well in the United States for 90 years, which we seek to promote in our Australian colonies, which we have established in Canada, and which there is a Bill at this very moment in this House for introducing into the Leeward Islands. Now, as a matter of strict fact, that principle is hourly gaining the most important converts in Ireland among the most thoughtful and intelligent of the community. The Protestant mind of the country is steadily turning in that direction, from the highest and purest motives of patriotism, and certainly in no spirit of hostility to England and no disloyalty to the Sovereign. I was lately much struck by a circumstance which illustrated the advance of this national movement in favour of Home Rule. When returning to this House after the Easter Recess, I was travelling from Cork to Dublin in a first-class carriage; and of the occupants of that carriage I was the only Catholic, and yet there was not one in it who was not in favour of the principle of Home Rule. But you are told not to give the Ballot to Ireland lest she may send you 90 Nationalists. What does that mean? That you are to stifle the expression of a nation's opinion, if you can; but if not—if you cannot do so—you must appear as if you did not hear its voice, and were not conscious of its demand. Anything more opposed to the spirit of the Constitution and to the theory of free institutions it would be impossible to imagine. If hon. Gentlemen felt such apprehension of the working of the Ballot in Ireland as to induce Parliament to deny it to that country, while conferring it on England and Scotland, that would be one of the maddest and most suicidal steps which Parliament could take. It would be a distinct declaration to the people of Ireland that they were not worthy to enjoy the same privileges as England, and that Ireland was to be treated as a conquered country. The Constitution is now suspended in a portion of that country; a Coercion Act envelopes her from shore to shore, and 40,000 armed men are kept on her soil; but if the crowning insult of which I speak were added to other indignities and grievances, it would require a far greater number of soldiers to quell the spirit which would rise in every man's breast against so outrageous an injustice. Now, Sir, in order that that question of Home Rule should be rightly understood by the people of this country, I take this opportunity of saying that I will, at an early period next Session, take the sense of the House on a Motion in favour of Home Rule—not separation—not Repeal in a technical sense, but in the restricted and limited sense such as I have endeavoured to indicate by reference to Canada and the United States. And I may add that I know, from constant communication with many English Members, that the Representatives of several English constituencies are prepared to vote for a Motion of that kind. The fact is, Englishmen as well as Irishmen feel that there must be a change, even if it were only as a matter of better arrangement and convenience. This Session the legislative Temple Bar is choked by one huge waggon with the wheels off; and until this stoppage, or congestion of Public Business, is at an end, there can be no proper legislation, whether for England, for Scotland, or for Ireland. For four Sessions one Bill, one measure, has annually choked the highway; and when, under the present system, can we hope for a better state of things? To my mind, the prospect is very gloomy indeed. For these reasons, as well as for the greater and larger reasons and motives which I could adduce on behalf of my country, I will, in the next Session, ask the House of Commons to affirm a Resolution granting the Home Rule of which I have spoken, and which contributes so much to the advantage and prosperity, the greatness and the glory, of other countries. Sir, I desire, in conclusion, to say a word in reference to the evidence given by Dr. Butler, the Catholic Bishop of Limerick, before the Select Committee that sat on the question of the Ballot; and I do so as an answer to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket), who represented that there would be a certain amount of danger in the influence which would be used by the Catholic clergy in Ireland under the concealment of the Ballot. Now, the scope of Dr. Butler's evidence is strictly consistent with what I myself know to be the fact—that the Catholic clergy are sincerely desirous of withdrawing from all interference in elections, if not in political agitation, the moment they find the voters of the country can exercise their franchise—be it trust, or privilege, or right—freely and in safety. With the protection of the Ballot to the Irish voter, there would no longer be a necessity for the active interference of the Catholic priest in the turmoil of political strife; though, at the same time, there would be no reason why he should surrender his rights as a citizen, or give up his personal interest in what concerns the welfare and happiness of the people. With the Ballot as a mode of voting, coercion would cease. The landlord, for instance, would no longer be able to coerce his tenant voters; and the influence of the clergy, which had to be brought into the field to counteract that of the landlord, would cease to be exercised. The Bishop of Limerick distinctly said that if the protection of the Ballot—meaning thereby its secrecy and safety—were once conferred on the humble or dependent voter, the Catholic clergy of Ireland would be only too glad to retire from the arena, to which an overpowering necessity alone had impelled them.

Mr. Maguire

MR. G. BENTINCK moved the adjournment of the debate.

Debate further adjourned till Thursday.

PROMISSORY OATHS BILL—(Lords.)

[BILL 169.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he should like some explanation respecting that measure, which proposed the repeal of about 100 statutes, of which 50 related either to the supremacy, succession, or security of the Crown. It was a Government Bill, and although it had passed through "another place," he thought the House ought to know on whose authority the proposed repeal was to be granted, in order that it might determine whether several of these unrepealed statutes, said to be obsolete, were really so or not. In 1866 it was urged that the Oath of Allegiance ought to recite the Act of Settlement and the Succession to the Throne. That House thought that the only expression should be "the Sovereign of this country according to law;" but the House of Lords insisted on reciting the Act of Settlement. Two years afterwards an Act passed containing the present Oath of Allegiance; and hon. Members now subscribed the oath to the Sovereign according to law. It appeared to him that several of the repeals in that Bill affected the purport of that oath; and he asked the Government to explain by whom the measure had been prepared, and who it was that had been intrusted with the difficult task of deciding what statutes were to be deemed obsolete? He moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. CHARLEY, in seconding the Motion, said, he objected to so large a number of statutes connected with heresy, schism, and præmunire, being repealed by a Bill bearing the title of Promissory Oaths. If it were desirable to repeal the statutes in question, a special Bill ought to be brought in for that purpose.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be committed to a Select Committee," — (Mr. Newdegate,) — instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Dowse) expressed a hope that the Motion would not be pressed to a division, and stated that all the statutes mentioned in the Bill, so far as they related to their respective counties, had been carefully examined by the Law Officers of the Crown for England and Ireland, and also, he believed, by the Lord Advocate. All those statutes had been virtually repealed long ago, though not eo nomine.

MR. WHALLEY wished to know what was the object of the Government in repealing all these statutes. He believed the object of the Government, as shown by various other Acts during the present Session, was to promote by every means in their power the extension of the Roman Catholic religion. The explanation offered by the Solicitor General for Ireland was by no means satisfactory, and he complained that the Bill would repeal 100 statutes of which he had not the least knowledge. The Home Secretary recently avowed that he felt himself justified in allowing the laws relating to lotteries to be deliberately infringed, and by so doing he had evoked the gambling spirit of the country to the extent of £450,000 in the course of a few years, for the purpose of promoting the Roman Catholic religion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time upon Thursday.

TRAMWAYS PROVISIONAL ORDERS CONFIRMATION (re-committed) BILL—[BILL 197.]
COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Schedule again read.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that several of the schemes embodied in the Bill provided for tramways in leading thoroughfares of the Metropolis, including New Oxford Street, London Bridge, Lombard Street, and many others which he named; and he contended that London ought not to be dealt with in this way, by Provisional Orders relating to particular routes; but that the requirements of the Metropolis as a whole ought to be deliberately considered by Parliament and provided for in one comprehensive, complete, and harmonious scheme, if tramways were to be generally adopted. He had, therefore, given Notice of his intention to move the omission of all the Provisional Orders relating to London, and would now move that the first of these be struck out.

Amendment proposed, in page 42, line 23, to leave out from the words "London Street Tramways (Extensions, &c.)" to the words "traffic therein," in page 54, line 17.—(Mr. Beresford Hope.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Schedule."

MR. R. N. FOWLER moved to report Progress.

MR. T. CHAMBERS hoped the Motion for reporting Progress would not be persisted in. The Bill was founded upon the well-considered statute of last Session, upon the faith of which capital had been subscribed, and the consent of the local authorities to the proposed schemes obtained.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, the Bill of last Session was passed, like all the Acts of last Session, at 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning, in solemn silence. The Board of Trade alone was responsible for the passing of the General Act of last year.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE denied that the Board of Trade was responsible for the passing of the Bill of last year, whatever responsibility they might have in the matter was shared by the House. If the Committee were to decide upon the general question, it would be well to take a division at once; but if time were desired to see whether an arrangement could be made as to what tramways should be abandoned, he would consent to reporting Progress.

MR. W. H. SMITH suggested that the tramways should be put under a central authority, who should represent the public generally. The House had done wrong in giving such enormous powers to the Board of Trade last Session.

MR. LOCKE alleged that the Board of Trade had acted in the most secret manner last Session. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone had secured his own object, and now he desired to crush everybody else. The sooner the Board of Trade was reformed the better, for they were the creators of nuisances.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again," — (Mr. Robert Fowler,) — put, and negatived.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Schedule."

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 105; Noes 116: Majority 11.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

SALE OF LIQUOR ON SUNDAY BILL.

(Mr. Rylands, Mr. Candlish, Mr. Birley, Mr. Osborne Morgan.)

[BILL 48.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Monk.)

Motion, by leave withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 51; Noes 69: Majority 18.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Bill put off for three months.

SEA COAST FISHERIES (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. DOWNING, Bill to amend the Law as to the Sea Coast Fisheries (Ireland) and to aid and encourage the same, ordered to be brought in by Mr. DOWNING, The Marquess of HAMILTON, Viscount ST. LAWRENCE, and Colonel VANDELEUR.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 216.]

House adjourned at half after Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 27th June, 1871.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Kingsholm District Boundary * [215].

Second Reading—Metropolitan Building Act (1855) Amendment * (208).

Select Committee—Burial Grounds * (181), nominated.

Committee—Tancred's Charities * (91-216).

Third Reading—Metropolitan Commons Supplemental (No. 2) * (174); Land Drainage Supplemental * (175); Poor Law (Provisional Orders Confirmation) * (163); Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Supplemental * (172); Pensions Commutation * (128), and passed.

INDIA—PRESIDENCY OF FORT WILLIAM. PETITION.

LORD LYVEDEN presented a Petition of 600 Zemindars, Talookdars, Putneedars, and others interested in permanently settled estates in the Presidency of Fort William, East Indies, complaining of a despatch of the Secretary of State for India of the 17th May, 1870, and praying for inquiry into and for redress of grievances. He said he knew the difficulty of arresting their Lordships' attention on a subject relating almost exclusively to India; but he thought it his duty to bring before them a matter which was of considerable importance. Probably few of their Lordships had read the despatch to which the Petition referred, it having been published in a Blue Book with a mass of other documents; but the proposal it contained, and of which the Petitioners complained, was to establish a cess on lands included in Lord Cornwallis's Permanent Settlement of 1793, for the purpose of compulsory education. This the Petitioners contended was inconsistent with the terms of that arrangement, by which the burdens on the territory included within it were fixed and declared incapable of increase. The proposed tax stood on an altogether different footing from the income tax, the imposition of which was necessary, after the Mutiny, in order to re-establish Indian finances. It seemed that the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) took the advice of his Council on this matter, and they only approved his despatch by a majority of one, the dissentients being seven gentlemen eminently qualified to give an opinion on Indian matters.

Most of them had been in India, and some had been Members of the old East India Company. Their objection was that the imposition of the cess would be a breach of faith with the landowners of Bengal; and one of them (Sir Francis Halliday) pointing out that the objection proffered in the case of irrigation—namely, that the tax would be likely to make unpopular what would otherwise be regarded as a blessing—was equally applicable to compulsory education. Now, one of the impressions as to the causes which led to the Mutiny of 1857, was that education was being diffused too rapidly in India, and against the desire of the people. He feared, therefore, that this despatch would produce great irritation. Moreover, there was no local machinery for levying the tax, and Lord Cornwallis's Settlement was looked upon in Bengal as a kind of Magna Charta. Considering these things, and the opinions expressed by a large minority of his Council, although he (Lord Lyveden) was no great admirer of that institution, the noble Duke would do well to suspend his judgment, and not to hurry on the measure. His noble Friend had already, indeed, inculcated on the Indian Government the necessity of caution. The proposed cess was to include roads, and to this he saw no reasonable objection; but a tax for education might entail serious consequences, and might produce a strong feeling against the Government. A question like this might have been referred with advantage to a Select Committee of this House. The Petition was couched in very respectful terms, and appealed with confidence to their Lordships' House, as comprising among its Members men who had at some time or other ruled the destinies of our Indian Empire, and who had thus become acquainted with the wants and wishes of the people, he trusted therefore it would receive the consideration of their Lordships.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he must admit that the despatch touched on one of the most important questions connected with the Government of India. As to his noble Friend's complaint, that it had been buried in a large Blue Book, he should have been willing to lay it on the Table separately had he not thought it fairer to accompany it with the dissents of Members of the Council, and with all the co-relative documents, which would enable any noble Lord disposed to wade through the Papers to form a judgment upon the subject. The fact was that the Revenue of India was more than fully absorbed by the judicial, civil, and military administration of the Empire, together with the larger class of public works, so that local drainage, roads, education, and other measures of immense importance would have to be neglected, and the country thus reduced to stagnation, unless other funds were found. This had been felt by every Government, and, to some extent, works of this kind had been undertaken, as was done in this country, by local cesses or rates. These cesses by no means originated with the present Government, for long before the decision taken in this particular case, local rates had been levied almost over the whole of India for roads and other local works. The Government of Sir John Lawrence and Lord Mayo had naturally wished to have recourse to the same expedient in Bengal, where those interested in landed property were wealthier than in the other Provinces, and they desired the local government of Bengal to impose a local cess for education, roads, and other works. They were met, however, by the old argument, that under Lord Cornwallis's Permanent Settlement of 1793 no local cess could be imposed on the zemindars and others, the land rate having by that Settlement been fixed in perpetuity. The same objection was urged to the imposition of the income tax, but it was overruled by the then Government of India and by the Home Government, and incomes from land in Bengal had accordingly been subjected to the tax equally with incomes from other sources. Unfortunately, the zemindars were supported in the present instance by Sir William Grey, the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, who had just returned home, and the agitation reached such a height that the Imperial Government was appealed to. The objection, if valid, would apply equally to other parts of India, the land revenue being generally settled for 30 years; and the question was important also as regarded the good faith of the British Government. It was true that his despatch was approved by only a bare majority of the Council; but it was sanctioned unanimously by Her Majesty's Government, and he thought that those who read the arguments on both sides in the Blue Book would be convinced that no breach of faith had been committed. There were, indeed, stronger arguments for the cess in this instance than existed in the case of the income tax, the latter being raised for Imperial purposes, while the contemplated cess would be for local objects. He believed the decision had been received with satisfaction by the general community, and hoped that in point of principle the question would not be re-opened. At the same time he agreed in the impolicy of imposing such cesses too high and with too great rapidity. His noble Friend, like Sir William Grey, approved a cess for roads, but objected to one for education. There was, however, no distinction between the two in point of right. It was the opinion of many that education was not appreciated by the people of India, and that it was inexpedient to push it on by local taxation too hastily. He had, however, carefully warned the Government against proceeding too hastily. The new Lieutenant Governor of Bengal agreed with the despatch, and was anxious to carry it into effect with proper caution. He hoped, therefore, that nothing would be said in this House to embarrass the authorities in dealing with a question of great difficulty.

Lord Lyveden

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY agreed with the noble Duke that the imposition of the tax was not a breach of faith, for he could not conceive how Lord Cornwallis could fetter his successors for ever in the right of taxation. It was possible, however, that injustice might be committed in imposing the tax, and by casting on land special burdens, having no reference to land, might not be so patiently endured in India as it was in this country, where people were accustomed to it. It was quite possible that the landowners, when they saw their lands set out for new taxation, might conceive that it was not really for taxation, but for an increase of rent; and that would be a danger. He hoped the utmost caution would be shown in increasing taxation for purposes not closely connected with the interests of the taxpayers, and that none would be imposed which was not of obviously immediate benefit to the zemindars and other proprietors.

LORD LYVEDEN moved that the said Petition be printed.

LORD REDESDALE said, that to print the Petition would be contrary to the practice of the House.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY thought the custom might be more honoured in the breach than the observance, and he could not conceive why the printing of the Petition should be objected to. It could not be contrary to good policy to allow the views of an important part of Her Majesty's subjects to be brought under their Lordships' notice.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he was not one of those who thought that because a thing had not been done it never should be done. Still, if there was to be a departure from what had existed as a rule, it would be better for his noble Friend to give Notice of his intention to make a Motion at some future time.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, their Lordships ought to be careful how they departed from the practice without due Notice and consideration. Parties desiring to see their opinions put into print at the expense of others might present a pamphlet under the form of a Petition. There was a practice in the other House to appoint a Committee, who selected the Petitions which they thought ought to be printed, and they were circulated with the Votes; and in addition to that, any hon. Member could move that a particular Petition should be so printed and circulated. He thought the plan might be introduced here. There was not a single argument in the Petition which did not appear in the Blue Book.

LORD LYVEDEN admitted the impolicy of printing all Petitions, but urged that these Native Princes had no knowledge of the forms of the House, and would infer that their Petition, if not printed, had been neglected.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

ARMY REGULATION BILL.—QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND asked when this Bill was likely to reach their Lordships' House? It was introduced into the House of Commons on the 16th of February, was read a second time on the 17th of March, and passed through Committee on the 19th of June. He was hardly surprised that a measure of such importance had occupied so much time in the other House; but the Government, by interposing another measure of equal or at least of great importance—the Ballot Bill—before it had passed through its remaining stages, had deprived their Lordships of the opportunity of discussing it so soon as would otherwise have been the case. This was very inconvenient, for the end of the Session was approaching, and their Lordships would not be able to give so much attention as they would have desired to the Bills which would shortly come up to them.

EARL GRANVILLE: I think it would be better to abstain from entering into the question as to the manner in which the Army Regulation Bill has been discussed in the other House of Parliament. It would yesterday have been very difficult for me to give an answer with any certainty to the Question which the noble Duke has put. But it appears that last night an arrangement was entered into, and I hope will be maintained, by which the third reading of the Bill will take place on Monday next, and, of course, it will immediately come up to this House. The noble Duke has as good, and perhaps better, means than I have of knowing whether that arrangement will be maintained or not.

House adjourned at Six o'clock, 'till
To-morrow, half past
Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 27th June, 1871.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee
—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

The House met at Two of the clock.

METROPOLIS—DRINKING TROUGH IN PICCADILLY.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN ARCHDALL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether there is no power to order the removal of the drinking trough lately erected opposite Hamilton Place, which, in its present position, caused great obstruction, to some place, such as what was formerly called Apsley Stables, where the road was fifteen feet wider; and, whether the right hon. Gentleman would give orders to the police effectually to prevent any stoppage of the traffic in consequence of the drinking trough?

The Duke of Richmond

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, he had no power over these roads. The power lay with the Vestry. It was by their authority that the trough had been placed in its present position, and by their authority it could be removed. Obstruction of the high road was a legal offence, and the Vestry, if there was any obstruction in this case, would be liable to prosecution for causing it by anyone who felt aggrieved. So far as the action of the police was concerned, he would take care that they should do what they could to diminish any obstruction caused by the use of the trough.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Question again proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £23,078, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for the Buildings of the Houses of Parliament.”

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, it would not be right to allow the debate to close without some observations on the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who presided over the Office of Works, and who, to the great contentment of the House, had announced his intention to bring in a Bill to teach and enforce better manners to people visiting the Parks. The right hon. Gentleman, who might now very properly be characterized as the Chesterfield of the 19th century, made a statement the other day respecting a former public servant (Mr. Barry), which deserved to receive some consideration. The right hon. Gentleman, speaking of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. C. Bentinck), with the cause of whose absence from the House that day every hon. Gentleman would sympathize, had said—

"The hon. Member who had been so severe upon him in respect of his method of conducting Public Business would form a different opinion on the subject if he had had more experience. He did not, however, attach much importance to the hon. Member's opinion—"

Probably the hon. and learned Member would be able to reciprocate that sentiment.

"—because he was probably not aware of the circumstances under which Mr. Barry had been dealt with. What had been written to Mr. Barry had been written advisedly, and with a due regard to the public interest. When anyone desired to get a statement of reasons from a Minister for any course he might pursue it was not desirable to fall into his trap."

Perhaps that might be considered a candid explanation of the relations between the Treasury bench and the rest of the House, and that the right hon. Gentleman considered that when an hon. Member rose to put a question to the occupants of the Treasury bench the fair assumption was that he was laying a trap, and that it was the duty of the Government not to fall into that trap, or, in other words, to give that kind of answer which would, in reality, be no explanation. The right hon. Gentleman might represent that the leading organ had for once not correctly reported him. But the right hon. Gentleman's statement as it stood was an explanation of the Governmental policy with respect to interrogators. But what was the case between Mr. Barry and the right hon. Gentleman? The correspondence between Mr. Barry and the First Commissioner was very long; but in a few words he would explain the matter. Mr. Barry asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he would allow him to have a copy of the Opinions of the Law Officers of the Crown on the point as to the drawings of Mr. Barry's father, which he refused to give. But of such a question put respectfully the right hon. Gentleman did not hesitate to speak as a trap, although it concerned the professional fame of a gentleman to whom the gentleman who put the question was most nearly and dearly related. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say—and the statement was one which could not be allowed to go uncontradicted—because it was one of those statements which, if the persons concerned had not been in the respective positions of Minister of the Crown and employé, would have led to a sharp correspondence, or if it had occurred in the last generation would have led to something much sharper—the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that Mr. Barry's services were by no means "disinterested." Now, what was the imputation which was supposed to underlie the use of the word "disinterested" in common life? An imputation injurious to the good fame of the person to whom it was applied. ["No, no!"] He repeated distinctly that that was the inference to be drawn. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman might bring Johnson's Dictionary, or any other dictionary, to prove the exact meaning of the word "disinterested;" but there were covert meanings behind some words, and when such an expression was used in regard to an employé it left an imputation behind.

MR. AYRTON said, if the hon. Gentleman wished to quote his words, and to comment on them, then it was desirable that he should quote them as they were delivered in that House, with the context. The hon. Gentleman would there find that the words did not bear the construction which he put upon them.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he was quoting from the report in The Times. ["Order!"]

MR. AYRTON said, the public journals in reporting the debates necessarily did so very shortly, especially when the House was in Committee of Supply.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he would withdraw that statement and the line of argument. He believed it would be in the recollection of hon. Members that the right hon. Gentleman did make certain statements on the last occasion on which the House was in Committee of Supply to the effect that the services which had been rendered by Mr. Barry while in the position of architect of the Houses of Parliament were not disinterested. Now, what would the right hon. Gentleman think if he were to use similar language with reference to his own services or those of any of his Colleagues on the Treasury bench, who drew, and very properly drew, official salaries?

MR. AYRTON rose to Order.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE begged to inform the right hon. Gentleman that he would not stand those repeated interruptions. No man, because he sat on the Treasury bench, had a right to jump up continually and interrupt any hon.

Member. If he (Mr. B. Hope) were to say that the services of any Member of the Government who rightly drew his salary were not disinterested, he should subject himself to the just imputation of very bad taste, and of a very slight knowledge of the value of the English language. He had heard that the right hon. Gentleman, in the course of the debate, had stated that Mr. Barry had been employed to do certain work, for which he had been paid, and that the continuance of his services was inconsistent with the public interest—that this was not merely a question of what was paid to Mr. Barry, but a question of the hundreds of thousands of pounds which the House was called on to pay for carrying out Mr. Barry's suggestions. Now, he had the verbal assurance of Mr. Barry himself, given him that very day, that his business and duty were all along to receive the suggestions of the First Commissioner, by whomsoever that office happened to be held. The practice was that the First Commissioner should state to Mr. Barry that he wanted some work or another to be executed, and Mr. Barry was bound to report to him as to the sum which it would probably cost. The First Commissioner accepted the report, or cut it down; but, whether accepted or cut down, Mr. Barry was bound to execute the work for the sum named. Mr. Barry, he might add, had assured him that on looking back to his career as architect of the Houses of Parliament he found he had never exceeded the amount set down in the report which he had given in. He had, however, other authorities to refer to in favour of that gentleman whom the First Commissioner would hardly say he was not bound to treat with some respect. The first of those authorities whom he would quote was the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who in the debate of May 13, 1870, on Westminster Palace, said—

“ I am not likely to say anything in disparagement of Mr. Barry. . . . We had a perfect right to put an end, if we thought it advisable, to Mr. Barry's engagement. . . . It does not, however, follow that he was never to be employed again. I hope myself—it is not my business—but I hope that he may be employed when we have any architectural duties to be performed in connection with this House.”—[3 Hansard, cci. 716.]

The next testimony he would quote was that of the First Lord of the Treasury, who said, on the same occasion, that he had never given any opinion adverse to that which had been expressed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the re-employment of Mr. Barry should the services of an architect happen to be required for the building; and that Mr. Barry had in no way misconducted himself in the execution of the work committed to his charge. Now would, he should like to know, either the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the First Lord of the Treasury have spoken in such terms of Mr. Barry if the carrying out of his suggestions had led to the waste of hundreds or thousands of pounds, as had been stated by the First Commissioner of Works? Whatever may have been the cause of Mr. Barry's employment or of its discontinuance—whether he had had hard lines dealt out to him or not—the heads of the Government parted with him in all honour and confidence as a meritorious public servant, who had done his duty. He held in his hand, he might add, an account which showed the works which Mr. Barry had carried out from his own designs, irrespective of those which he had completed as the successor of his father, and he found that while he held the appointment of architect the sum expended amounted to only about £66,000. What, then, ought the House to say to a Minister who did not know the difference between £66,000 and hundreds of thousands of pounds? That was sufficient to show how rash and rambling were the figures used by the First Commissioner of Works. This was a matter of personal character with regard to Mr. Barry; but the personal character of any gentleman ought to be precious to the House, and especially the personal character of a gentleman who had been the servant of the public for so many years. He protested against the Treasury bench being made the arena from which private feelings of liking and disliking should be vented in regard to any public servants whose position rendered them so incapable of meeting the taunts which were thrown out in that way. Mr. Barry, like other men, had to earn his bread, and imputations upon him might stand seriously in the way of his professional reputation. Was it fair that in order to catch a cheer, and to pass a Vote at 10 minutes to 7 o'clock, such language as was used by the First Commissioner of Works should be tolerated? When Ministers wished to pass a Vote at such a time, they had better be careful for the future as to who they left on the Treasury bench, and from whose mouths they left explanations to come. Had the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Prime Minister been present on Friday Mr. Barry would not have been disparaged in this way, nor would these imputations have been so carelessly tossed about.

Mr. Beresford Hope

MR. AYRTON said, that while the hon. Gentleman was addressing the Committee he thought it would be agreeable to him that he should interrupt, for if he recollected rightly the hon. Gentleman was not in the House when the discussion on which he had commented arose, and he could therefore have no personal knowledge as to the accuracy of the statements which he was making. The hon. Gentleman not knowing anything of the matter he naturally supposed that he would like to hear from him what it was that really occurred; but every man had his own view as to what was right. [MR. BERESFORD HOPE: Hear!] and certainly his view in the present instance differed very much from that of the hon. Member. If the hon. Gentleman had only listened to his explanation, he would not have found it necessary to make several of the remarks, more or less complimentary, in which he had indulged. What he had really said on Friday did not in the least bear the construction which the hon. Gentleman had put upon it, for the report in the newspaper from which he had quoted, though giving a general view of his argument, did not profess to be a strictly accurate verbal account of what had passed on the occasion. What he had said was, that when discussions had previously arisen on the subject a great deal had been heard as to Mr. Barry's having rendered disinterested services; but that since his engagement had terminated he had sent in an account of all those services, amounting to a considerable sum, which had been paid. [MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: What amount?] £2,000;—and, that being so, Mr. Barry was not entitled to the credit of having giving his services for nothing. He thought enough had been said on that subject last Session, and there not being a single item in the present Vote which related to Mr. Barry or the payment of his services, he should not have alluded to the matter had not an hon. Member deemed it right to call the attention of the Committee to it. Again, with respect to the advantages which he thought had resulted from Mr. Barry's having ceased to hold his late appointment, what he had said was that there were, as a consequence, no more suggestions from him before the House, involving a large expenditure. He had floating in his mind what had been stated last Session by an eminent Prelate (the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol) in the other House of Parliament, that £30,000 had been spent in bedizening with gold a part of the building which in former times was used as a coal cellar and lumber room, and which was subsequently used as a dining room for the Speaker. It was stated that having been thus bedizened it had been made more obscure than it already was by the manner in which the windows were painted, and there was a scheme projected for having shutters made to work by machinery, and gas lighted outside the windows with an arrangement of screens, so that the painted windows might be exhibited by night as well as by day. He had inferred that the vault was not now used for any purpose and never could be, so that it remained a spectacle of the most absolute waste of the public money. Of course, Mr. Barry maintained that everything he had done had been done at the suggestion of the First Commissioner of Works; but whether the architect made a suggestion of an expensive character and the First Commissioner took it up, or vice versa, the result had been somehow or another a large outlay of public money on projects of the kind. What he stated was that under these circumstances the Government had got rid of all that sort of thing by putting an end to the connection which existed between the Office of Works and Mr. Barry, and the First Commissioner was required, on his own responsibility, to satisfy himself of the necessity for any proposal previous to its being laid before Parliament. What works he should like to know had been projected by Mr. Barry during the two or three years he held the appointment in question? A new House of Commons and a new House of Lords, at an enormous expense. [MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: He was acting in accordance with the Report of the Committee.] He did not care who had recommended these projects. The proposals were made and beautifully executed designs were hung about the House to bring the matter before the eyes of hon. Members. [Mr. BERESFORD HOPE said the designs were ordered by the Committee.] All these things were going on while Mr. Barry was Parliamentary architect, and that gentleman was always suggesting things which involved an enormous expenditure of public money. Since the connection with Mr. Barry had ceased, however, these projects were no longer heard of, and there were no proposals to involve the House in a very large public expenditure. He had heard the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. C. Bentinck) lately condemn the cloister which had been erected in New Palace Yard at an enormous cost, and which many people did not look upon as an improvement to the beauty of the House, and there was a crop of suggestions for future works which would, in all probability, have to be executed in a still more expensive manner. The result was that while small things which hon. Members asked for their own convenience could not be obtained, the public money was being lavishly expended on such projects as those to which he had been referring. The hon. Member for Cambridge University had a great love for the Fine Arts; but he could hardly be of opinion that the interests of art were promoted by putting up a very indifferent statue in stone, and then making it beautiful by plastering it all over with gold. [Mr. BERESFORD HOPE: Where is that statue?] It is in the Royal Gallery. He thought the Government had done well in getting rid of this state of things, and in putting on the First Commissioner of Works the undivided responsibility of any step which was calculated to draw the House into any expenditure on a building which some people thought was one of the most inconvenient and costly buildings ever erected. He would not enter into the vexed question respecting the correspondence between Mr. Barry and the Office of Works. All he could say was that Mr. Barry's communications were of a character calculated to draw him into a long controversy, and that he had declined to enter into any such controversy, his replies being confined to the simple matters of business which had to be discussed between them. When Mr. Barry attempted to go beyond the matter of business and embarked in controversial writing, however exciting his letters might be in tone, he had treated them with the utmost calmness, reducing his answers to the smallest number of words necessary to convey the determination of the Office of Works on the point at issue. The result was that the Office had not been led into a foolish controversy. Passing from that subject, he should proceed to answer some questions which he had been asked before the adjournment of the debate on Friday. One hon. Gentleman wished to know what was being done with respect to a display of electric light at night on the Clock Tower or some other portion of the Houses of Parliament, so that hon. Members and others at a distance might be able to know whether the House was sitting or not. Well, the carrying out such a project involved intricate scientific questions as to how it was to be most satisfactorily and economically executed. He (Mr. Ayrton) had been in communication with several scientific gentlemen on the subject; but he was not at the present moment in a position to state what the cost of such a light would be. It was not a thing which could be done for a trifle, and the Government had more than one proposal under consideration. He hoped, he might add, to have an experiment made with the light from one of the turrets of the Victoria Tower before the Session came to a close; but he could not as yet say whether the project would be carried out or not. A question was asked respecting the heat of the Library; but when the external temperature rose above 70 degrees, and when, in addition, the gas was lighted, it was impossible to keep down the heat of the atmosphere very much; but, on the whole, the temperature of the room was by no means excessive. The lighting of the House had been very much considered, and hon. Members would notice that new lights had been erected in the dining room which gave general satisfaction. That question had received a good deal of attention, and a distinguished gentleman connected with the Office of Works (Dr. Percy) was the superintendent of the department. Some complaints had been made in regard to the establishment of the clerk of works for the House. But there were services to be performed which required rather a large establishment. There was a clerk of works who superintended all the business which properly belonged to the Department during ordinary hours; but it was necessary to have a person in addition to continue the services required when the House sat until a late hour. In connection with the ventilation of the House was that of the Courts of Justice, and the services were effected by boilers of considerable power, and great advantage arose from having the double services performed by one set of machinery. The cost of the police for the House of Parliament was doubtless very considerable, and the sum which appeared in the Votes was not the whole expense, because it was not only necessary to pay for the police employed in the service of Parliament, but a large sum had also to be paid to the police on account of the Houses been shown to visitors when Parliament was not sitting. Who ought to pay for that was a question which had arisen, for if the Houses of Parliament were converted into a public show for the gratification of the inhabitants of the Metropolis, it did not belong to the public Exchequer to discharge the expense, but the cost should fall on the police of the Metropolis, who were bound to see that no injury was done to the building. The adjustment between the charge which should be paid out of the local funds of the Metropolitan Police and the charge which should be borne by the Imperial Exchequer might be a matter for consideration; but at present it was thought better not to disturb the existing arrangement.

Mr. Ayrton

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE said, after the allusion of the right hon. Gentleman to the work in St. Stephen's Crypt, which took place under his (Mr. Cowper-Temple's) superintendence, he must say a few words. He was in hopes that the First Commissioner of Works when he rose would have apologized for the language he used during the last discussion of the Estimates, because more unwarrantable language than that employed towards Mr. Barry never proceeded from a Minister of the Crown in reference to any individual in the public service. Upon reflection, the right hon. Gentleman not only maintained the accusation he had made, but proceeded to justify it, increasing thereby the injustice tenfold. The right hon. Gentleman had been twitted from the other side for having caused an unnecessary expenditure of £2,000 by his removal of Mr. Barry from the position of consulting architect which he held up to the time when the right hon. Gentleman came into office. That sum of £2,000 was for designs and plans which were not put into execution. So long as Mr. Barry remained in his position as architect of the Palace of Westminster, he was always ready to prepare for consideration any designs that might be wanted, without demanding payment for them if they were not adopted, being satisfied with the percentage he got upon executed works. But when the First Commissioner of Works withdrew employment from Mr. Barry and yet made use of the designs he had submitted, Mr. Barry was obliged to demand his professional remuneration for his unexecuted designs, in order to guard against the denial of their authorship, and thus the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman has led to an expenditure of £2,000 which would otherwise have been saved. One of the designs was for carrying out the work which the First Commissioner of Works executed in the refreshment and dining rooms. [Mr. AYRTON said, that the most of Mr. Barry's designs were not carried out.] Payment for the designs of refreshment and dining rooms was made to Mr. Barry; but that gentleman would not have required payment for unexecuted designs if he had been left in the position of consulting architect of the House. However, it became necessary for Mr. Barry, when removed from that position, and when the First Commissioner of Works was making use of his designs, to ask payment for the unexecuted designs. The First Commissioner of Works said he did not entirely carry out Mr. Barry's design for the new refreshment and dining rooms. Then, that was more the pity, because he spoilt Mr. Barry's designs. These rooms were at present connected by two doors. Mr. Barry's plan would have thrown the two rooms into one, and would have added considerably to the space for dining-tables; and would have provided a much more convenient access to the kitchen. The alterations made in Mr. Barry's plan were certainly not advantageous. In a previous discussion the First Commissioner said that the House had not only to consider what was paid to Mr. Barry himself, but the thousands and hundreds of thousands of pounds the country would have had to expend if Mr. Barry had remained in his situation. If that observation meant anything, it meant that the First Commissioner of Works was so weak as to be under the influence of anyone who made suggestions to him; but no one who knew the First Commissioner of Works would give weight to an argument resting on his readiness to follow the advice of anyone or particularly of an architect or artist. That day he had thrown out another view, and had endeavoured to put upon Mr. Barry the responsibility of various expenses with which he had nothing whatever to do. First among these was the cost incurred in regard to what he called the Vault, but which he (Mr. Cowper-Temple) would call St. Stephen's Crypt. This, according to the right hon. Gentleman, was absolutely worthless—he forgot the exact term of contempt used. [Mr. AYRTON: Useless.] The right hon. Gentleman, then, thought that one of the best specimens of the architecture of the 13th century in this country was totally useless. Let the right hon. Gentleman ask any professional architect whose opinion was worth having, and he would be told that as a specimen of architecture it was most valuable. [Mr. AYRTON said, he had spoken of bedizening the chapel with gold.] Then the right hon. Gentleman admitted that it was valuable, and his only objection to it was that it was bedizened with gold. But that was only the restoration of the building to the condition in which it was in the time of its early beauty and splendour. It was on record that in the time of Henry III. that chapel was most brilliantly ornamented, quite as much bedizened and as beautiful a specimen of architecture as it was now. Indeed, it was much finer, and what had been done was only an attempt to restore it to its old style. But the right hon. Gentleman said this bedizenment had cost £30,000. Now, that was an assertion which he should have thought even the great boldness of the right hon. Gentleman would hardly have ventured to make, although he professed to be backed by the authority of some Prelate in the House of Lords. If, however, the right hon. Gentleman would take the trouble to look into the records of his own Department he would find that instead of £30,000 the cost was little more than £600. Just as in the former part of the debate he talked about thousands and hundreds of thousands, so at present he was endeavouring to draw his hon. Friends below the gangway by talking of economy in regard to this chapel. The work was done by contract with Messrs. Crace; they executed it so liberally that probably they lost money by it, but they got no more than the contract price. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded to say that Mr. Barry was responsible for the cost of the plans for the new Houses of Commons and Lords; but that was totally inaccurate. Any of the Members who served on the Committee would bear him out when he stated that Mr. Barry made no suggestion whatever on that subject. Mr. Barry was called before them as a witness, but he produced no plans until, on the Motion of Sir John Lanyon (then a Member), he proposed a plan of a new House of Commons. The Committee were solely responsible. From his (Mr. Cowper-Temple's) experience of Mr. Barry when he was First Commissioner of Works, he could say without hesitation that Mr. Barry never made any spontaneous suggestions that would have led to any expense. It was not his business to do so; he ought not to have done so, and he did not do so; his only suggestions were made in answer to the demands of those who instructed him. In the same way the expense of the dining room did not originate with Mr. Barry, but with the Committee of the House, who submitted a Report year after year recommending the expenditure proposed. When he (Mr. Cowper-Temple) was First Commissioner of Works he got these Reports; he did not wish to spend the money of the country in altering the dining rooms, and he refused, as his successors did, till the right hon. Gentleman came into office, and he departed from the economical view which had up till then prevailed in the office. He it was who incurred the expense, although now he professed to be more economical than his predecessors, who declined to incur this expenditure. But although he incurred the expense of the new dining rooms, he did it in a niggardly way, curtailing and spoiling Mr. Barry's plans. Mr. Barry only submitted an approximate estimate. His estimate was higher because it included more extensive alterations, as he had been asked to provide a new dining room for the Lords as well as for Commons. The right hon. Gentleman ought to withdraw his very unfair imputations. If he were a private Member perhaps Mr. Barry would not care for his attacks. But speaking as he did with the authority of a Minister of the Crown, it was rather unfair that he should launch out those vague and unfounded accusations against a man professionally employed in his Department. Because Sir Charles Barry led the country into very considerable expense in regard to this great structure, his son was assumed to be intending to do the same. But his experience of Mr. Edward Barry had led him to a different conclusion. The statements that had been made were without any foundation and the reiteration of them against a professional man was unfair and ungenerous.

Mr. Cowper-Temple

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE, as a member of the Committee to which allusion had been made, must confirm the statements of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. The First Commissioner had stated that the country had been saved hundreds of thousands of pounds, which would have been expended had Mr. Barry remained in office. The Committee had unanimously reported in favour of building a new House of Commons. Mr. Barry was sent for and desired to prepare a drawing. He did make elaborate and admirable plans, and he also produced a plan for a new dining room. That plan was adopted, but not in its entirety, and the bad part of it only had been carried out by the First Commissioner. The credit of the bar in the lobby—which cut the lobby in two, and was quite an offence—belonged to the right hon. Gentleman. He thought the First Commissioner had left an improper impression on the public mind with regard to Mr. Barry's charge, which turned out to be, for 12 years' service, only £2,200, and he was bound to express his regret for having been led away by his florid style of speaking into the great exaggeration of which he had been guilty.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he regretted the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. C. Bentinck) was not in his place, as he was about to refer to the charge made by him, and which had that day been repeated, that the Chief Commissioner of Works had put the country to the expense of £2,000 by ceasing to employ Mr. Barry. This must mean that if Mr. Barry had remained in his position he never would have received the £2,000 which had been claimed by, and paid to him; and that state of circumstances seemed to be considered as something creditable to Mr. Barry and discreditable to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ayrton.) Now, in examining this charge, they were confined to one of two alternatives. Either Mr. Barry was employed with an understanding between himself and the Chief Commissioner for the time being that he was not to be remunerated, or there was no such understanding. The former alternative he (Sir Francis Goldsmid) felt himself to be wholly prevented from adopting, having been informed by all acquainted with Mr. Barry—however much they might differ in estimating his professional skill and economy—that he was a gentleman of the highest honour; and finding it impossible to reconcile with that high honour the supposition of his having sent in an account for services for which it had been understood that he was not to be compensated. Consequently he was driven to the conclusion that it was always intended that Mr. Barry should be compensated, although the period at which his account was sent in was accelerated by his dismissal. If that was so, it was idle and absurd to say that the Chief Commissioner had brought a cost of £2,000 upon the country by the dismissal of Mr. Barry, when the course taken had simply had the effect of causing him to be paid in one year instead of another.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that having been a Member of the Committee to which reference had been made, he would add a few words to what had been said by the right hon. Member for South Hampshire (Mr. Cowper-Temple) in defence of Mr. Barry, and in proof that he was in no way responsible for the expenditure which had been incurred. The Committee was moved for by the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Headlam) after fair discussion and something like a general expression of opinion on the part of the Members of the House that the Hall in which they assembled was, from circumstances, inadequate for the transaction of their business. The Committee sat for two Sessions, and Mr. Barry drew the plans of the House on the Motion of Sir

Charles Lanyon; but there were a good many other plans which increased Mr. Barry's bill—as, for instance, an ingenious design for the re-arrangement of the House, produced by the hon. Baronet the Member for Manchester (Sir Thomas Bazley), which being a pen-and-ink sketch was reproduced by Mr. Barry in the more workmanlike form of a regular plan drawn to scale. Then the Committee of its own motion, and not at all at the instigation of Mr. Barry, obtained plans of the different Houses of Legislature in different countries in Europe, and these were reduced to scale by Mr. Barry, who was not responsible for that expense. To show the value of those plans, he might state that recently application was made to him for the Blue Book containing them by a gentleman of high distinction in the Prussian Parliament, as a guide for a Committee sitting in Berlin to decide upon a new German Parliament House. The Select Committee, after sitting two Sessions, reported unanimously, composed as it was of Members from both sides of the House. In the first Session of the present Parliament the question came before the House, and the matter having been discussed, was postponed, but not shelved, the Prime Minister giving reasons why the building of a new House should not be proceeded with at once. It was not likely, however, to be again taken up under the present administration of the office of Public Works. But to say that Mr. Barry tried to lead the House to expend thousands—to quote the very romantic Arabian Nights-like figures they had heard from the Treasury bench—was simply to state what neither the Blue Book nor the records of the House would carry out. Mr. Barry was no more responsible for the Committee's proceedings than the right hon. Gentleman himself. When people saw the supercilious language in which the Minister of Works had talked of the restoration of an English building equal to the Sainte Chapelle in Paris, the supposed destruction of which had lately caused universal regret, he should not be surprised if they folded up their newspapers and said—"After all, England is a nation of shopkeepers, and a shopkeeper presides over its tastes."

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that having last year expressed most emphatically his condemnation, on public grounds, of the removal of Mr. Barry, and his deep regret at the tone and terms in which his dismissal had been conveyed to him by the right hon. Gentleman, he was in hopes he might have been spared the necessity of rising on the present occasion; but the right hon. Gentleman had made use of such language as to leave him no option but to follow the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Hampshire (Mr. Cowper-Temple) in expressing his belief that the complaints and charges brought by the First Commissioner of Works against Mr. Barry to-day were totally and absolutely unfounded. He spoke not only as First Commissioner of Works at the time the Committee was appointed, but also as a member of that Committee. The Committee was moved for with the approbation of the Government, and the general assent of the House, and the Motion arose out of the discontent which was felt, rightly or wrongly, with the size of the room in which hon. Members meet. The Committee naturally called Mr. Barry as a witness, and put to him questions which he answered, and which he had no option but to answer. At the request of the Committee he first produced plans of the House. A suggestion was made by an independent member of the Committee that Mr. Barry should be requested to prepare plans, and Mr. Barry came to him as First Commissioner to ask whether he had the sanction of the Government to comply with the formal request of the Committee. He (Lord John Manners) had no hesitation in saying that the Government sanctioned the request of the Committee, at the same time guarding himself against the idea of the Government being committed to any result which might follow the investigation of the Committee. Then he was requested during the Recess to communicate with our representatives at Berlin, Vienna, and Washington, and with the authorities in Canada, with the view of obtaining plans showing how the Members of the Houses of Parliament in those different countries were accommodated. No doubt a considerable expense was thus incurred by the direction of a body which represented the House of Commons; and although it had not led to the creation of a new building, he had never yet heard any blame attached to any members of the Committee. To say that Mr. Barry was responsible in any degree for the plans which he prepared at the instance of the Committee, was to shift the responsibility from the Committee to the shoulders of the gentleman whose reputation the First Commissioner had done his best to destroy. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Hampshire had sufficiently disposed of the charge made with respect to the crypt under this building by saying that he was responsible for recommending to the House the expenditure incurred in the completion of the beautiful work with which his name would be associated in time to come; and, although we could not quarrel on the score of taste with any views the First Commissioner might profess to entertain, he must protest against the singular injustice of imputing any blame to Mr. Barry for a work which was carried out with the full assent of the House, and against the Votes for which, so far as he remembered, there was no division. If the chapel, being complete, remained useless, whose fault was that? It remained for the Government to communicate with the ecclesiastical authorities, and to say that the chapel should be used. If the Prime Minister thought fit to take the necessary steps, the building could at once be devoted to the ordinary purposes of a Chapel Royal. Neither with respect to the plans for the new Houses of Parliament nor with respect to St. Stephen's Crypt could any blame be legitimately placed on Mr. Barry's shoulders. And with regard to this being an unnecessary and foolish expenditure on the Chapel Royal, he would beg the right hon. Gentleman, when he next visited his constituents in the Tower Hamlets, to see what had been done by a far less august personage than any First Commissioner, in the way of restoring—or, as the right hon. Gentleman would call it, bedizening—that beautiful specimen of ancient architecture in the heart of the City (Crosby Hall). He could only express his conviction that during the whole of the time that Mr. Barry had any connection with that great building, Mr. Barry never did anything to justify the violent censures which the right hon. Gentleman had bestowed upon him. He believed that Mr. Barry was not only a man of the highest professional merit, but also a man of extreme probity, who could not help feeling indignation and surprise at the constant attempts of the right hon. Gentleman to run down his character, and throw upon him the responsibility which every Government that had employed Mr. Barry ought to be forward in taking upon themselves. He (Lord John Manners), for one, would never consent, so far as he was concerned, to transfer responsibility from his shoulders to Mr. Barry. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to have said that Mr. Barry had such an influence over him and over the Prime Minister, as the case might be, that as long as he was employed in the public service there could be no security whatever against a perpetual recurrence of enormous charges. He (Lord John Manners), on the contrary, said that the First Commissioner and Her Majesty's Government were responsible for everything that Mr. Barry was asked to carry out.

Mr. Beresford Hope

MR. MELLY said, he thought the First Commissioner was entitled to thanks for the manner in which he discharged the duties of his office and restricted the expenses of the Government. There was nothing in the world so disagreeable as attempting to spare the money raised from ratepayers or taxpayers. If they attempted any economy they trod upon the toes of somebody who had friends, and those friends made a clamour in the House. He was not learned in architecture; but he had read this correspondence as carefully as any man in the House, and he maintained that, looking at the difficulties in which the First Commissioner was placed, the right hon. Gentleman acted most wisely in putting a stop to perpetual expenditure upon that magnificent building.

MR. AYRTON said, he did not want to prolong this discussion, which was really quite foreign to the subject before the Committee; but if had fallen into any error in quoting the statement of a right rev. Prelate he wished to correct it. Having no personal knowledge of the subject when the statement was made, he inquired at the Office of Works what the expenditure had actually been. The reply he received was that the accounts were so rendered that they could not tell; and as he saw no contradiction by Mr. Barry of the very responsible statement made in the other House, he supposed it to be correct. He did not know now what the expense had amounted to; but if the right hon. Gentleman (Mr.

Cowper-Temple) assured him that he had committed a gross exaggeration, he withdrew it, and regretted having adopted it. He perfectly recollected having seen, after the fire at the Houses of Parliament, the vault which had been mentioned. [Mr. BERESFORD HOPE: The chapel.] The hon. Gentleman called it a chapel. [Mr. BERESFORD HOPE: It is one.] Perhaps he did not recognize the Reformation in this country. He would say that it was an innovation and not a Conservative proceeding—that it was the proceeding of the Radical mob of that day. He (Mr. Ayrton) did recognize the Reformation; and after the Reformation the vault was used as a coal cellar and lumber room until it was converted to the purpose of a dining room to be used in the dark by the Speaker, and he recollected it being so used. He recollected its condition perfectly well, and had no hesitation in saying it was not necessary to spend a shilling on that vault. When it was used as a coal and lumber room it was very much in the condition it was left in at the time of the Reformation, because it had been before the Reformation used not as a Chapel Royal, but as a mortuary chapel for masses for persons who had been connected with the Court and St. Stephen's Monastery. That was the purpose for which it was intended. The Reformation did not recognize the continuance of those things, and it then became a coal cellar and a vault; it had been a vault ever since, and it was a vault now. It was not a chapel, and no one had a right to say it was one.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE said, he had understood the right hon. Gentleman to say, in the first instance, that £30,000 had been spent in bedizening the vault. [Mr. AYRTON: No.] £30,000 was spent, not in decorating, but in re-constructing the building. The right hon. Gentleman, in order to show his Protestantism, called this a vault, but he did not see the connection between Protestantism and the calling of an ancient chapel by bad names. It had no historical name but St. Stephen's Crypt, and it had been so known to all persons who had an interest in architecture and archæology. The fire had injured its supports, and a very heavy expenditure was necessary to remove the results of the fire. It was necessary to put new stone throughout the whole of the interior. He presumed that when the right hon. Gentleman spoke of "bedizening" he meant the decorations of the building, which had cost £600. In reply to the hon. Baronet the Member for Reading (Sir Francis Goldsmid), he had merely to say that there was no dilemma in regard to the position of those who complained of Mr. Barry's dismissal. The agreement was that so long as Mr. Barry was employed as the architect he should be entitled to those payments to which architects generally were entitled according to the custom of the profession, and therefore he had a right to charge for any drawings or plans that were not executed. So long as he was dealing with the subject Mr. Barry did not charge anything for works that were not executed; but when he was removed altogether from his position as architect to the Houses of Parliament he was no longer able to exercise that liberal habit which he had formed, because he was afraid that the First Commissioner of Works would turn round upon him and say—"These are not your drawings and plans that I have adopted." Mr. Barry sent in the charge he was legally entitled to in order to make it clear that the plan which was pirated by the First Commissioner of Works was his plan.

Mr. Ayrton

MR. AYRTON, with reference to the word "Vault" which he had used, said that before the Reformation the building was called "St. Mary's in the Vault," and after the Reformation "St. Mary's" was taken off and the "Vault" remained without her.

MR. DILLWYN said, it was quite clear that the Chief Commissioner was right in saying that this very useless restoration had cost the country something like £30,000. This restoration might be very artistic and very pleasant to gentlemen who had tastes in that line; but he doubted very much whether the country would be pleased with this expenditure. He felt very much indebted to the Chief Commissioner for the way in which he had performed the duties of his office. He did not understand the Chief Commissioner to say that Mr. Barry had cost the country £100,000; but that he made suggestions the carrying out of which would have cost the country £100,000. What had the right hon. Gentleman done? He had got back from Mr. Barry the plans for which the country had paid, and the House of Commons had now the control of the expenditure. As a Member of the House of Commons he felt grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for the manner in which he had conducted the Office of Works. The right hon. Gentleman had had a very unpleasant task in dealing with Mr. Barry, and had not, perhaps, done it in the most pleasant way; but his right hon. Friend had acted in a business-like manner, and without, as he thought, any want of courtesy to Mr. Barry.

EARL PERCY called attention to the remarks of the First Commissioner of Works in reference to the chapel. The right hon. Gentleman, in the first place, had stated that the chapel had nothing to do with Protestantism—a remark which came with bad grace from one who had some Dissenters at his back; in the second place, that one of the acts of the Reformers which was to be looked upon with the greatest pride was the turning of a chapel into a coal cellar; and, thirdly, when a chapel had been converted into a coal cellar that nothing could restore it to its former condition. He had always heard the contrary proposition affirmed, that when once a building was used for a sacred purpose, its sacred character could not be destroyed. He had never heard that the fact of a chapel having been converted into a coal cellar took away its original character.

COLONEL SYKES bore his testimony to the success with which his right hon. Friend had reduced his economical principles to practice.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he wished to say a word on behalf of national monuments. He was a strict economist; but that was not economy but scandalous parsimony which grudged what was necessary to support our national monuments, or to restore such a structure as that below the House to as splendid a condition as it was in the power of this great nation to do. He wished hon. Gentlemen who grudged the expenditure could witness the enjoyment that the crypt afforded to the thousands of working men that walked through it. It gave them some idea of beauty and the history of the past. He was most thankful for what had been spent this year on the collection of pictures of "the Peel Gallery," and he hoped in future, when they were wasting money by millions, they would not grudge £110,000 a-year to give something to art and beauty for our noble working people of the dingy towns of England.

MR. MUNTZ said, the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken must have just come into the House, or else he would have known that they were not discussing the question of the crypt. [MR. BERESFORD HOPE: The First Commissioner dragged it in.] The fact was, a personal attack had been made on the First Commissioner, who had only defended himself. The crypt was, no doubt, a beautiful ornament; but for years and years it had been a coal cellar. They were not, however, discussing that matter now. He was not going to say a word about Mr. Barry, except this—that two years ago, when Mr. Layard, our Minister at Madrid, came to ask for some £5,000 for the frescoes in the great Hall, there was a great outcry about the waste of money and the spending of money without the consent of Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman defended himself by saying that the work was carried out before he was aware, and that £50,000 or £60,000 more would be required. There had been a constant system of extravagance for several years in these matters; but his right hon. Friend had had the courage to stop this useless waste.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, this debate was an illustration of the great inconvenience which arose from the use of unguarded language with respect to any gentleman. The item for the police of the House was put down at £2,048; but then the Metropolis was rated to something like £4,000 a-year in addition, on the plea that the increased duty of the police in consequence of the visits of the inhabitants of the Metropolis to that House ought to be paid for by the Metropolis. But, in his opinion, it was not the inhabitants of the Metropolis who visited the Houses of Parliament so much as the constituents of hon. Members from the country. That House did not contribute a single farthing to the increased rates of the Metropolis, and it was not fair that a charge of £4,000 should be imposed on the Metropolis to pay for the watching of the Houses of Parliament. He begged to express his concurrence with what had fallen from the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) as to the importance of having pure and high examples of works of art for the instruction and delight of the people, and he was sure that House would never grudge the cost that might be necessary.

LORD JOHN MANNERS, with reference to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz), said, that his recollection was that Mr. Layard, having a great appreciation of the beauty of mosaic works in Venice, had himself originated the idea of filling the vacant spaces with those works. Mr. Barry had nothing to do but to carry out Mr. Layard's instructions. It was quite true that the work was ordered without having been submitted to the Committee of Supply; but Mr. Barry was acting under Mr. Layard's directions.

MR. MUNTZ said, that Mr. Layard had certainly made the statement that the work was done in accordance with the suggestion of Mr. Barry.

MR. BOUVERIE said, that one of the recent small changes that had been made in the House was to render the two front benches extremely comfortable. Now, it would be well worth the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman whether something might not be done in the same way to promote the comfort of hon. Members who did not sit on the two front benches.

MR. A. GUEST said, that the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) had fallen into an error with respect to the cost of the decoration of the great Hall. About £3,000 had been spent upon it, and he believed £8,000 was the total estimate for its decoration. He was very glad the Hall had not been finished, looking to the specimen of architecture which had been obtained by the First Commissioner.

MR. MACFIE suggested some alterations on the gangway of the House; he thought also there should be some place where Members who had clerks could write. He was also of opinion that the right hon. Gentleman would be able to introduce some improvements with regard to the accommodation for Parliamentary Papers, if he would look at the arrangements in the other House. The right hon. Gentleman was entitled also to a vote of thanks for the improvements he had effected in the Ladies' Gallery, the tea room and dining room, and the excellent room provided for meeting their constituents.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, it was new to him to hear of an hon. Gentleman coming to the House with a private secretary, and he would just as soon think of keeping a pipe in the House. What was required for the real comfort of the House, when hon. Gentlemen were unfortunate enough to have to dine there, was to recur to the custom of their forefathers, and have some place where they could keep a gridiron, and eat a good beefsteak, and drink half-a-pint of good port wine. He hoped, therefore, that, for the sake of those who had been inhaling indifferent air for a considerable number of hours, the right hon. Gentleman, in considering the comforts and amenities of the House, would not forget the gridiron.

LORD ELCHO desired to put a question with reference to the grass plots outside the House, or rather to what might be put on them. Last year, or the year before, there was some plan in contemplation for placing the statues of eminent statesmen on that portion of the precincts of the House. One of those statues was that of the late Sir Robert Peel; and he did not know whether it was intended to libel the memory of that distinguished statesman by erecting near the spot where his celebrity had been achieved so villanous a resemblance of him. But, be that as it might, the statue was taken down and relegated, perhaps, to that very vault the Committee had just been discussing. It was, however, rumoured that, instead of being dealt with as it ought to be and returned to the smelting pot, it was to be re-erected in a form which had been already condemned by public opinion, and was to be followed by a statue equally bad of Lord Palmerston. If that were, so he must enter his protest against any such course being adopted.

MR. AYRTON said, the way in which those works of art were spoken of by the noble Lord was by no means complimentary to the artists. The subject was under consideration, and no conclusion would be arrived at with respect to the statues without communication with the House.

Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) £60,500, to complete the sum for the New Offices in Downing Street.

(3.) £1,150, to complete the sum for the Chapter House, Westminster.

(4.) £11,083, to complete the sum for Sheriff Court Houses, Scotland.

MR. DYCE NICOL said, he thought that the Committee should have some information as to the proposed Vote of £4,000 for the Court House at Aberdeen; there had been Votes already for the same purpose: in 1869-71, £10,000; 1870-1, £3,000; and now, £4,000—£17,000; a sum which required explanation. The Treasury, by the Act, were empowered to contribute one-half the cost of the Court Houses, subject to approval of the plans and estimates; and he (Mr. Dyce Nicol) desired to know what control had been exercised by the Government Surveyor of Works in Scotland over the Aberdeen Court House; and whether the original Estimate of £22,654 had been exceeded. Much dissatisfaction was felt by the ratepayers in the county of Aberdeen on the subject of the cost of this building; as to the taste displayed on which he would say nothing in presence of the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes); but he must say it was inconsistent with the character of the other buildings in that fine street in which the Court House was situated. He (Mr. Dyce Nicol) trusted that the Chief Commissioner of Works would direct his vigilant eye to what he fancied was a lavish expenditure of money, and prevent the recurrence of such in the other Court Houses of Scotland, included in the Vote now before the Committee.

MR. CANDLISH wished for some explanation in reference to the matter. He also desired to know whether the works at Stirling were new works?

MR. AYRTON said, that the Government, having agreed to pay half the expense of erecting these new Courts, were, of course, obliged now to perform the agreement. No doubt the Government had trusted to the well known economy of the Scotch in administering their local affairs; but he was afraid that in this case there had been a little more magnificence indulged in than would have been the case if the whole cost had fallen upon local funds instead of half on the Imperial Treasury. The arrangement was that the whole expense should be £25,602; and £17,000 had been voted up to this time. The expenditure up to this time had been £11,000, and this was the actual sum that had been handed over to the local authorities.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, that half the expense of building Scotch Courts was borne by the Government; in England, the whole expense was so borne; whilst in Ireland the whole cost was paid out of the county rate. He did not think this was a fair arrangement.

COLONEL SYKES said, the hon. Member (Mr. Dyce Nicol) had been a little premature. The local authorities at Aberdeen had done more than they were bound to do, and had received less than they were entitled to.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, the works in Aberdeen were carried on at a disadvantage, because the Government doled out the money in such small quantities that the works could not be quickly proceeded with.

MR. M'LAREN explained that in these Courts, in Scotland, was transacted a great part of the criminal business of that country, and therefore it was but fair that they should be paid for out of the public purse.

MR. OSBORNE replied that the Irish County Courts were just in the same position as regarded their jurisdiction; but that the Scotch, being a "cuter" and more acquisitive people than the Irish, got half the cost of their Courts out of Imperial funds.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £20,500, to complete the sum for the National Gallery Enlargement.

MR. W. H. GREGORY asked the First Commissioner of Works whether the plans for the work were completed; and, if so, whether tenders for laying the foundations would as soon as possible be issued? It was most desirable that it should be proceeded with at once, as since the acquisition of the Peel Collection the congestion at the National Gallery was so great that it was difficult to know where any additional pictures were to be put.

MR. AYRTON said, that the work of clearing the ground had been going on, so that no time had been lost. There had been a good deal of discussion as to the building; but the whole matter was now settled with the exception of a single point, which would probably be disposed of in two or three days. Immediately this was disposed of the tenders would be asked for.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) £15,500, to complete the sum for Glasgow University Buildings.

(7.) £9,000, to complete the sum for the Industrial Museum, Edinburgh.

(8.) £30,500, to complete the sum for Burlington House.

(9.) £123,995, to complete the sum for the Post Office and Inland Revenue Buildings.

(10.) £3,970, to complete the sum for the British Museum Buildings.

(11.) £36,460, to complete the sum for County Courts, Buildings.

(12.) £42,547, to complete the sum for the Science and Art Department Buildings.

MR. BOUVERIE said, that not long ago a lecture was advertised to be delivered in the lecture-room of the Geological Museum, and for admission money was charged, which was to be paid, not to the public account, but to private individuals, who made use of the lecture-room for the occasion. He doubted whether that was a proper appropriation of the lecture-room, and he desired to know by whose authority permission was given for such a use of it?

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he thought that there should be a model exhibition, showing the whole of the works that were to be carried out, so that they might see all that was intended to be done.

MR. BOWRING wished to know whether the building would be completed next year?

MR. AYRTON said, he had only to do with the structure of the building, and had nothing to do with the manner in which it was employed. That was a matter which rested with the Vice President of the Council. A model was exhibited, showing the whole of the design of Captain Fowke; and the particular part of the building for which this Vote was required, and which would cost £195,000, was shown upon the model.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE asked whether the Government intended to proceed with the remainder of the South Kensington buildings; and, if so, when it was supposed that the whole would be completed?

Mr. Ayrton

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Government were not pledged to any further expenditure than the £195,000 in this Estimate. Before any fresh expenditure was undertaken the consent of Parliament would certainly be obtained.

MR. DILLWYN called attention to the fact that in this Estimate as much as £13,000 was asked for decorations of the building now in progress; he wished to know of what use it would be when finished?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, this Estimate was the result of an arrangement made in 1866, when the present First Lord of the Treasury was Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Government had no choice but to complete the building. It was quite true that there was great difficulty in saying of what good such a building could be in South Kensington, where so many departments were growing up. All he could say was that the present buildings would be completed for £195,000, and the Government would be very careful before they entered into any fresh plans.

MR. DILLWYN said, he hoped the Chief Commissioner would check expenditure on the buildings at South Kensington as successfully as he had done on the House of Parliament.

MR. W. H. SMITH ventured to hope that no further buildings would be proceeded with at South Kensington without great consideration. The situation at South Kensington was not the very best that could be selected for the inhabitants of the Metropolis, or for those persons who were desirous of visiting the national collections. It was, in his mind, a misfortune that they should be placed practically beyond the reach of a large portion of the Metropolis. He regretted to find that the Natural History Collection was to be removed to South Kensington, instead of being placed somewhere in the centre of the Metropolis.

MR. M'LAREN said, he thought the sum of £13,000 was much too large a sum for the decoration of these buildings.

MR. AYRTON observed, that the decorations in question were part of the original structural plans of the building, and necessary to its completion; but strict directions had been given to the architect that these decorations should not be of such a character as to be made the foundation of new demands.

COLONEL SYKES believed that the workmen who visited Kensington in their thousands received the most valuable and interesting information from the various objects which they witnessed.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH was of opinion that no establishment was more highly appreciated, or was productive of greater good than that at South Kensington. But all such establishments had a tendency to overgrow their reasonable limits. Many visitors complained of being bewildered by the immense number of new articles that were added from year to year. He hoped that the Government would place some limit to the expenditure of the money placed at the disposal of the authorities for the purchase of new objects.

MR. W. H. GREGORY said, he thought it of great importance that the buildings should be speedily completed, so that each collection might be seen as a whole. They were now shifted to and fro and in such great confusion that they served rather to bewilder than to amuse or instruct. Under the circumstances, he thought the sum laid out for decoration was by no means extravagant, considering the materials used and the extent of the buildings. The amount expended annually in purchases was very small indeed, and it was the last item he should be disposed to quarrel about. He hoped to be able hereafter to persuade hon. Members, in the terms of the Notice he had given, that it was absolutely necessary to have an inquiry with respect to these multifarious and incongruous collections, and to separate those that were for circulation from those that were for exhibition, while he was sure there were many specimens fit for neither purpose.

MR. OSBORNE: I have from the first and over and over again protested against the founding of these buildings at South Kensington, and I have now heard a condemnation of them in the expressions which have fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It is all very well to say that these places are for the instruction and amusement of the poorer classes. I am ready to vote moderate sums for that object; but when you come to an item of £13,000 for the decoration of these galleries, I say it is simply shameful and monstrous. What is the present state of these galleries? The most important of them is nothing more nor less than a foundling hospital for the reception of pictures of a doubtful pedigree. The truth is, everything is sent up there which nobody else will have. There are certain persons there who, under the plea of teaching their fellow-countrymen, are making very snug berths for themselves. I look with horror upon a gentleman who, in the plenitude of patriotism, leaves a collection of pictures to the nation, because I know well what the consequence will be. This House will be called upon to vote sums of money for the reception of them. Look at the Museum. I cannot understand why there should be a School of Naval Architecture at South Kensington. I should have thought that the proper place for it would have been Portsmouth, or Plymouth, or some of those places—[Alderman Sir DAVID SALOMONS: Or Greenwich.]—or Greenwich, which is so efficiently represented in this House by the worthy Alderman—and who, I beg to remark, whenever the interests of Greenwich are brought forward, is the only Member who speaks for those interests. I have no objection to a School of Naval Architecture at Greenwich; but it can hardly be called a seaport town. We are running into great expense with the South Kensington Museum, and if we are to listen to every man of taste who gets up, there will be no end to these Votes. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. W. H. Gregory) is, no doubt, a man of taste; let me commend to him two lines of Pope—

“What brought Sir Visto's well-got wealth to waste?”

Some demon whispered, ‘Visto, have a taste.’”

We have got that taste, and we are paying for it. Money is being voted year by year, and before we have done it will amount to a million. Remember that the Estimate for this building was £750,000, and the cost upwards of £3,500,000. I am sure that from what the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said that he feels the time has come when a stop must be put to this profligate expenditure of money furnished by the nation; and the sooner it is done the more it will be to the credit of this House.

Vote agreed to.

(13.) £97,200, to complete the sum for Surveys of the United Kingdom, &c.

(14.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £52,470, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for constructing certain Harbours, &c. under the Board of Trade."

MR. G. BENTINCK said, there were not to be found on record more marvellous monuments of human folly than some of the items in this Vote. The first three were called, or rather mis-called, Dover, Alderney, and Holyhead. As far as Dover was concerned it was a complete waste of money. When the first Vote was taken for this harbour his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) made a calculation, wherein he estimated the ultimate cost for the first plan proposed would be £8,000,000, and that at the rate they were then proceeding it would take 200 years to complete the harbour. The scheme was afterwards modified, and the harbour was only useful to allow the packets from France to land their passengers at all times of the tide. As to Alderney, it was, perhaps, the worst case of all. It was nothing but a nest of rocks. It was not a harbour of refuge or a harbour of shelter. No seaman would take his vessel into Alderney except in very fine weather. So far from it being a harbour of refuge it was one of the most dangerous places in which a vessel could be placed. The original plan was extremely defective. To improve it an additional pier was run out, but in such a manner that it made the harbour worse than it was before. There was no trade with Alderney, and any vessel which went in under certain circumstances must expect to be lost. The money that had been expended had been an utter loss. Holyhead was an excellent harbour so far as it went; but it was another proof of the penny-wise and pound-foolish system on which our public works were undertaken, because it was found too small for the purposes required, and they did there, as was done at Alderney, run out a pier in the wrong direction, and made the harbour less beneficial than it was before. He begged to move, in order to bring the matter to a test, the omission of the sum of £21,483 for Alderney Harbour.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE seconded the Motion. In 1862, when these works were first proposed, he divided the House against them. The works were of the most appalling nature, and were avoided by every class of ships. There were the most violent and uncertain currents running in all directions—such as the Race of Alderney and the Race of Sark. The money might as well be thrown into the sea, for the end of the pier was 132 feet from high-water mark, and, that being so, it might be easily understood what the base of the structure must be when operated upon by the most violent currents and an ocean swell. Voting money year after year upon this preposterous scheme was nothing but an act of perfect fatuity. It was strange that those who did so should this year have rejected a Vote for a harbour at Filey Bay, which he regarded as a matter of the highest importance.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £21,483, for Alderney Harbour, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Bentinck.)

MR. BAXTER said, he agreed with almost every word that had fallen from the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. G. Bentinck) on this subject. It was totally impossible for anyone acquainted with the facts of the case to say a word in defence of one of the most gigantic follies of any nation. But they were in a fair way of having done with it. He hoped next year would be the last when that House would be asked to vote any money for Dover Harbour. The Committee was asked on the present occasion to vote the last sum of money for the completion of the works at Holyhead, and this would be the last year for voting any sum, however small, for Portpatrick. The Committee might recollect that last year, in consequence of a tremendous storm, the works at Alderney had been so shattered as to be almost destroyed, and it had been found necessary to send over Mr. Hawkshaw and others to examine the works. Mr. Hawkshaw had reported that it would take £250,000 to complete the breakwater; but that would be nearly the end of the expense. If we were to retain the harbour of Alderney, we must erect works to defend it, and he could not see the end of the expenditure if we were to embark on such a course. He hoped in a very few months the full Report would be received, and it would be then for Her Majesty's Government to decide whether or not the House of Commons was to be asked for a further large sum to complete the works, or whether the wiser course was to be taken of abandoning those works altogether. He hoped, under the circumstances, the hon. Gentleman would not think it necessary to divide the Committee. He would undertake, on the part of the Government, that there should be no attempt to spend any more money until the House had full opportunity of expressing an opinion on the subject.

MR. LIDDELL asked, why there was £21,000 to be spent on the works this year? Why not put a stop at once to what was admitted to be a wasteful expenditure?

MR. BAXTER said, that Mr. Hawkshaw had reported it would be absolutely necessary to spend £21,900 in repairing the actual damage caused by the storm.

MR. CANDLISH said, he was gratified at hearing the speech of the Secretary of the Treasury; but the thing to be regretted was that we should spend upwards of £21,000 more on these works. He trusted the hon. Gentleman would agree to the Amendment of the hon. Member for West Norfolk. He pointed out the instances in which the Estimates had been increased, and in some cases doubled.

COLONEL SYKES observed, that there was reason to believe that the foundations were slipping into the sea. He thought it would be useless to wait for the Report of Mr. Hawkshaw, if after the expenditure of this money the harbour could never be used.

MR. HERMON said, he hoped the Government would not proceed with this Vote, but take a commercial view of the matter, and strike it out.

MR. RYLANDS said, he thought the Committee would not be justified in passing a Vote for a work which was generally admitted to be useless.

MR. G. BENTINCK, after hearing the admission of the Secretary to the Treasury, was surprised that he should defend a Vote of £21,000 for works which were in an insecure state. He would take the opinion of the Committee on the subject.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he thought that if the harbour would be useless it should be abandoned at once.

MR. BOUVERIE said, the public had embarked on this expenditure after great consideration had been given to it by those who were most competent to form an opinion on what was thought to be a great public object. After having spent so much money he questioned whether the House of Commons ought to withhold this Vote, because to refrain now from expenditure might be fatal to the whole outlay. As a matter of prudence they ought not to risk so much.

MR. HUNT said, he thought it odd that the Government should ask the Committee to spend so much money while they were waiting for a Report, in order to consider whether the works should be continued or abandoned. It would be fair for the Committee to say that they would not spend any more money until the Government had come to some determination. When they had done so they could ask the House for a further Vote of money.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that great injury had been done to the works at Alderney by the storms in the winter of 1869, and they were now in a deplorable condition. It was easy to say that the works could be abandoned; but a great danger had been created, and if the breakwater were left in its present condition that danger might be increased. Of this Vote, £10,000 was required to enable Mr. Hawkshaw and others to report upon the works, and that they could not do without experiments that would last 18 months. He could not exactly say what was going on now; but it might be rash to suddenly stop all expenditure. He thought the better course would be to allow the Vote to stand over for the present.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he thought it would be much better to settle the matter at once.

Question put, and agreed to.

Original Question, as amended, proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £30,993, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for constructing certain Harbours, &c. under the Board of Trade."

MR. HERMON moved to reduce the Vote further by the sum of £1,815, being the annual charges on the Works Department at Holyhead.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £1,815, for the Works Department, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Hermon.)

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he thought it impossible to do without this Vote, owing to the engagements that had been entered into.

MR. BAXTER said, he hoped the hon. Member would not divide the Committee.

MR. HERMON said, he would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE regretted that the harbour at Portpatrick had been given up, the harbour being one of great national importance.

MR. BOUVERIE trusted that the Government would further consider the matter before they finally determined to sacrifice the million and a-half of money that had been sunk in Alderney Harbour.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the Government intended to review the position of affairs with regard to that harbour before they finally abandoned it.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

(15.) £450, to complete the sum for Portland Harbour.

(16.) £7,500, to complete the sum for the Fire Brigade (Metropolis).

(17.) £27,223, to complete the sum for Rates on Government Property.

MR. CANDLISH said, that this was an instance of the way in which large sums of public money were voted without there being any legal obligation on the part of the Government to pay. Contributions in lieu of rates were not legal payments, and, therefore, he moved that the Vote be omitted.

MR. GLADSTONE admitted that much might have been said in favour of the hon. Member's Motion had it been made at the time when the practice of the Government making voluntary contributions instead of paying rates was originally commenced; but as the whole subject of these exemptions had been at last systematically considered, and as the Government now believed themselves to be in a position to ask Parliament to legislate definitively with respect to them, he thought it would be as well if the hon. Member did not press his Amendment, the more especially as in all probability this would be the last occasion on which Parliament would be asked to vote money for this purpose.

MR. BOUVERIE defended the Vote on the ground that in many small parishes the greater portion of the rateable property was in the hands of the Government, who were bound to contribute towards the rates. It would be impossible for a rate collector to assess the amount at which a public building should be rated, and the parishes which contained public buildings would have a right to complain if this Vote were omitted.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH pointed out that in several Acts of late years it had been practically admitted that the exemptions of public property from rates ought to be abolished. How was it possible for a rate collector to estimate the annual rateable value of that House?

MR. M'LAREN reminded the Committee that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty had brought in a Bill under which all Government property throughout the kingdom would be rated. If that Bill passed it would be unnecessary for this Vote to be placed upon the Estimates again. The effect of the existence of large public buildings in a parish was to increase the value of the surrounding property. He trusted that the hon. Member would be wise enough not to press his Motion.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, that a Committee had years ago reported in favour of a Bill being brought in on the rating of Government property, and he trusted that another Session would not be allowed to go by without such a measure being introduced. The subject ought to be dealt with by itself, and not made a component part of a large measure, embracing many other matters which might or might not be carried.

MR. RYLANDS pointed out the staff appointed for collecting the contributions in lieu of rates for Government property cost £715 per year for salaries and £200 for travelling expenses. He did not think the duties were sufficient to warrant such an expenditure.

MR. CANDLISH, after what had fallen from the First Minister, did not press his opposition to the Vote.

Vote agreed to.

(18.) £122,465, to complete the sum for Public Buildings (Ireland).

(19.) £3,976, to complete the sum for the Ulster Canal.

(20.) £13,810, to complete the sum for Lighthouses Abroad.

(21.) £800, to complete the sum for the Embassy Houses, Paris and Madrid.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN asked, if any estimate had been made of the expense which had been incurred in consequence of the damage done to the Embassy house in Paris?

MR. AYRTON said, no Report had yet been received on the subject; but if it should be found on a thorough survey being made, that any large expenditure would be required, it would be necessary hereafter to bring that circumstance under the consideration of the House. The present Vote would only cover the ordinary expenses for repairs.

Vote agreed to.

(22.) £36,215, to complete the sum for British Consulate and Embassy Houses, Constantinople, China, Japan, and Tehran.

In answer to Mr. BOWRING,

MR. AYRTON said, Reports on this expenditure had been received from abroad, and carefully examined before the amounts were passed. With regard to the Consular house in Japan, the works there had been carried out according to a scheme described in a Report laid on the Table of the House from time to time by an officer sent out to investigate the subject. Nothing would be done without full consideration both at home and abroad of what was necessary to carry on the public service.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £257,972, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1872, for Superannuation and Retired Allowances to Persons formerly employed in the Public Service."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(23.) £34,910, to complete the sum for the Merchant Seamen's Fund.

(24.) £27,200, to complete the sum for Relief of Distressed Seamen Abroad.

(25.) £14,533, to complete the sum for Hospitals in Ireland.

(26.) £4,863, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Charitable Allowances (Great Britain).

(27.) £4,735, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Charitable Allowances (Ireland).

(28.) £10,942, to complete the sum for Temporary Commissions.

(29.) £35,147, to complete the sum for Payments under Treaties of Reciprocity.

(30.) £650, to complete the sum for Flax Cultivation in Ireland.

(31.) £3,245, to complete the sum for certain Miscellaneous Expenses.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow;
Committee to sit again To-morrow.

It being now Seven of the clock, the House suspended its sitting.

The House resumed its sitting at Nine of the clock.

PRIVATE BILL LEGISLATION.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. PIM, in rising to move for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the present system of legislation in regard to Local and Personal Bills, said, the subject to which he asked the attention of the House was one of great interest and importance. It was not a local but an Imperial question—the grievance was universal; though it was more severely felt in Ireland than in England or Scotland, owing to the greater distance, and the complete separation by the sea; and also because Ireland was comparatively much poorer than Great Britain. That grievance was, firstly, the increased expense of a contest conducted at a distance from the place where the parties interested resided. As an illustration he would read from a letter of Mr. Fitzgerald, an eminent solicitor of Dublin, and brother of Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, who stated that the total expense of the Dublin Main Drainage Bill would not be under £15,000; there were also the Alliance Gas Bill, the Newry Waterworks Bill, the Dublin Tramways Bill, all of which had occupied the time of the Legislature at a vast expense, and all of which could have been heard before a Judge in Dublin at one-tenth of the cost, and with no loss of time. These observations referred only to a contested Bill; but even when there was no opposition, a prima facie case must be established, and therefore even in the case of an unopposed Bill, witnesses and other persons must attend in London. Another great objection to the present mode of procedure was the uncertainty as to the principles on which the decisions of the present tribunal were based. That was even worse than the expense of bringing witnesses from a distance, as it tended greatly to the increase of litigation, and increased the expenses of the contest. If they had a case before the Queen's Bench, and consulted a competent lawyer, he would say decidedly—"If the facts be so and so, I think you are sure of a verdict." But if they consulted a Parliamentary Agent he would probably reply—"I think your case is a fair one, but these things are always uncertain. It depends greatly on the Committee that may be appointed." Now he (Mr. Pim) certainly did not mean to attach any blame to the Committees on Private Bills. He had sat on such Committees himself, and he felt sure the Members of those Committees anxiously desired to give a fair and impartial judgment; but they were not infrequently without experience, and it was notorious that much uncertainty attached to the verdict of that tribunal, and that uncertainty necessarily led to litigation. The hon. Member then read from a speech of the Marquess of Salisbury—[3 Hansard, clxxiii. 649]—the Petition of the Associated Chambers of Commerce, in which the Petitioners, after referring at length to the great expense and uncertainty attending the carrying of Private Bills for Public Works through Parliament, concluded by saying—

"Your Petitioners respectfully submit that this evil would be best remedied by referring the evidence in support of, or in opposition to, such Bills to some permanent judicial body of competent and experienced persons, sitting in public, and who would hear and examine the same, and report thereon to each House of Parliament."

It appeared by a Return which had been laid on the Table of the House that the fees paid in that House on all local and personal and other private Bills amounted in 1869 to £23,377 7s., and in 1870 to £25,219 14s. 6d., of which latter sum England contributed £19,921 5s. 6d.,

Mr. Pim

Scotland contributed £3,228 7s. 6d., and Ireland £1,911 12s. 6d. No doubt that large sum was applied to a proper object; but what that object was he did not know. No one defended the present system as working satisfactorily; the question then was—how could the defects be cured? A Select Committee on the subject was appointed in the Session of 1863, when several suggestions were made by men of eminence who gave evidence before the Committee and others. The first of those suggestions was to substitute a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament for the separate Committees of each House. That was proposed by Lord Redesdale, and seemed to have met with some approval. Another proposition, suggested by the right hon. and gallant Member for Lancashire (Colonel Wilson Patten), was for the establishment of a distinct tribunal, external to the House, to ascertain the facts and report to Parliament. Again, it was proposed to empower the Board of Trade, under certain limitations, to issue provisional orders for all private undertakings. That proposition was supported by Mr. Booth, the Secretary of the Board of Trade, and by Earl Grey. Lastly, it was suggested that a distinct tribunal should be formed—a Court independent of Parliament in its constitution, with full power to hear and decide respecting all matters of private legislation, but whose decisions should not have legal force until confirmed by Parliament. That was the suggestion of Sir Erskine May, and a suggestion nearly the same in effect came from Mr. Richards, the counsel to the right hon. Gentleman the Speaker. The right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Lowe) was a member of the Committee, and also supported that proposition given in the proceedings, but which was not adopted by the Committee. That proposition made by Sir Erskine May, and supported by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer and others, was nearly identical with that contained in the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Tipperary (Mr. Heron), except that his hon. Friend also provided that the Court should sit in the locality to which the proposed legislation referred. All those suggestions were, however, rejected:—and a Resolution, proposed by Lord Stanley, was carried in the Committee by 7 Members against 6. Several of the witnesses before the Committee of 1863 dwelt on the supposed unwillingness of the House to part with its jurisdiction. But that could scarcely be advanced now, after the precedent set by the Election Petitions Act of 1868. That Act provided that the decision of the Court of Common Pleas should be final, and that the Report of the Judge as to corrupt practices should—

“Have the same effect, and may be dealt with in the manner, as if it were a Report of a Committee of the House of Commons appointed to try an election petition.”

It also provided that the trial should take place in the county or borough to which the case referred. The House had thus parted with its jurisdiction in the most important matter which could come before it—namely, the validity of the elections of its own Members; and it had decreed a local trial, the decision of which was final and conclusive, and on which might depend, and had depended, the disfranchising of a borough, when corruption had been proved before this new tribunal which was external to the House. The hon. Member having read extracts from the speeches of Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Gladstone during the debates on the Election Petitions Bill—[3 Hansard, exc. xcxi. xcii. xciii.]—proceeded to say that no one suggested that the change then adopted was injudicious. No one thought of proposing to bring back to the House the consideration of Election Petitions. The saving of expense under this Act was worth considering. The taxed costs of the Limerick inquiry—he spoke, of course, of the successful party, the unsuccessful settled his costs with his attorney without submitting them to taxation—was £285, which was the lowest. The highest was £1,281 15s. 4d., being the costs of the Petitioners in the case of Dublin; while the costs of the respondent to the second Petition in Dublin were taxed at £986 18s. 6d. Those were, no doubt, large sums; but the trial lasted for 11 days, and was thoroughly contested. He could not speak from personal knowledge of the costs of the trial of Election Petitions, but he thought it would be no exaggeration to estimate the probable amount in such a case at five times what the costs in Dublin actually were in 1868. That showed the great advantages of local inquiry, in regard to saving of expense; but a local inquiry was also of great importance as a means of arriving at a correct judgment respecting the matter under consideration, whether unopposed or disputed. Take the case of the Dublin railways. In the year 1865 there were five rival schemes for uniting all the Irish railways at Dublin. Two of those projects proposed a central station within the city, and two others proposed to effect the junction by lines not passing through the city itself. Each of those four had warm supporters, and, of course, warm opponents. The contest was a fierce one, lasting 23 days and costing over £50,000. At length the Committee decided in favour of the fifth project—of which he would only say that in Dublin everyone thought it so preposterous as to be unworthy of serious consideration. Of course, nothing or almost nothing had been done since, and Dublin had lost the great advantage of a central station, which we should certainly have had if either of the projects which included a central station had been chosen. He (Mr. Pim) had commenced by stating that the question was one of Imperial magnitude; but he also maintained that it affected Ireland more than any other part of the United Kingdom, because Ireland was more distant from London, and the cost of conveying witnesses to be examined was consequently greater. He wholly disavowed any desire to tinge the question with a political bias, or, as had been suggested, to take a step in the direction of a severance of the union between Ireland and Great Britain. His great object was to have a local tribunal, the decisions of which, he believed, would be generally respected, and not often impugned by the House, even though it should possess the power of setting them aside. The question had excited much interest in Ireland. He could speak as regarded his own constituents; and his hon. Friend the Member for Belfast (Mr. M'Clure) presented a Petition some time since, from the Corporation of Belfast, strongly in favour of the Bill introduced by the hon. and learned Member for Tipperary (Mr. Heron). Therefore, the Corporation of that rapidly increasing borough, which might be considered as representing the province of Ulster, was found united with the citizens of Dublin in looking for better and less expensive arrangements for private legislation. In this matter, at least, both North and South were united. He would not detain the House longer, except to thank them for the kindness with which they had listened to him. He begged to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the present system of legislation as regards Local and Personal Bills, and to consider whether means may not be devised for the improvement of such legislation."—
(Mr. Pim.)

MR. DODSON, in reply, said, that while agreeing with the spirit of much that had fallen from his hon. Friend, he differed from him with respect to the methods he proposed to adopt. No doubt a Private Bill Committee of that House was an expensive, a slow, and to a certain extent, owing to its composition, an uncertain tribunal, while to the public outside it often had the appearance of being more capricious in its decisions than it was in reality. Indeed, a Private Bill Committee was somewhat in the position of a jury without a Judge to guide them. On the other hand, these tribunals had great virtues and valuable qualifications, which in some respects rendered them singularly suitable for the peculiar kind of questions they had to deal with. The questions they had to decide were not strictly legal ones, as they frequently had to consider questions of policy, and to ascertain the balance between private disadvantages and the public good. Again such Committees were not only strictly impartial, but they were universally admitted to be so. They consisted of hon. Members who were in the greatest measure guided by the public opinion of the time in regard to the questions brought under their notice. In the case of railways, for example, public opinion had undergone a complete change during the last 25 or 30 years. Now, if questions relating to railways had been tried by a fixed and permanent legal tribunal, one of two things must have happened; either that tribunal would have adhered to settled rules and precedents, which would have become opposed to the wants or feelings of the people in less than ten years, or else it would have been characterized as a capricious tribunal. He had himself endeavoured to effect improvements in our Private Bill legislation, and he felt disposed to remit, as far as possible, the trial of all the smaller kinds of cases, which did not much depend on public opinion, to a tribunal outside the House. This had been done to a certain extent by the further extension of the system of provisional orders. Little good, he thought, would be effected by the appointment of a Select Committee to consider generally the subject of Private Bill legislation. In the last 18 or 20 years there had been no fewer than 16 Committees of the House which had investigated the subject; but most of the changes introduced during that period were due, not to the recommendations of those Committees, but to some particular case having shown the necessity of a change. Not long ago Committees of that House dealt with cases of divorce, naturalization, turnpike trusts, copyholds, and inclosures; but all these matters were banished almost entirely from the House, and remitted either to Courts of Law or to bodies of permanent Commissioners. Then, in regard to sanctioning public works, a great deal had been done in the same direction by extending the system of provisional orders. Tramways, and in some cases gasworks and waterworks, could be dealt with in the same way. The system of provisional orders, however, could only be extended gradually and tentatively; because if persons were compelled to resort in the first instance to a provisional order, the result in regard to large and strongly-contested schemes would be merely to add another inquiry to the Parliamentary inquiry. He hoped that gradually the work of the Committees might be lightened, and that persons might be enabled to obtain authority for works which they wished to undertake by a shorter process than necessarily coming to Parliament. A step in advance was taken last year, and the discussions which had recently taken place showed that that was as far as the House was disposed to go at present. An Act was passed last year to enable the Board of Trade to make provisional orders in the case of tramways authorized by the local authorities; but when the feeling on the subject became strong, persons did not rest satisfied with the preliminary decision of that Board, but insisted on coming before the House. However much he might be disposed to advance in that direction, he did not think that the present was a favourable time for doing so. The hon. Member had alluded to Ireland, and the case of Irish promoters was somewhat hard, because they were put to very considerable expense in bringing their witnesses to this country; but something might be done by means of Standing Orders and an Act of Parliament to meet their case. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had now before the House a Bill on the subject of Local Government in that country which would in some respects meet the objections that have been urged by the hon. Member, and would enable the making of provisional orders in cases where it was now necessary to apply to Parliament. Something further might be done to enable Irish promoters to obtain provisional orders by application either to the Lord Lieutenant in Council or to the Chief Secretary in the case of railways and gas or waterworks, and such a course was not adopted without precedent. But, in order to do that, it would be requisite to pass a short Act of Parliament, and not merely to have the Report of a Committee. The hon. Member for Dublin might not be aware that a Joint Committee of the Lords and Commons had been appointed in the present Parliament to consider this subject, and they had reported in August, 1869; but, as their Report had never yet been considered by the House, it would be premature at present to appoint another Committee. Under the circumstances, he hoped the hon. Member for Dublin would be satisfied with having called attention to this subject, and especially to the circumstances of Ireland and the difficulties of promoters in that country. He was disposed to consider the points which the hon. Member had brought before the House, and would be willing to do what he could to obviate the difficulty without putting Ireland in a position different to the rest of the country. No one was more sensible than he of the defects of private legislation, and no one was more anxious to remedy them; but he was convinced that it was only by proceeding gradually that the House could advance safely and satisfactorily.

Mr. Pim

MR. LEEMAN said, that during the whole of the time of this discussion there had not been enough Members present to form a House. He had, however, refrained from calling attention to the fact, being anxious that the hon. Member should have an opportunity of bringing forward this subject, and that the Chairman of Committees should be able to give the explanation which he had afforded to the House. He now thought that to continue further the discussion of a subject of this importance in a House of 30 Members would be idle and trifling, and therefore he begged to move that the House be counted.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK admitted that the Chairman of Committees had thrown a great deal of light upon the subject of the Motion, and had given them the benefit of his experience. The hon. Gentleman, however, had acknowledged that Committees were not the best tribunals that could be devised for the determination of important questions of local interest. The hon. Gentleman had compared the position of the Committees to a jury without a judge; and certainly nothing could be more unsatisfactory than such an incomplete tribunal. The practice of deciding the local affairs of distant places in London—and the observation applied to York, Edinburgh, or Aberdeen, as well as to Dublin or Cork—was unjust to those places, and to the individuals or public bodies who sought to promote local improvements there. To those whose property or interests were likely to be prejudiced by some projected scheme, the present practice was equally unjust. The expense of opposing a Private Bill in Parliament was often fully equal to the injury which a party might sustain by the Bill passing into law. Besides, the present system showed to what disadvantages these distant localities were subject compared with the Metropolis. The House had seen within the last few days a measure affecting the interests of a portion of the Metropolis re-discussed and re-opened after it had been decided by a Committee of this House; and the residents of that part of London who objected to a tramway passing before their doors had sufficient influence with hon. Members to induce the House to set aside the ruling of the Committee, and they got rid of the apprehended inconvenience of tramways in Oxford Street and the other portions of the Metropolis sought to be affected by the Bill to which he alluded. He might ask, would the opponents of local tramways in any other locality than the Metropolis have had a chance of success if they had appealed from the decision of a Committee upstairs? There was no doubt as to the ability displayed by Committees, nor of their impartiality, nor of the care they bestowed on matters referred to them; but the whole question was whether such inquiries would not be much better held in the localities to which they referred. It was obvious that the opportunities for a full and fair investigation of the merits of schemes for local improvements were considerably greater when the inquiry was held on the spot, and the expenses would be proportionally decreased. Besides, the Business of the House had greatly increased, and it was desirable to lessen the duties of hon. Members, by allowing local inquiries to be disposed of locally, so that they could devote themselves to the consideration of Imperial measures, which they were now called upon to do not only at night, but at Morning Sitzings. Nothing was more usual than for hon. Members to move the adjournment of debates on the very fair ground that they were exhausted from protracted attendance on Committees in the morning, followed by late sittings in the House during the night. Committees on public questions were necessary and incidental to the carrying on of the public affairs of the country; but private business could be better investigated, and conducted both more cheaply and expeditiously where the questions originated than under the present system. On the ground of expense, and of the inconvenience to which the public were subjected by the present system, and also from a fair regard to local interests, he trusted the Motion of his hon. Friend would receive the favourable consideration of the House.

MR. WHALLEY rose to address the House—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present—

MR. WHALLEY proceeded to address the House—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at half after
Ten o'clock.

Mr. Serjeant Sherlock

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Wednesday, 28th June, 1871.

Their Lordships met;—and having gone through the Business on the Paper, without debate—

House adjourned at Four o'clock, till
To-morrow, half past
Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 28th June, 1871.

MINUTES:—SELECT COMMITTEE—Fifth Report
—Public Accounts [No. 321].

PUBLIC BILLS—*Ordered—First Reading—*Royal Parks * [217].

Committee—Burials [7]—B.P.

*Third Reading—*Sequestration * [208], and passed.

*Withdrawn—*Registration of Deeds, Wills, &c.
(Middlesex) [36]; Railway Companies * [5]; Parish Churches [53].

REGISTRATION OF DEEDS, WILLS, &c.
(MIDDLESEX) BILL—[BILL 36.]

(Mr. George Gregory, Mr. Cubitt, Mr. Hinde Palmer, Mr. Goldney.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. G. B. GREGORY, in rising to move "That the Order for going into Committee on this Bill be discharged," said, that when he proposed the second reading of the Bill he stated that it was founded on the unanimous recommendation of a Committee which had inquired into the subject, and that the Attorney General concurred in the general object of the measure. The only opposition offered to the second reading was by the hon. and learned Member for York (Mr. Leeman) who considered that it might be adopted as a precedent, and injuriously affect the registration system of the county with which he was connected, which had worked so well. But he thought the hon. and learned Member, on examining the Bill, must be convinced that it had no such tendency. He (Mr. Gregory) intimated at the time that he did not intend to proceed further on account of the pledge given by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, that he should be prepared to legislate on the subject during the ensuing Session, and it was his intention to withdraw the Bill. He hoped that the pledge would be redeemed; but he should re-introduce the present measure next Session, and would press it forward in case the hon. and learned Gentleman was not able to provide for the same objects. He withdrew the Bill with extreme regret, because he believed it would have been a step, though a limited one, towards reforming the law of the transfer of real property. Such a subject might have been dealt with in "another place," and he thought it was a reflection on the Government that they had not given the other branch of the Legislature an opportunity of considering such a measure. He would move—That the Order of the Day for going into Committee upon the Bill be discharged.

MR. LEEMAN said, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General being absent, he wished to say a word in his defence against the complaint just made. During the last fortnight many complaints had been made on the Conservative side of the House that the Government had undertaken too many measures this Session. The Attorney General, on the second reading of the Bill, told his hon. Friend the Member for East Sussex (Mr. G. Gregory) that this subject required very great consideration, but he pledged himself to introduce, in the course of next Session, such a measure as his hon. Friend referred to. If the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had introduced that measure this Session, what chance would he have had of passing it?

MR. CUBITT said, he should regret the withdrawal of the Bill, as he believed it might have been successfully carried through Parliament if a vigorous effort had been made. He hoped, however, that such a measure would be passed next Session. He wished to point out that in connection with this registry there were three sinecure offices. One of those offices having become vacant, the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, who had the appointment in his absolute gift, had refrained from filling up the vacancy; but the public had as yet received no benefit from that, as the fees belonging to the vacated office had been divided in equal parts between the Consolidated Fund and the two gentlemen who held the other sinecures, making their already too large incomes larger by £700 a-year each. Whenever a Bill on the subject was carried successfully through the House, he hoped those gentlemen would not be entitled to claim compensation for this windfall, in addition to the compensation which they would have a right to for the loss of their own salaries.

Motion agreed to.

Order discharged: Bill withdrawn.

RAILWAY COMPANIES BILL—[Bill 5.]

(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Mr. Hinde Palmer, Mr. Rowland Winn.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [15th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time;" and which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months." —(Mr. Leeman.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that since the debate on this subject was adjourned the whole circumstances of the case had been very much altered. Many of the railway companies which were before endeavouring to do away with certain causes which led to accidents had continued in that course, and public attention having been drawn to the subject, two important matters had been very largely adopted—he referred to the use of the block system, and to interlocking signals and points. In addition to that, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had fulfilled his sort of promise to deal with one portion of the subject, by introducing another Bill which, though it scarcely went far enough, would yet form an important addition to the security of the public in railway travelling. Under these circumstances, he would now move—"That the Order for the second reading of the Bill be discharged."

MR. A. PEEL said, his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade stated when the Bill of the hon. Baronet the Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) was under discussion, that though there was much in it which he could not accept, yet there were many points of which he approved, and he had accordingly introduced a Bill to carry out the pledge which he had given. With regard to compensation for accidents, his right hon. Friend felt that it would not be advisable to fix a limit, particularly in the way proposed by the hon. Baronet, for there would be something invidious in limiting compensation according as people were first, second, or third-class passengers. His own opinion was, that the best remedy would be found in insurance. That would be the best test of the value which people put upon their lives. But though it was not possible for his right hon. Friend to agree with the scheme of compensation proposed by the hon. Baronet, he had taken into consideration the relation between masters and servants, a matter surrounded by great legal difficulties. He was hopeful that his right hon. Friend would be able at some future time to bring in a Bill which would do away with a great many of the figments of law which prevented responsibility from attaching to the right parties, and the persons injured from obtaining that compensation to which they were entitled.

MR. LEEMAN said, he was glad to hear that the Bill was to be withdrawn. For the information and satisfaction of the public at large, he begged to confirm what had been said by the hon. Baronet the Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) as to the course pursued by the leading railway companies, who had on all the crowded portions of their lines, where the block system could be of use, largely adopted it, and also the system of interlocking. That he (Mr. Leeman) considered sufficient, for it would be useless to incur the cost of applying those systems to branch and main lines, where the traffic was frequently very light. While the companies considered that the Government Bill would impose on them many onerous obligations, they were, in deference to public feeling, content with the measure, and therefore no opposition would be offered on their part to the second reading, nor any Amendments proposed to the Bill as it stood.

MR. BASS said, the railway companies owed a great debt of gratitude to the hon. Baronet the Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) for having presented them in that Bill with inducements, and, indeed, obligations, to correct their very imperfect system. Under present circumstances, the hon. Baronet had no alternative but to withdraw the Bill. For his own part, he could not express entire satisfaction with the Bill of the Board of Trade; but then it was matter for congratulation that it was the intention of the President of the Board of Trade to take into consideration some mode of bringing home to employers responsibility for injuries and deaths caused by their servants. Since that Bill had come under discussion the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Price), who was Chairman of the Midland Railway Company, had taken exception to a statement which he made about the servants of that company being overworked. His hon. Friend said there was no foundation for that statement. A subsequent conversation had led him to believe that that was a hasty expression of opinion on the part of his hon. Friend. He had desired his hon. Friend to point out a single point in which he was inaccurate, and his hon. Friend assured him that he could not. He regretted his hon. Friend was not present to acknowledge that he had not said a single word which was not fully justified.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill withdrawn.

PARISH CHURCHES BILL—[BILL 53.]
(Mr. West, Sir Percy Herbert, Mr. Hughes.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. WEST, in rising to move that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that was not in any sense a Church question exclusively. If it affected the Church it affected Nonconformists also. The object of the Bill was to prevent for the future Bishops from granting faculties for pews in parish churches. There was also a provision in the Bill conferring upon churchwardens the right from time to time of controlling the arrangements in parish churches, so as to make them more convenient to the parishioners at large who wished to attend the services of the Church of

Mr. A. Peel

England. The system of granting faculties for permanently appropriating pews was a great evil, which few would deny. Previous to the Reformation, no such thing as the appropriation of pews existed in that country, and it was not recognized by the common law of the land. But after the Reformation there were several causes which led to the pew system. The enforcement of Calvinistic doctrines had something to do with it, for Calvinistic teaching was more generally enforced by sermons than by the union of the parishioners in prayer. There were very few people except the Roman Catholics who were not members of the Church of England, but the population was scattered. Churches were numerous, and there were more sittings in the parish churches than the inhabitants of the whole country could occupy. The system of appropriating pews accordingly grew up, and it was not very extraordinary that landowners and farmers should have sittings appropriated to them at a time when there were hardly any independent workmen, for the labourers connected with the great houses were regarded as domestic servants, and were supplied with seats in the pews of their masters. After a time great coldness came over the whole worship of the Church of England, and in many parish churches there was only one service, in others there were but two. When there was but one service the evil did not appear so prominently. Then, unfortunately, the archdeacons had neglected the duty imposed on them by the law of the country, and winked at the encroachments made by the upper and middle classes upon the common law rights of the parishioners. He might congratulate the House that neither cathedrals nor collegiate churches had ever come under this system, and, therefore, he was surprised that his hon. Friend the Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley), who was connected with a place which possessed a collegiate church—he meant Manchester—should have given Notice that he would move the rejection of the Bill. It might be said that the grievance intended to be remedied by that Bill was an imaginary grievance; but that was not so, for he had been informed of a case where, in a parish of 200 inhabitants, there was a church containing 10 pews, each of which would accommodate six persons. Eight of those pews had, however, been appropriated, and only two were left for the accommodation of the parishioners generally. There were many services now held in our churches, and it was a great hardship that a person who only went to one service should be able to exclude other persons from his pew at the other services. It should also be remembered that the populations were increasing, and that there was no longer a sufficiency of room. The object of the present Bill had been approved of by a Royal Commission in 1832, and by a Committee in the House of Lords in 1858; and he believed that all that had recently happened in the Church of England tended to show the necessity for such a measure, for the very bitterness of religious controversies in the Church showed that they had arisen from a renewed intellectual life. It was that recommendation of the Committee of the House of Lords that he wished to embody in a law. He hoped the House would extend the comforts and the blessings of the Church of England services to a class of persons who were now excluded from them by the present system of keeping the pews closed. In conclusion, he begged to move that the Bill be now read the second time.

MAJOR GENERAL SIR PERCY HERBERT, in seconding the Motion, said, they were all familiar with cases in which churches were blocked up with pews, and only a very small section of the area of the church left for the congregation at large, who had to seat themselves under the galleries, near the doors, and in the least comfortable places. School children were to be found in many churches sitting on the steps of the altar, simply because the area of the church was filled with large pews, many of them unoccupied or occupied by a few individuals only. Besides that, many churches had of late years been re-appropriated after the old pews had been taken away. To his own knowledge the seats in a considerable parish church had been rendered absolutely free according to law within the last 20 years, and afterwards allotted, he believed contrary to law, by the churchwardens. The consequence was, that the seats were now as much appropriated as they had ever been under the old pew system. In a case which came under his own personal knowledge, about eight seats were allotted to the head of one family when he had six sons and daughters, and only two seats to a person lately married. The six sons and daughters had left the parish, having married and settled elsewhere, and the person to whom the eight seats were allotted still sat in the large pew, but the person who had only two seats assigned to him, and had now six or seven children, could not find a place to put them in. If such a practice affected the middle classes, how much more must it affect the poorer portion of the population. He did not wish in any way to prevent by this Bill the churchwardens from having full powers to make such regulations as might be necessary for the decent and proper conduct of divine worship. That power was especially needful in towns where the churchwardens could not award seats, and where the parishioners were often crowded out by strangers when a popular preacher performed the service. The Bill provided amply for a case of that kind. What he wished to secure was the undoubted right of the parishioners to go to their parish churches and share in the services conducted therein. To secure that end, he thought they ought to sacrifice any prejudices they might feel on the subject.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. West.)

MR. CAWLEY, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, said, that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. West) had described the Bill as relating to ancient parish churches. [Mr. West: I did not use the word "ancient."] Well, if his hon. and learned Friend did not use the word, he argued only from abuses in ancient parish churches, and expressed his astonishment that he (Mr. Cawley) should be found opposing the Bill when the church in his own parish was free in the body for the use of the parishioners at large. But it was his experience in the parish of that collegiate church which led him to take so decided an opinion in regard to that Bill, which would affect that ancient parish church not as regarded the body merely, for which there was no necessity existing, but in regard to galleries erected by subscription, the proceeds from which would be lost if that Bill passed into law. [Mr. BERESFORD HOPE: No, no; see the saving clause.] There was really nothing of the kind in it. The Bill professed to be declaratory and enacting. What was the meaning of declaratory? A declaratory Act was appropriate when a previous Act had been interpreted by the Courts of Law in a sense different from the intention of the Legislature. But if an Act was misunderstood by those whose duty it was to enforce it, then the Courts were the proper places to go to. But even supposing the law required to be altered in some respects, that Bill went entirely beyond the object. According to the interpretation clause, the word "parish" was not to mean simply the mother or ancient parish, but any separate, legally constituted ecclesiastical district. The Bill would, therefore, apply to the 70 or 80 parishes into which, for ecclesiastical purposes, the ancient parish of Manchester had been divided. And what did the Bill propose to enact in the case of the churches in those parishes, and in every ecclesiastical district throughout England and Wales? Why, that the entire area of the church, inclusive of the galleries, should be devoted to the free and equal use of all the parishioners of a parish. Now, the effect of such an enactment in the case of a large number of churches would be to leave the incumbent or the rector without any income, except such as might be voluntarily subscribed for him. Where sufficient provision was made for the clergyman he had not the slightest objection to the abolition of pew-rents; but so long as such provision was not made, and the clergyman was left dependent on the congregation, he was not prepared for their abolition. Although many believed that more would be obtained for the support of the minister in that way than there was at present, yet he had no wish to see a state of things which had been described by a Nonconformist clergyman, who spoke of himself as the dependent minister of an independent congregation. Why, he should like to know, should not parishioners who attended the parish church undertake to pay a certain sum for the support of the clergyman, just as they undertook other payments which were not enforced by law? It was a mistake to suppose that the Bill would not affect existing pew-rents, and if his hon. and learned Friend meant that it should only apply to future churches, he should withdraw it and introduce another Bill in its stead, with its object stated plainly on the face of it. His hon. and learned Friend, he might add, ought to know that in every church which was made a parish church it was not only the right, but the duty of the churchwardens to seat people in the pews, and that although there were instances in which some ill-conditioned people prevented their seats from being occupied by others, although they only partially occupied them themselves, such instances were the exception and not the rule, and churchwardens could guard against them, except where, by a faculty, the occupier of the pew had the right to lock the door. Indeed, a remedy for the state of things complained of was, he thought, to be provided rather by the effect of public opinion and the good feeling of the congregation than by any legislative measure. How, he should like to know, in parishes or large towns were the churchwardens to tell who was a parishioner and who was not? If an attractive preacher drew considerable numbers to a particular church, was the churchwarden to take his stand at the door and keep everyone out until the parishioners were all seated, or until he had ascertained that they were not coming to church? It was quite clear that unless some right were given to prevent the occupation of seats until a certain time, the real parishioners would, in the majority of cases, be excluded from their own pews. He was aware that it was said the experiment had been tried, and had been found successful. But those cases were very few. In one instance in Manchester which had been referred to, proving the success of the experiment in a pecuniary point of view, he ventured to assert that the congregation was not composed of parishioners belonging to the church, but of persons holding particular views who supported it, coming to it from surrounding parishes. His hon. and learned Friend would recollect one case which had been spoken of as a success, in which the clergyman found himself driven to such straits that he was obliged to take up his residence in the tower of his church in order that he might have no rent to pay; but, unfortunately, certain officials who were wide awake assessed the church and the tower as a dwelling-house, so that the clergyman discovered that he was in a worse position than if he had occupied a house. He now came to the 5th clause of the Bill, which provided for the equal distribution of the seats to rich and poor throughout the church. If by that it was meant that the churchwarden was to take care that rich and poor should be interspersed, was it, he would ask, so long as social distinctions continued to exist, desirable that the poor man should be reminded of them by the greater proximity in which he would be placed to his rich neighbour in the church? His hon. and learned Friend would, he thought, find that the religious poor would much prefer being able to have their own seats, where they could worship by the sides of their wives and children. He admitted nothing could be worse than placing the free seats in the worst part of the church; but he was happy to say that the practice was being discontinued. The Bill as it was brought forward, by absolutely prohibiting the taking of pew-rents in any existing church of a parish or ecclesiastical district, was totally different from the measure which his hon. and learned Friend had first advocated. It would produce a complete revolution in the state of our ecclesiastical relations, and create great confusion. When provision was made for the endowment of all churches in the land, then they might do away with pew-rents; but until then they ought not, by a violent measure such as this, to introduce a change contrary to the general feeling and the all but universal practice of the various churches of the land. Entertaining these views with respect to the Bill, he should move that it be read a second time that day three months.

Major General Sir Percy Herbert

MR. D. DALRYMPLE seconded the Amendment, on the ground that the Bill would create an amount of disturbance and inconvenience in parishes which would far exceed any benefits which it was likely to confer. The object which his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. West) had in view — that of filling their churches with all classes of people who might wish to go there to worship — was one which must, of course, commend itself to every man; but under the operations of the 5th clause, earnest, regular church-going people would not like to find the seats which they had been accustomed to occupy every Sunday morning when they went to church taken up by others, and the books of devotion which they might have left there removed elsewhere. Not desiring to encounter such a state of things once a-week, they would be put to the inconvenience of going to church a-half or a-quarter of an hour sooner in order to get their seats. He quite concurred, also, in the opinion expressed by the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Cawley), that the poor would prefer worshipping among themselves to being mixed up indiscriminately with persons who happened to be in a higher social position; and it should be borne in mind that high and low were equally worshippers wherever the seats which they occupied might be situated. Not only that, but great confusion would arise, especially in country parishes, from an alteration of the law; and, consequently, the churches would be less filled. If they desired to fill the churches, clergymen should have more regard to the character of their congregations, and not preach over the heads of the greater portion of the number.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Cawley.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he felt some difficulty with regard to the Bill, in the form in which it was presented to the House. With the principles of the Bill he had almost entire sympathy; but with its machinery he had many faults to find. The course he should adopt would depend upon whether the hon. Mover would be content, upon that stage, either to leave the Bill for the consideration of the country during the Recess, or refer it to a Select Committee; or whether he would claim to make further progress. If the hon. Mover pursued either plan, the Bill might be read a second time without the House being committed to its details, although he confessed to an aversion for purposeless second readings. A declaratory Bill such as that was generally had the effect of weakening the old common law, which it was intended to strengthen, and, therefore, he doubted whether the Bill was necessary; but as he could not vote that the principle contained in the Bill was unsound, he could not support the Amendment. He welcomed the introduction of that Bill as a proof of the growth of public opinion in the right direction. He was proud to own that he had in his youth come forward as one of the earliest opponents of the pew system, and while still an undergraduate at Cambridge had become a member of the Camden Society, which, in consequence of preaching a crusade against the abuse by word of mouth, by pamphlet, and by hand-bill, was regarded as revolutionary and dangerous. The cause which then they advocated had, in the intervening years, become so far triumphant that the statutable recognition of open seats in churches had on that afternoon become the subject of Parliamentary debate. Still, he must ask whether it would not be far better to have left the question to work itself out, with the aid of increased good feeling throughout the country? The congregational principle, in the working of town parishes, was, no doubt, absolutely necessary in the existing conditions of the Church, but it was nevertheless a new principle, and the Bill failed in adequately recognizing that novel and important element in the Church polity. Before considering the clauses of the Bill, he must say something about the objections which had been urged against its principles. He did not think much of the plea that churchwardens could not know all the parishioners, and still less of the argument rough-hewn by the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley), and elaborated by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. D. Dalrymple), with details which astonished him as proceeding from the mouth of a Gentleman of advanced Liberal opinions—that the best method of promoting humbleness of mind was to put the gentle portion of the congregation by themselves, without their being irritated by the spectacle of their poorer brethren, who, as the hon. Gentleman said, might go to the free seats and be contented. He remembered having many years ago to seek a church where his household could worship. He went to the individual who let the pews in a chapel of ease near his residence, and he said he wished to take a pew. The man produced a plan, and he selected the one nearest the pulpit and the reading desk. But, unluckily, he dropped the observation that the pew was for his servants; whereupon the man said—"You don't mean that you are taking the pew for your livery servants?" On his saying—"Yes, I am," he received the reply—"Then I cannot let it you, for if livery servants were to come to the pew, all the ladies and gentlemen in the neighbouring pews would cease to attend." He need hardly add that his most prominent feeling was regret at his unseasonable frankness. Now to come to the question, was that Bill, as it stood, one which ought to be, or which could become the law of the land? He thought it showed signs of haste in the way it had been framed—and in various places its language was ambiguous. He took exception to the 5th clause—indeed, it baffled his power of comprehension. The first portion of the clause recited that it should not be lawful for any Bishop or churchwarden to allot, assign, or appropriate any seat in parish churches, and provided that all parishioners should equally enjoy the use of the church. The first part of the clause forbade churchwardens to appropriate seats; but the latter part allowed churchwardens to direct and order the appropriation of seats by parishioners and others, so that due order and decorum should be observed. In treating that subject it was necessary to take account of that congregationalism which had, fortunately as he thought, become a portion of the Church system in our towns, in relief of that strict parochialism which was no longer applicable to their case. It must not be forgotten that, as between town and country, these were totally distinct questions. In towns the feeling of liberty in the use of the seats grew with the growth of the parish and with the development of congregationalism; but in the country there was a traditional clinging to the certain corner of the church where each person was accustomed to worship; while the necessary respect which existed between the different classes of society induced the congregation to like to see the landed proprietor in one part of the church, the doctor in another part, and so on. A clause so ambiguous as this 5th one, with its hazy distinction between appropriating and ordering, ought not to stand part of any Bill. At the same time, he must say that the hon. and learned Member for Salford ran off on a siding when he declaimed against that arrangement which placed men on one side of a church and women on the other. He (Mr. Beresford Hope) wished to point out that that division of the sexes was not a modern innovation. It was the custom in many of the old parish churches in England, and had been the custom from time immemorial, and it had only been re-adopted in new churches because it was found consonant with the feelings of worship. It was, however, foolish of any clergyman to try to force on the custom where it was not liked. There were two churches in different counties with which he was connected—in one the division of the sexes was observed, and in the other it was not, in each case with the goodwill of the parish; and he followed the rule as it was laid down at both churches. As to Clause 8—

Mr. D. Dalrymple

"That nothing contained in this Act shall prevent the chancel of any church from being used by the officiating ministers and others assisting in the conduct of Divine service"— he agreed with that; but he pointed out that all through this provision there was no recognition of what he believed to be undoubtedly the common law of the land—namely, that while the nave of the church belonged to the parishioners, the chancel belonged to the rector. In saying that the chancel belonged to the rector, what the law meant to say was that the chancel should be the part of the church in which the rector and those who assisted him in Divine worship should carry on that worship; and as regarded that point, he thought the Bill, by its silence, was likely to be disturbing. Before, however, he sat down, he must revert to the vagueness of the description of "parish church" in Clause 2—namely, "the consecrated places of worship of the parish." That would include, he believed, any consecrated chapel without cure of souls, which ought not to be put under the compulsory provisions of such an Act. As a proof of the way in which such consecrated chapels—of which there were many—might be worked, he would state that the late Bishop of London, Bishop Blomfield, recommended the consecration of a church—which had since become a parish church—without the cure of souls, because it was a church in which a musical and ornate service was proposed to be carried out, and, in consequence, he advised that it should not be a parish church, so that it would not be brought in contact with parishioners having legal rights. On these grounds he (Mr. Beresford Hope) could not accept the Bill, which, if his hon. and learned Friend would excuse him for saying so, was not a workmanlike production, and which, if passed in its present form, would, he believed, produce confusion. Whilst he said that, however, he was as little disposed to accept the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Salford. If the House adopted the Motion, they would be stereotyping one of the greatest abuses in the practical working of the Church—an abuse which had done more to alienate people from the Church, and which had gone further in checking the spiritual growth of the Church, than anything else—namely, the detestable system of pew-rents. It was impossible to suppose that that Bill could become the law of the land. Some might vote for it, though they disliked the details of the Bill; others, who did not like pew-rents, might be compelled to go into the lobby with the hon. and learned Member for Salford. In his (Mr. Beresford Hope's) opinion, however, the cause of open churches, which he had advocated, would be better served by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Ipswich (Mr. West) withdrawing the Bill, after the friendly and ample discussion which he hoped it would receive.

Mr. HEADLAM said, he thought that the effect of the Bill, even if carried, would be infinitely small, and would not be productive of the results expected from it. The most important clause was the 4th, which took away the power that existed of granting faculties with respect to pews. He did not think there were any faculties of that description in existence, at least none were presented at the present day. Sometimes a person had a legal right to a seat in a church, and when the church was repewed he stipulated that he should have some seat in the place of the one he had before. He did not know any other case in which faculties were granted, and, therefore, the effect of the clause was so small that it was not worth while introducing a Bill to deal with it. With respect to pew-rents, if the hon. and learned Member who introduced the Bill (Mr. West) wished to legislate on them, it should be done by more precise language than had been employed in the Bill. On the whole, he could not see any real good from the measure, and he hoped it would not be pressed on the House, especially as there was no chance of its becoming law that Session.

MR. BIRLEY said, it was impossible to exaggerate the evils of the present system of the appropriation of pews. He approved, therefore, the motives of the hon. and learned Member for Ipswich (Mr. West) in introducing that measure. But the Bill as drawn contained defects which could not be cured in Committee, and it would, therefore, be his duty to support the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley.) The object of those who supported the measure was described as being the restoration to the parishioners of their ancient rights in the parish church. Now, the ancient law was, that it was the duty of the churchwardens to seat the parishioners according to their quality and degree. There was no wish to restore such a state of things, but to throw open the parish church to parishioners without respect of persons. It should be remembered, however, that the class feeling in this matter was not altogether on the side of the rich, for those in humble stations felt just as great reluctance to associate with those above them, and he had no doubt that in "free and open" churches many of the humbler parishioners were deterred from attending, because they would find themselves by the side of those who came in gay clothing. The enforced separation of families was also a point for consideration. Regard must be had to the domestic feeling—the wish of families to worship together; and it was to be feared that sometimes the separation of families would rather conduce to flirtation than to edification among the young people. What was wanted was a place for everybody and everybody in his place. In churches which were free and open a custom had arisen under which families took their accustomed seats, and, legislate as they would, a custom of that kind would always grow up. He would always, however, desire to maintain the rights of the poorer parishioners, giving them an easy opportunity of obtaining at least as good seats as any occupied by the wealthier parishioners.

MR. DILLWYN said, he heartily approved of the principle of the Bill, but he entertained great objections to the mode in which the system of pew-rents was to be dealt with. He opposed the system in which large spaces in a church were allotted to great families, and large square pews kept for no object whatever. He desired to see churches retained for the free use of the public, and he also desired to see that they were maintained, which they would not be if that Bill were passed. Some small sum should be taken for a portion of the sittings, in order that the structure of the church might be maintained, now that church rates had been abolished. He should be sorry to see the Bill passed, because it would practically preclude churchwardens from adopting that system.

Mr. Beresford Hope

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, he did not mean to say that he did not sympathize with the principle of the Bill, but he knew that several experiments of a similar plan to that proposed by the Bill had been abandoned after trial, and he thought it would be unfair towards the founders of churches in new ecclesiastical districts to compel them to throw themselves on the voluntary principle.

DR. BALL said, he was not prepared to agree with the proposition that the existing law was open to the objection that had been brought against it. On the contrary, he was of opinion that if the present law was properly administered it would be found adequate to meet the case for which this Bill had been introduced. There were two separate matters for consideration. First, the power of granting the permanent ownership or right in pews; and, secondly, the allocation or distribution of the seating of the parishioners for a permanent or temporary purpose. Any faculty which enabled a non-resident to hold a pew in a parish church was void. For that reason a faculty to a man and his heirs was void, and the only legal faculty was that which granted a pew to a man and his family so long as they were resident in the parish, or that which made a particular pew appurtenant to a particular messuage. It was now proposed to take away the power of granting faculties, though not to abolish the right of prescription. He believed that title by prescription was of the most limited character, as it was not easy to assert a right founded upon that title. It must be done by something besides occupation, such as repairing a pew. Putting cushions in a pew was no proof of an original prescriptive right, because it was equally consistent with permissive and temporary enjoyment. With these prescriptive titles the Bill did not interfere; but it proposed to deal with the future authority of the Bishops, and to deprive them entirely of their right to grant faculties. It was a right that was exercised most sparingly by them, and there was no pressing demand for taking the power from them. There was a wide difference between universal prohibition and regulating the occasional and proper exercise of a right, and all he contended for was, that they should give the ordinary power to deal with exceptional cases; and he was the more strongly disposed that it should be so, in consequence of the alterations that were about to be made in the mode of procedure in the Ecclesiastical Courts, which would place the jurisdiction more in the hands of the chancellors who, being lawyers, would be guided by legal views and principles. Then, as to seating the parishioners, every parishioner had a right to a seat, and the distribution of seats was now subject to the control of the ordinary, and he desired to see that retained. The existing law properly administered would meet the evils complained of, and ensure a seat to every parishioner. The Bill proposed a total change in the law, and his reason for addressing the House was to show that by administering and working out the present law, they might accomplish much which the Bill proposed to deal with. He was not disposed to throw their own churches entirely open like the Continental churches. He thought there was something to be said in favour of a family all worshipping together in the same pew. He would therefore have, in each church, both pews and free seats: and that every Bishop could, if he chose, under the existing law enforce; his discretion being the rule, except where prescriptive titles—which, as already explained, were not numerous—obstructed.

MR. COLLINS said, that while thanking the hon. and learned Member for Ipswich, he regretted that his Bill did not deal with past as well as future faculties. He did not want to have faculties abolished; but that the Bishop, upon cause being shown, should have the power to annul any particular one. At present faculties were very rarely granted by Bishops; but there were no means, except by Act of Parliament, of getting rid of the difficulty that at present existed. The granting of faculties was an encroachment on the rights of the parishioners generally, and it was a practical and not a theoretical grievance. He knew of a church where every person except one who had a faculty had surrendered them in order that the church might be re-seated. The floor of the church had been lowered two feet from its original level, and the result was that this one stood like a four-poster in the church high above the rest of the seats. He should like to see all the seats of the churches of the country clear and unappropriated, and thought there should be some power of getting rid of faculty pews, for it was monstrous to suppose that an Act of Parliament must be got before they could reseat a parish church. It would have been better if the Bill had been confined to the old parish church, because the question of pew-rents would not then have arisen. He hoped that next year, when it was brought in, it would be so confined, and that those other defects that had been pointed out would be amended. It would be better to withdraw the Bill than take a division on it, which would not be a fair expression of the opinion of Parliament.

Mr. AKROYD said, that being churchwarden in his own parish, he knew the great difficulty there was of preserving seats for the poor in those churches which had free sittings, if there happened to be a popular preacher attached to them. He looked upon the Bill as an ingenious scheme for depriving the poorer parishioners of seats in their parish churches, and as such he was determined to oppose it.

Mr. HENLEY said, he thought it was unfortunate that that Bill should have been brought in just at that particular time. In half the parish churches in the rural districts there was plenty of room for everybody without necessitating any of these changes, and therefore to commence such a disturbance of established customs would cause much ill-feeling and mischief. The people were exceedingly sensitive and tender about their seats in the parish church, and to cause any disturbance in the enjoyment of them would be to put an end to all voluntary church rates. The hon. and learned Member for Boston (Mr. Collins) had evidently got a very troublesome case to deal with, but changes in the law must not rest on individual cases. Galleries in churches had been built under faculties, and the seats secured in them; but the hon. and learned Gentleman, who no doubt thought them a nuisance, would have them swept away. It showed how difficult it was to deal with these private arrangements. The ordinary, on the requisition of the inhabitants and the churchwardens, had a perfect right to deal as he thought right with respect to the general accommodation of the parishioners. This Bill would unsettle everything and settle nothing, and he doubted if anything could be devised better than the existing law. They should bear this in mind—that the churches had to be maintained not by public law or authority, but by voluntary aid. He did not believe that the humbler classes themselves desired to see the parish churches managed in such a way as to allow the costermonger a seat beside that of a duchess. It reminded him of the couplet which says that—

Mr. Collins

"Something the devil delights to see
Is the pride that aces humility."

He would, for those reasons, appeal to the hon. and learned Member for Ipswich (Mr. West) to withdraw the Bill.

Mr. PELL said, that the clause which dealt with the authority of churchwardens was a somewhat mischievous one. They were all, no doubt, anxious to see the parish churches in the condition of what was called free; but it was the business of churchwardens to make such changes in the area of their churches as from time to time might better suit the convenience of all classes of the congregation. The 5th clause, however, would interfere with those duties of the churchwardens, and against that clause he would offer every opposition.

Mr. WEST, in reply, said, he would take the whole responsibility of the Bill upon himself. Considering, however, the difficulties of passing it in the present Session, he should adopt the advice of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) and withdraw the measure, in the hope that he, or some one more competent to deal with it, might be enabled to introduce and carry a measure on the subject next Session. The discussion which had occurred would not be without use, if the speech made by the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball) were made generally known and acted upon.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn. Bill withdrawn.

BURIALS BILL—[Bill 7.]

(Mr. Osborne Morgan, Mr. Hadfield,
Mr. M^r Arthur.)COMMITTEE. [Progress 7th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2 (Burial to take place in accordance with notice).

MR. HEYGATE, in rising to move that the Chairman do leave the Chair, said, it was impossible that the author of this Bill could entertain any hope of passing his Bill that Session. The public mind had recently been awakened to the importance of this subject. An article in the leading journal the other day had called attention to it, and suggested the proper solution of the question—namely, that the burial service of the Church of England alone should be allowed within the churchyard, and that any service desired by the relatives of Nonconformists should be held either at the chapel or the private house of the deceased. That was the principle of the Bill brought forward in “another place,” and he hoped it would be accepted as a settlement of the question.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Chairman do now leave the Chair.”—(Mr. Heygate.)

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he thought he had some reason to complain of the course taken by the opponents of that Bill. After a very long discussion the second reading was carried by a large majority. About three weeks ago, the Amendment to postpone the Committee on the Bill, after a discussion which lasted three hours, was defeated by a majority of 71. Then, upon the consideration of the 1st clause, which contained the whole machinery of the Bill, there were made 44 speeches; and there took place four divisions. If there had not been discussion enough on the Bill, he was at a loss to know how much more was necessary.

MR. MOWBRAY said, the arguments used by the hon. and learned Member for Denbigh (Mr. Osborne Morgan) against the Motion of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Heygate) were in reality arguments in favour of it. Surely the prolonged opposition which was offered to the Bill proved that there was a very strong feeling against it.

He would also remind the hon. and learned Member that the last Amendment moved against the 1st clause by the hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. J. G. Talbot) was only defeated by a majority of 2. The Bill consisted of 14 clauses and 2 schedules. If one clause occupied 44 speeches and four divisions, he would ask what time was it likely to take in order to get through 13 clauses and 2 schedules. He believed that the feeling of the country was now very much changed in respect to this Bill.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he would press upon the hon. and learned Gentleman who had charge of the Bill the propriety of acceding to the Motion of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire, with the view to the ultimate pacific settlement of this question.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 131; Noes 157: Majority 26.

MR. G. B. GREGORY moved an Amendment in page 1, line 26, after “notice,” to insert—

“Shall be delivered to or left at the usual place of abode of such rector, vicar, or other incumbent or officiating minister, or such other person to be appointed as aforesaid, two clear days at least before such burial shall take place.”

Amendment agreed to.

MR. SALT moved an Amendment, in line 26, to provide that the “address and occupation” as well as the name of the person to officiate should be stated. His object was to secure that the service should be performed by a respectable person who was in some degree known, and such a person could have no difficulty in stating what his occupation was.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he did not think that any security would be gained by inserting the word “occupation,” as that might be in many instances open to vague description.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE submitted that a man who could not state definitely what his occupation was ought not to be permitted to officiate in a churchyard; such a man could surely say whether he was an itinerant lecturer or a phrenologist. The possibility that persons pretending to be ministers, whose education was so deficient that they could not say what they were, might perform service in churchyards, was sufficient to justify clergymen in resisting this Bill. Their only safeguard was in a definite statement of occupation, and the Amendment ought to be cheerfully conceded.

MR. COLLINS said, that if the Amendment were accepted, there would have to be a clause imposing a penalty on a person who made a false statement of his occupation, and the Amendment would be better out of the Bill than in it.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he was surprised to hear the suggestion that a person who was to perform a funeral service in a churchyard might make a false statement of his occupation. There was nothing in requiring such a statement, for there was not a Member of the House who had not to make it on signing a legal document.

MR. CANDLISH said, he could see no objection to the Amendment if it would secure any good result; but it would not, because there was no power to reject the person named if his occupation were objectionable.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH pointed out that the discussion would be rendered useless if the Committee accepted a subsequent Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for East Sussex (Mr. G. B. Gregory), to leave out the words "or other person or persons."

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, in what they were discussing, they were merely fighting about a shadow.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he was of opinion that the clergy of the Church of England should be considered as much as possible in those matters which had reference to the churchyards.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. G. B. GREGORY then moved the omission of the words "or other person or persons," which, he said, were infinitely too wide. It was intended by the Bill that the service should be a religious one, and, if so, it ought to be performed by a minister of religion only.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 26, to leave out the words "or other person or persons."—(Mr. George Gregory.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that provision ought to be made for occasions on which, perhaps, more than one minister would officiate, and for that reason the Amendment proposed would hardly go far enough.

Mr. Beresford Hope

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, that he thought there was a good deal of force in the suggestion, and he intended to comply with it by inserting in the 4th clause words limiting the right of performing the service to ministers or recognized preachers.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, that if a "recognized preacher" was a minister, he would come under that designation; but the words "recognized preacher" opened a very wide door which would admit all who had ever been allowed to preach.

MR. BRUCE said, he thought the object of the promoters of the Bill and of the majority of the House might be met by having a clause to define the meaning of the word minister. In Wales there were many sects, some congregations of which had no ordained ministers, but accepted the occasional ministrations of members, who were generally and deservedly respected, and whom it would be a hardship to prevent performing a service over one of their number. It might shorten discussion to relegate the difficulty to a clause defining those who were to perform the service in the absence of an ordained minister.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he would accept the Amendment, and endeavour to bring up a clause containing suitable definitions.

MR. COLLINS said, there was no such thing known to the law as a "recognized minister," and, therefore, there would be difficulty in adopting the words proposed.

MR. PELL said, a definite clause would involve lengthened and acrimonious discussion, for there would be great difficulty in defining what constituted a "recognized minister."

MR. SALT said, he would suggest that the Home Secretary should attempt to define, not only "minister," but the form of service to be used, for uncertainty as to what would be said and done in the services constituted the great grievance of clergymen, whose objections would be removed if the service were prescribed.

MR. CANDLISH said, that Churchmen should allow to others the freedom they claimed for themselves.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that what that amounted to was the disestablishment of the Church of England.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON suggested the postponement of the clause.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the clause had been amended, and it could not, therefore, be postponed.

LORD HENRY SCOTT, to show the difficulty of defining a minister, cited from a Return on the Irish Census the names of a few sects, including Brethren, Brethren in Christ, Derbyites, Free-thinkers, Socialists, New Life, Old Life, Seceders, Sinners Saved by Grace, Walkerites, and he added that he did not see how the difficulty could be met without having a registry of ministers.

MR. BRUCE said, the noble Lord the Member for South Hampshire had shown that the subject was surrounded with difficulty, but the reference he had made to Ireland was the most decisive he could have made against his own view of the case, for in Ireland, where there existed the sects that had been named, the law that the priest or minister of any sect could officiate at the grave of the deceased had been in force a number of years, and no one had been able to show that the slightest scandal had arisen in consequence. The fact was that hon. Members on his side of the House were extremely anxious to meet anything like solid objection to this Bill, and, believing it would be a concession valued by the other side if the services were performed by some person who was a "recognized minister," they had suggested an Amendment in that sense.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman would favour the Committee with some account of the practical working of the law in Ireland. Perhaps he would also state how he proposed to define the word "minister."

MR. BRUCE said, that if hon. Gentlemen were dissatisfied with the interpretation clause when it was introduced, it would then be the time for them to urge objections to it.

SIR GEORGE GREY also hoped hon. Members would confine their remarks to the subject immediately under consideration. He thought the Amendment would greatly improve the Bill.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE pointed out that any person who thought he was a minister, and was so regarded by his congregation, but who was not one under this clause, would be placed in an invidious and inferior position, and would have a right to remonstrate. Dissenters would have a right to consider the proposed definition as an interference with their religious liberty.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN reminded the Committee that Dissenting ministers were mentioned in the Jury Acts, and exempted from serving on juries.

MR. COLLINS said, some Quakers and Wesleyans might prefer to have the service said over their graves by a member of the family who was not a recognized preacher. It would be a hardship on the laity of the Church of England and other communions if they had not the same rights as were conferred on persons called "recognized ministers." He was, therefore, wholly opposed to the Amendment.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 141; Noes 137: Majority 4.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON moved to report Progress, as a misunderstanding had arisen on the last division. Although the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire had accepted the Amendment, he had voted against it, and the Committee had not been fairly dealt with.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN explained that he had only agreed to the Amendment on the understanding that he should be allowed to bring up an interpretation clause, his object being to include in the term "minister" a recognized local preacher. As, however, hon. Gentlemen opposite objected to the interpretation clause, he felt bound to vote against the Amendment.

MR. COLLINS said, that if anyone besides clergymen of the Church of England were to come into the churchyards, he would not consent to any distinction being drawn between a Dissenting minister and a Dissenting preacher.

LORD JOHN MANNERS remarked that, although hon. Gentlemen on that side might have objected to the interpretation clause, that was not the act of the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had undoubtedly accepted in the fullest manner the Amendment proposed by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for East Sussex (Mr. G. B. Gregory). It was, in his opinion, high time to report Progress, as the Home Secretary had also voted against the Amendment.

MR. BRUCE: I beg to say I did not vote.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that if the right hon. Gentleman did not vote against the Amendment, he did not vote at all. That certainly was not the way in which the House of Commons ought to be led.

MR. G. B. GREGORY said, he had not opposed the hon. and learned Gentleman's suggestion about bringing up an interpretation clause.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that his criticisms did not afford a sufficient ground for the hon. and learned Gentleman breaking the engagement he had entered into.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he had only consented to the Amendment on the understanding that a clause was to be introduced for the purpose of including recognized local preachers.

It being now a quarter to Six of the clock.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

ROYAL PARKS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. AYRTON, Bill for the regulation of the Royal Parks, ordered to be brought in by Mr. AYRTON and Mr. BAXTER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 217.]

House adjourned at Ten minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 29th June, 1871.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Union of Benefices Acts Amendment* [219].

Second Reading—Judicial Committee of Privy Council (212); Life Assurance Companies Act (1870) Amendment* (195).

Committee—Juries (Ireland)* (122-221).

Committee—Report—Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 2)* (176); Metropolitan Building Act (1855) Amendment* (208).

Report—Courts of Justice (Additional Site)* (182-218); Lunatics (Scotland)* (152-222); Tancred's Charities* (216).

Lord John Manners

Royal Assent—Trust Funds Investments [34 & 35 Vict. c. 27]; India (Local Legislatures) [34 & 35 Vict. c. 34]; Trades Unions [34 & 35 Vict. c. 31]; Criminal Law Amendment (Violence, Threats, &c.) [34 & 35 Vict. c. 32]; Canada [34 & 35 Vict. c. 28]; East India Stocks (Dividends) [34 & 35 Vict. c. 29]; Burial Law Amendment [34 & 35 Vict. c. 33]; Postage [34 & 35 Vict. c. 30]; Police Courts (Metropolis) [34 & 35 Vict. c. 35]; Pensions Commutation [34 & 35 Vict. c. 36]; Metropolitan Commons Supplemental [34 & 35 Vict. c. 57]; Local Government Supplemental (No. 2) [34 & 35 Vict. c. 59]; Metropolitan Commons Supplemental (No. 2) [34 & 35 Vict. c. 63]; Land Drainage Supplemental [34 & 35 Vict. c. 60]; Poor Law (Provisional Orders Confirmation) [34 & 35 Vict. c. 61]; Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Supplemental [34 & 35 Vict. c. 62]; Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 1) [34 & 35 Vict. c. 58].

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF PRIVY COUNCIL BILL—(No. 212.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that the object of the measure was to make further provision for the despatch of business by the Judicial Committee. The immediate object of the Bill was to enable the Judicial Committee to deal with the great arrear of causes which were now before that tribunal for hearing — and more particularly with those which came from India. It had been so framed that at the meeting of the Courts of Law in November, immediately after the Long Vacation, an efficient Court would be constituted so as to deal with these causes. He was happy to say that for the last two or three weeks the Judicial Committee had been busily engaged with the Indian Appeals, and that considerable progress had been made with those in the printed list — though the arrears could not be cleared off before the Courts rose for the Long Vacation. The Lords Justices of Appeal in Chancery had been able to sit on the Committee, together with Sir James Colvile, who was most active in Indian causes; he himself (the Lord Chancellor) having, by the arrangement of the judicial business in this House, been able to attend in the Court of Chancery. There would be no arrears in that Court, and the business before their Lordships had not been for years so little in arrear. The Judicial Committee having been deprived from time to time of the services of five of its Members who formerly were regular attendants—great difficulty had been experienced in securing the regular and continuous sittings of the Committee, and it was evidently necessary to make a provision different from that which had hitherto prevailed. The proposal of the Bill was that Her Majesty should have power to nominate not more than four Judges as additional Members of the Judicial Committee. It provided that two of them should be either Judges of the Superior Courts of Westminster (including the Divorce Court and the Court of Probate), or that they should be persons who, having served the office of Judge in one of those Courts, had retired from their judicial duties. In the first case, the salary to be paid to the two Judges would be the same as that which they now receive; in the second, the Bill proposed that they should receive a salary of £1,500 a-year in addition to their retiring pension. This would make their emoluments £5,000 a-year, which was the salary of the acting Judges of the Superior Courts. It was proposed that the other two Judges should be selected from among those who had served the office of Judge in the Supreme Court of Calcutta—it was the intention that wherever practicable the person appointed should have been a Chief Justice—and that they also should receive a salary of £1,500 per annum in addition to their retiring pension; the salary, in each instance, to be paid so long as they should continue to attend, whenever summoned, the meetings of the Judicial Committee. The Bill was intended to meet the emergency that had come somewhat suddenly upon them, in consequence of the number of appeals from India, and he did not think it would be desirable to assume that the proposal would be of a permanent character, regard being had to the importance of a comprehensive re-arrangement, as soon as possible, of our whole appellate system. But that was a point which could be best discussed in Committee. This was thought to be too large and invidious a power; but the matter could easily be arranged in Committee, and it was hoped that, as the attendance of at least three out of the four Members could be relied on, a quorum would be secured for the continuous hearing of appeals until the existing scandal of arrears had been remedied. The Bill as it now stood proposed that the Lord President should have the power of fixing continuous sittings for the Judicial Committee between November and August, and of making rules for the attendance of the Members at such sittings. Of course, the Bill would not in any way interfere with the attendance, as often as they found it possible or convenient, of the other Members of the Judicial Committee.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD CHELMSFORD admitted that the Judicial Committee required reform and reinforcement; but he feared that if the present scheme—to many portions of which he entertained strong objections—were accepted temporarily, it would form the model on which the future permanent settlement of the question would be shaped. One of his objections was as to the inequality that would exist between the two classes of new Judges. While the Judges taken from Westminster Hall, with £3,500 pension and £1,500 salary, would receive £5,000 a-year, the Judges from Bengal, with £2,000 pension and £1,500 salary, would only receive £3,500. As to the former he did not think any acting Judge would be induced to transfer himself to the Judicial Committee, for his two clerks, one at £600 a-year and the other at £400, would thus be turned adrift. As to retired Judges they would probably be so advanced in years and infirm as not to be likely to be particularly useful. So niggardly a mode of dealing with this question ought not to be encouraged, and he believed the House of Commons would readily consent to putting all those Judges in a position of becoming permanence and dignity. They ought not to receive less than £6,000 a-year. As to the continued attendance of unpaid Members, it was not likely that those would continue to attend when there were Judges bound to attend and paid for doing so.

LORD WESTBURY said, he regarded the Bill with great satisfaction, for it was the first attempt to deal with an evil that had long been felt. He should have preferred a more sumptuous manner of payment and a larger number of Judges, but was content to accept the Bill as supplying an immediate want, rather than to wait for the fulfilment of more magnificent expectations. The great pressure of Indian appeals, which was a reproach to the Government, would be thus remedied. He apprehended no difficulty in finding two Westminster Hall Judges willing to accept the proposed office, for he believed they would be actuated by higher considerations than the patronage attached to the appointment of clerks, and in any case they would be relieved from the expense and labour of going on circuit, which was a burden greater than the value of any such patronage. He feared that the press of Indian appeals would turn out to be permanent. The value of the property involved in the appeals decided in Bengal between 1863 and 1868 reached the enormous total of £13,390,000—an evidence of the great love of the Natives for litigation, of the enormous wealth of the country, and of the improbability of a diminution in the number of appeals. Indeed, the receipts of the Government of India from stamp duties in a single year reached £60,000. There would be an opportunity 12 months hence of showing what had been done, and provision would no doubt be then made adequate to the exigency. He would advise the President of the Council to decline the proposed power of determining the Members of whom the Judicial Committee should consist; for, in case of ecclesiastical suits, he would be subjected to the grossest imputations. He hoped there would be no delay in sending the Bill down to the other House, and that, there being no necessity for the attendance of his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack to hear appeals in this House, the Lords Justices would continue to give their useful services on the Judicial Committee.

LORD ROMILLY said, he believed the Bill would be beneficial in its results. It was essential, however, to the proper administration of the judicial system in India that the judicial power should be considerably increased there. He agreed with his noble and learned Friend (Lord Westbury) that the President of the Council would expose himself to calumnious imputations if he undertook the selection of Members of the Court; and he would suggest that a rota should be adopted for ecclesiastical causes, so as to put the operation of personal motives out of the question.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he never intended the Bill as a permanent scheme for conducting the appellate business of the Privy Council. No doubt some better machinery for appellate jurisdiction might be devised, but it had been thought that the establishment of an expensive staff of judicial functionaries was inexpedient until there had been some experience—such as the Indian appeals would furnish—of the difficulty to be encountered and of the best mode of dealing with it. He anticipated no difficulty in finding Judges; and, though gratuitous services could not be permanently relied on, he hoped that the unpaid Members of the Judicial Committee would continue to show their public spirit by attending as heretofore.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he wished to know whether the principle of a rota, which had been suggested by the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Westbury), and had proved advantageous in other quarters, was likely to be adopted in the case of ecclesiastical business? On a former occasion it was stated by the noble Earl (Earl Granville) that in the summoning of Members on all occasions of importance the President of the Council and the Cabinet were consulted; while the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack made the much more satisfactory statement that there was no selection, and that any Member could attend. He should now like to hear from the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Ripon) what the practice actually was.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR explained that the two statements were not conflicting. In theory the President summoned the Members, as in other than judicial matters; but he was practically in the habit of informing the Lord Chancellor of those whose attendance he supposed possible. There was no selection, all likely to attend being written to. In the last ecclesiastical cause four or five Members were written to by his own special desire, as he thought they might attend, but all of them declined except one able and excellent Judge, who actually started, but was obliged by illness to return home. He had taken care that in all ecclesiastical suits a summons should be sent to every Member of the Committee.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

UNITED STATES—TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, that in rising to move the Address to Her Majesty, of which he had given Notice, he was desirous of explaining to their Lordships why he had done so, notwithstanding that the subject had so recently been discussed in that House. The Resolution which was then brought before their Lordships by the noble Earl (Earl Russell) was so framed that their Lordships could not come to any issue on the question it raised, and therefore he thought it desirable that he should himself, in default of some more competent person, move a Resolution capable of being brought to a more definite conclusion. Moreover, the constitution of the Commission which had framed the Treaty was such that from the Leaders of the Opposition the House was nearly sure to hear but an uncertain sound. He thought all who heard or read the debate would agree that, though like every debate in which the Leaders of the House took part, it was ably conducted, it was apologetic on the part of the Government, and wanting in purpose on the part of the Opposition. The only exceptions to this were the noble Earl (Earl Russell) who brought forward the Motion, and the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), who never spoke without putting pith in what he said. The condemnation of the Treaty by the noble Earl was plain and straightforward; it had the old John Bull ring, which once was so grateful to English ears, but which was now thought coarse and unrefined. The country would be grateful to him for not weighing the interests of party in the balance with national honour, and the condemnation of the Treaty by the noble Earl was the strongest evidence of its unworthiness, for ever since Her Majesty's Government had been in office he had given them his unqualified support. The noble Earl (the Earl of Derby), who was formerly Minister for Foreign Affairs under a Conservative Government, though he condemned the Treaty, yet recommended their Lordships not to take further action, because the other House would approve this or any other treaty that the Government might submit to it. Now, with every deference for the high authority of the noble Earl, he must demur to the wisdom of such a course, for it would reduce this House from its position as a branch of the Legislature to an office for the registry of the decrees of the other House. It was this die-away policy which was spoken of by the right hon. Member for Birmingham when he said—"It's not necessary to meddle with the Lords—they are dying a natural death." If their Lordships acted only on party views, or those of expediency, the country would not support them; but if they acted on their honest convictions of the responsibilities of their high position all friends of order, whatever their politics, would rally round them. Though still at a loss to understand it to be constitutional for the Crown to agree without the consent of Parliament to pay a large sum of money, he (Lord Oranmore and Browne) did not seek to abrogate the Treaty, but to condemn the policy which accepted it as contrary to the honour and dignity of this country. He would remind their Lordships that only a few nights back the noble Earl (Earl Granville) stated, in support of the Convention of Paris, that it had never been censured by a vote of either House of Parliament. Though confident that the reasons for condemning this Treaty were very strong, they might, from being feebly put, appear weak; and he would, therefore, confine himself to a plain statement of the facts of the case. The first Article of the Treaty expressed regret for the escape, under whatever circumstances, of the Alabama and other vessels from British ports; whereas the Memorandum drawn by the late Lord Clarendon in reply to Mr. Fish, dated the 6th of November, 1869, stated that the fact was that only one vessel, the probable intended belligerent character of which the British Government had had any evidence, escaped. The noble Earl, in his first Instruction, dated the 9th of February, accepted this view as the bases of negotiations, and authorized an expression of regret for the escape of the Alabama. Now, even with regard to the Alabama, Lord Clarendon had quoted a very remarkable judgment of an American Judge, Judge Storey, which he held to apply to that vessel, in which that learned Judge said—

“There is nothing in our laws or in the law of nations that forbids our citizens from sending armed vessels as well as munitions of war to foreign ports for sale. It is a commercial venture which no nation is bound to prohibit, and which only exposes the persons engaged in it to the penalty of confiscation.”

Lord Clarendon also called attention to the remarkable fact that Mr. Adams urged the captain of a Federal ship to pursue the Alabama, and that he refused to do so; at which Mr. Adams expressed the greatest indignation in a despatch to his Government; and, again, that the United States ship San Jacinto, when blockading the Alabama in the French port of St. Pierre, let her slip away at night from under her bows. Was this country to pay for the neglect of American cruisers? Under these circumstances Her Majesty's Government took the part of a humble friend in expressing regret for the escape of the Alabama; but in expressing regret with regard to the other vessels Her Majesty's Government accepted a position at once humiliating and contrary to the dignity and honour of this country. The terms of his Resolution were not lightly chosen. They were the words of the late Lord Clarendon, and so had the sanction of every Member of the present Cabinet. They were contained in the reply to Mr. Reverdy Johnson's request to re-consider the terms of the Convention then agreed on, with the view to include the claims of the Government of the United States; and if he deemed such a charge contrary to the honour and dignity of this country how would he have found terms sufficiently strong to condemn the provisions of this Treaty? Assuredly the nation was daily feeling the loss of statesmen of his calibre? The sixth Article of the Treaty appeared to him to be an example of diplomatic prowess as exceptional as it was unprecedented and dangerous. It contained an absolute surrender of every point for which the present and every preceding Government of this country had contended. The noble Marquess who signed this Treaty (the Marquess of Ripon) and the noble Duke the President of the India Board (the Duke of Argyll) contended that its conditions resulted from the advance of ideas on international duties. Lord Clarendon's Minute in reply to Mr. Fish was the last and most complete reply to the claims put forward by the Government of the United States; but he found nothing in it showing the advance of ideas referred to, but only a reiteration of the same principles that had been supported by every preceding Foreign Minister. He accepted the principle of arbitration as agreed to by his predecessor, which was a great concession, for it allowed our international obligations to be judged, not by our own municipal law, not by the municipal law of the United States, but according to the very undefined principles of International Law; but he never contemplated the possibility of the Government of this country being a party to make rules by which the arbitrators were to be guided, which defined acts as contrary to International Law which were never held to be so before, and gave them a retrospective effect, rendering this country liable to heavy penalties. When arbitration with rules having a retrospective effect was proposed on the 8th of March by the American Commissioners, our Commissioners had no hesitation in declining to entertain such a proposition as contrary to their instructions, and it was only after a month's delay that Her Majesty's Government sent instructions to agree to them. He thought it quite natural that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Ripon) should at the Cobden Club the other night explain that the conditions were not “humiliating,” and that he should pass quickly over the present results, which were definite, and draw the attention of his hearers to the indefinite future.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON explained that what he had said on the occasion referred to was that the Treaty was a perfectly fair one on both sides, and that it was not in any degree humiliating.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE continued. The taxpayers of this country would have to buy the goodwill of our American cousins at a cost at least of £10,000,000, which might probably amount to nearly £13,000,000, owing to the engagement to pay the expenses of American cruisers; and he believed there was no precedent for any such payment except after a disastrous war, such as had recently occurred to a neighbouring country. The supporters of this Treaty laid great stress on the precedent of arbitration accepted by this Treaty. That principle would be readily accepted in all cases where one party, as in this, laid down rules that virtually prejudged the case, and the other agreed to abide by them; but lawyers would know that arbitrations were often only the beginning of litigation. He could not divine any reasons which induced the noble Earl (Earl Granville) so suddenly to change the instructions he had first given to our Commissioners and to agree to the terms dictated by the American Commissioners, unless that he had accepted the view suggested by the noble Marquess a few nights since that his duties as Foreign Minister had ceased—and, in fact, these negotiations were virtually conducted as President of the Board of Trade, and that in this capacity he accepted the “peace-at-all-price policy” as that which was necessary to protect commercial interests. He would now endeavour to convince their Lordships that this principle, as carried out in this Treaty, would not contribute to establish good relations with the United States, but must rather complicate them. What did this Treaty do with the question—in the opinion of the noble Secretary for Foreign Affairs the most urgent of all—of the American Fisheries? Our Commissioners pressed again and again on those of the United States the renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty, which was as often declined, and all we obtained was the settlement by arbitration of what sum the United States’ Government were to pay for the value of the Fisheries. But he believed that the Dominion declined altogether to sell their rights; so this, the most urgent question of all, existed in a more irritating form than ever. Then the Government of the Dominion urged on our Government to obtain a settlement of their claims for the Fenian raids; and he believed there was nothing clearer in International Law than that a Government was bound to prevent filibustering expeditions by land, for the preparations for them could not be concealed. Our Commissioners very properly urged the consideration of these claims, but the Commissioners of the United States insisted on entirely ignoring them; and again we submitted to their dictum. But by our “friendly” conduct we were to secure good relations with our American cousins. Let their Lordships consider whether, according to any estimate we could form of the political institutions or of the character of that great people, this most desirable end was to be gained by that Treaty? No one was more alive than he was to the conviction that no honourable means should be left untried to secure it—nay, more, he was convinced that American statesmen had this same wish; but in the States elections were constantly recurring, and there were two votes to be secured—the vote of those who wished to carry out to its fullest extent the Monroe doctrine, and the vote of his (Lord Oranmore and Browne’s) countrymen. The former coveted Canada; the latter, he was sorry to say, could only be gained by a demonstration of hostile feeling to this country. Thus, a grievance must be created against this country, and the more we yielded to unjust demands the more would be demanded, and even a coward would fight when driven to the wall. As between individuals, so between nations. Friendship could not exist save with mutual respect; a weak yielding to unjust demands would not command this. They all remembered the courage and determination the Northerners showed to maintain their institutions; they spared no sacrifice of life or property to maintain the integrity of their country. So high-spirited itself, could America respect our humility? What Government was more susceptible in taking offence, or more careless in giving it than the American? Their Minister remonstrated against the noble Earl (Earl Russell) receiving privately the representatives of the Confederate States, though at that moment they had an army of 500,000 men, and carried on the contest for more than four years. They objected to an English vessel saving the survivors of the Shenandoah from a watery grave. But the other day, when Her Majesty’s Government sent the Fenian convicts in state cabins to America, the Congress passed an address of sympathy and congratulation to them, and the President gave them a public reception. The National Press in Ireland stated, and the Press of America re-echoed, and most impartial men accepted the fact, that the Fenian “scare” was the real cause of the exceptional legislation of the last two Sessions. So the Prime Minister had acknowledged it to be; and perhaps it was one of the elements that caused the noble Earl (Earl Granville) to make advances to the United States. He feared the people of the United States might consider that the public reception of the Fenian convicts had no slight influence in producing the large concessions contained in that Treaty. But great benefits were to accrue to our commerce in future. Unable to protect our own commerce, we had bribed the Americans not to molest us. Without the bribe the Government of the United States absolutely declined to accept these rules. So America's position was certain present gain, whatever might be future results; ours was certain present loss, with a most problematical gain in the future. Now, acknowledging that the Government of the States was quite as likely to be bound by Treaties as other countries, was it not our experience that Treaty obligations were held but light when they could be conveniently thrown off? The Treaty of Vienna lasted as long as the exhaustion caused by a long war was felt—no longer. The Treaty of Paris was ignored because it was disagreeable to the people of Russia. Would the Treaty of Washington endure if its provisions became inconvenient or disagreeable to the people of the United States? The results of this Treaty were, then, these—We had accepted a position so humiliating as to encourage aggression; we had given just offence to our colonies by not protecting their interests; while the most irritating question—the Fisheries—was in a more irritating position than ever. The people of this country, occupied with questions of domestic politics, took the Treaty on trust; but when they felt the pressure of the additional taxation caused by it they would be justly indignant. They had always been ready when called on to give their lives and their money to protect their national honour, and when they perceived that honour had been sacrificed they would not only blame Ministers who made the Treaty, but would accept it as an evidence of the incapacity of our statesmen and of a break-down in our institutions—a result most unfortunate and dangerous. He could not, in conclusion, better describe the effect of such a policy on the public mind of Europe than by reading an extract quoted in The Times from a leading German paper—

Lord Oranmore and Browne

“The result is that England has become absolutely powerless in all international matters. Formerly she was listened to by kings and generals, now her words are received courteously, but half contemptuously. What she guarantees is rather endangered than made secure by her signature. This state of things has given pain to a small but important part of the nation, who look to the present with shame, and to the future with despair.”

Moved, “That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty conveying the deep regret felt by this House at Her Majesty's having been advised to sign a Treaty with the United States which is unbecoming the honour and dignity of this country.” — (The Lord Oranmore and Browne.)

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, he must apologize to their Lordships for rising to offer a few remarks on this subject, after the exhaustive discussion it had undergone in the House very recently; but he thought it might, perhaps, not be altogether undesirable that some Member on that—the Ministerial—side of the House, who was not bound by official ties to defend the acts of the Government, should be allowed to express fairly and unreservedly his opinion on that most important question. He hoped the noble Lord who had just sat down (Lord Oranmore and Browne) would not deem him wanting in respect if he said he did not think that he had raised any absolutely new points that evening. The noble Lord objected to the expression of regret and to what he called the apology for the escape of the Alabama and other vessels from our shores; but the truth was there had been no apology at all made. We had expressed regret at the disastrous war from which France had so greatly suffered; but nobody would suppose, because we expressed regret at its occurrence, that we were responsible for that war. It appeared to him to be a most natural thing that, these vessels having escaped from our waters and committed depredations against the commerce of a friendly Power, we should feel regret at that fact, and feeling such regret, why should we be ashamed or afraid to express it? Three causes—the repeal of the Navigation Laws, the Declaration of Paris in 1856 that the flag covered the cargo, and the greatly increased rapidity with which commercial operations were now carried on—had, in combination, no doubt, with other causes, brought about a complete change in the conditions under which our trade was conducted ; that unless we could seal up our enemy's ports and sweep his cruisers from the sea, it would be impossible for us now to prevent our trade from passing into neutral bottoms in time of war, however powerful might be our sea-going fleet ; that he founded himself not only on what has happened during the American Civil War, but also on the fact that on some recent occasions when rumours of European complications, in which this country might be involved, had reached the East Indies in a somewhat exaggerated state, British vessels had found it impossible to obtain freight on any terms ; that this state of things was not only most injurious to our Mercantile Marine, but that it had also a most mischievous effect in respect of our influence with foreign nations, who must see clearly that we should be very slow to expose our merchant shipping to the risk of being destroyed by vessels fitted out in neutral ports ; and that, therefore, the adoption of the principles laid down in the Treaty of Washington would greatly strengthen our hands as regards our foreign relations. He trusted this would not be the last time the two great Anglo-Saxon nations would be found acting in concert for the good of humanity. He was especially gratified that the credit of the work on our side could not be claimed by one political party exclusively. He thought his noble Friend (the Marquess of Ripon) and the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote) would ever look back with pride to the part they had taken in establishing principles so beneficial to the interests of England and so calculated to promote the cause of peace throughout the world.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE said, he had lived long enough to see many treaties entered into between this country and the United States, in all of which this country had been more or less on the losing side. Although we had not surrendered any territory, we were in a worse position under this Treaty than we ever had been before, because it was a Treaty evidently framed to meet the views of the people of the United States. He would not, however, complain of them ; on the contrary, he gave them great credit for the clever way in which they had outwitted us. They had weathered us on every tack ; they had—to use an Eastern expression—made us eat dirt, and pay the bill into the bargain. He regretted that the question of the line which should be drawn down the centre of the Strait of Rosario had not been referred to the Emperor of Germany, and a fertile cause of disputes thus settled. Our negotiators had not had a chart before them when they drew the existing line—they went to sea without a chart, and the consequence was that our interests suffered. He regarded the Treaty as a one-sided arrangement, and as unbecoming the honour and dignity of the country. As for ships which left our shores unarmed, it was absurd that we should hold ourselves responsible for acts committed by those who might be on board them.

LORD HOUGHTON, as a member of the Neutrality Commission, begged to express his satisfaction at finding that the legislation which it had recommended had been carried into practice. In the issue of that Commission his noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) was no doubt influenced by the fact that those ships which, consciously or unconsciously, we had allowed to go from our ports had inflicted very serious damage on the American mercantile navy. The formation of the Commission itself implied that his noble Friend (Earl Granville) did not regard the existing law as satisfactory or sufficient for the purpose for which it was required. There was, indeed, he thought, a still larger wisdom at work, for it was impossible not to see that the tendency of all International Law was to increase the responsibility of neutrals and to confine conflicts which might unhappily break out among nations within the limits of those nations themselves. The recommendations of the Commission had, he was glad to believe, laid the foundations for the Treaty which had recently been so happily concluded. That Treaty should not be regarded as the result of the action of two nations each of which was trying to get the better of the other. The allegation on one side was that the vessels that had sailed from our ports and had inflicted great injury on the citizens of the United States had done so by our default ; and the question we had to consider was how the angry feelings that had arisen could best be mitigated. There was no question of national honour involved in the making reparation for a wrong which had been committed. We had, unfortunately, allowed a great calamity to be inflicted on a nation, and it was on our part a national duty, as well as duty to humanity, to appease the angry feeling which had in consequence been created, and so to lay the foundations of International Law as to prevent the occurrence of such calamities in future. That being so, his noble Friend below him had, in his opinion, done nothing more than his duty in approaching the subject in a most amicable spirit, and in determining almost that it should be happily settled. Now the question must be regarded as closed for ever, and he confidently hoped that the Treaty would be found to operate for the future prosperity both of this country and America. He quite differed from those who maintained that the increased responsibility of neutrals was likely to be productive of evil results. He, on the contrary, believed that it would be the cause of great future advantage, because nations would be on their guard against the influence of the dangerous feeling that neutrals were entitled to profit by the calamities of belligerents. He had already, as a member of the Neutrality Commission, in that House expressed his readiness to go further than even the Treaty did in the direction of which he was speaking. He should be glad to see the exportations of munitions of war made illegal; and, indeed, though the strict wording of the Treaty did not seem to include such a prohibition, he had a strong hope that the spirit which animated it would culminate in such a prohibition, and thus contribute still more to the promotion of the general peace of Europe. It was impossible not to feel that if during the late contest on the Continent our laws had precluded us from exporting arms, much controversy would have been avoided, and possibly, owing to the still more desperate condition in which one of the belligerents would have been herself placed, the war brought to an earlier termination. He could not avoid again repeating his satisfaction at the conclusion of a Treaty so much in accordance with the recommendations of the Neutrality Commission.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I am quite sure from the appearance of the House that your Lordships will not think it disrespectful in me if I do not repeat the arguments in favour of the Treaty, and of the course which Her Majesty's Government has taken with regard to it, which were urged a few days ago by myself and by several of my colleagues. The noble Lord who began this discussion (Lord Oranmore and Browne) based his Motion, so far as I understood him, on two grounds, the one being the necessity of keeping up the character of this House, and the other in order that the people of this country might be enabled to understand the Treaty in the future—the noble Lord assuming, I suppose, that up to the present they do not comprehend its import. With regard to the character of your Lordships' House, I said the other day that I believed it to be very important that great international proceedings like the present should be thoroughly discussed; but I doubt extremely the desirability of again debating this particular question after the thorough discussion it received on the recent occasion of a Motion hostile to the Treaty being proposed in this House by one of the most eminent men in Parliament—a man entitled to speak with the greatest weight and position on the subject. On the occasion to which I refer the House expressed an almost unanimous opinion on the subject, and the noble Earl (Earl Russell) himself did not think it necessary to have his Motion put from the Woolsack; I therefore repeat that I very much doubt the desirability of re-opening a discussion which can have no good effect with regard to the practical issue of the case. With regard to the second ground on which the noble Lord bases his Motion—his desire to better instruct the people of this country as to the Treaty—I must beg leave to express my opinion that the people of this country understand the Treaty of Washington quite as well as the noble Lord does. I trust that, at any rate that they will not make that confusion between the obligations of international and municipal law which, as far as I could gather, seemed to pervade the mind of the noble Lord. I rejoice, however, that this short discussion has arisen, because it has given to two of my noble Friends opportunities of making very excellent speeches upon the merits of this Treaty. There is one point only in those speeches to which I wish to allude briefly. The noble Lord (Lord Houghton) is the only Member of the Neutrality Commission who thought it desirable that for the future the exportation of arms and munitions of war should be prohibited as a rule of International Law, in the same way that vessels of the Alabama class should be prevented leaving our shores. In answer to that, I beg to state that, in my opinion, the questions rest on grounds totally different and distinct the one from the other. On the one hand, nothing is so easy as to prevent a vessel of the Alabama class escaping from our shores, and the only loss to the country which would result from such a prevention would be the small amount of profit which the individual constructing and equipping the vessel might derive from the transaction, which in almost every case is contrary to the Proclamation of the Queen. But, on the other hand, I believe that no Government could succeed in preventing the export of arms, and that the attempt to do so would involve the search of almost every vessel in our Mercantile Marine—a proceeding which would injure the free flow of commerce, and so prove most undesirable in itself.

Lord Houghton

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE, in reply, said, he had brought forward his Motion in order to give the House an opportunity of coming to an issue on the merits of the Treaty, which opportunity was not afforded on the occasion when their Lordships were merely asked to ratify a Treaty which had been brought to a constitutional conclusion.

On Question? Resolved in the Negative.

UNION OF BENEFICES ACTS AMENDMENT BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Law relating to the Union of Benefices—Was presented by The Lord Bishop of WINCHESTER; read 1st. (No. 219.)

House adjourned at a quarter past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 29th June, 1871.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Twenty-ninth Report—Public Petitions.

PUBLIC BILLS — Committee — Elections (Parliamentary and Municipal) (re-comm.) [103]—R.P. Committee—Report—Promissory Oaths* [169].

Report—Local Government Supplemental (No. 4)* [187]; Sewage Utilization Supplemental* [186-218].

Third Reading—Local Government Supplemental (No. 3)* [211]; Public Health (Scotland) Supplemental* [189].

Withdrawn—Registration of Births* [180].

ELECTIONS (PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL) BILL—ILLITERATE ELECTORS.—QUESTION.

MR. DIXON asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether the words “otherwise incapacitated,” in the eighth sub-section of the ninth Clause of the Elections (Parliamentary and Municipal) (re-committed) Bill, are intended to include Electors who are unable to read and write; and, if not, whether he will introduce words providing that such Voters may not be excluded from exercising their franchise?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, in reply, that he did not understand the words referred to to include persons who were unable to read or write. Such voters were not excluded from the franchise at present, and by an alphabetical arrangement of the names of the candidates, and an arrangement for marking a cross within a square, he did not think that any person of average intelligence unable to read or write would be prevented from being able to record his vote. The question was, however, one to be dealt with in Committee.

EDUCATION—NATIONAL SCHOOLS— BUILDING GRANTS.—QUESTION.

MR. SARTORIS asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether building grants for National Schools, promised before the passing of the Education Act, will be continued in districts where such schools are found unsuitable to the requirements of the population?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, in the case of building grants before or after the passing of the Elementary Education Act, the question whether the schools were or were not suitable to the requirements of the population would be kept in consideration by the Department until the award was made. When the award was made—that was, the promise to give money for certain buildings—then, of course, the Government would be pledged in the matter. If his hon. Friend had any individual case to which he wished to call his attention, he should be glad to have information from him with respect to it either publicly or privately.

ARMY—CADETS AT SANDHURST.
QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH asked the Secretary of State for War, Why those Cadets at Sandhurst who have passed their examinations on the A list, and thereby become entitled to Commissions without purchase, have not yet been Gazetted, as by the Warrant dated 27th December 1870, now in force, they are entitled to receive £450 for the same after a service of two years, and their case cannot therefore be affected by the passing of the Army Regulation Bill.

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, that no officer who received his first commission since the introduction of the Army Regulation Bill would have the additional advantage of counting his service in order to obtain purchase money.

COLONEL NORTH: But the Warrant is still in force, and no notice has been given with regard to it.

MR. CARDWELL said, he had stated on a previous occasion that it was not intended to give any more first commissions on such terms as would carry a right to purchase money.

IRELAND—MASTER FITZGIBBON.
QUESTION.

MR. W. H. GREGORY asked the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin, If he will postpone his Motion in regard to the Correspondence between the Gort Board of Guardians and Master FitzGibbon till after the 7th July?

DR. BALL said, in consenting to comply with the request for postponement, he must express a hope that his hon. Friend would offer some explanation of expressions which were reported to have fallen from him on a former occasion, and which had caused a good deal of annoyance to many people who had a great respect for so eminent a judicial person as Master FitzGibbon.

MR. W. H. GREGORY said, he too entertained a very high respect for the private character of Master FitzGibbon. There had been, he might add, an entire misconception of the words which had fallen from him on the occasion to which his right hon. and learned Friend referred, which he understood had given pain to that gentleman, and which, perhaps, not unnaturally might lead him to look upon him as a kind of Parliamentary Captain Duffy. He was reported to have expressed a wish that the Master might be condemned to pass a rainy night in one of the miserable cabins to which he was at the time alluding, and experience its discomfort until dysentery and fever removed him to another and a better world. Now, by a mistake on the part of the reporter the word "him" was substituted for "them," meaning the poor people by whom those cabins were inhabited. He had not the slightest intention of uttering any stronger wish with respect to Master FitzGibbon beyond that of passing for once an uncomfortable evening in one of the wretched hovels of which he was speaking, in order that he might be able to judge for himself how lamentable was their condition.

ARMY—COLONEL PROBYN.
QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Secretary of State for India has recommended that Colonel Dighton Probyn should be promoted to fill the vacancy in the list of Generals of the Indian Army caused by the death, on 24th of last July, of General Padmore; and, whether he intends to act upon that recommendation; and, if not, upon what grounds Colonel Probyn is not allowed to receive the promotion to which, under the regulations in force in such cases at the time of General Padmore's death, he has a just claim?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, when the Committee of last Session reported on the subject of supersession it was necessary to suspend the Indian promotions until some action should be taken on the Report. The vacancy to which Colonel Probyn was to succeed was not reported to the War Office until after the date of the Report of the Committee, and consequently Colonel Probyn's appointment was suspended with the concurrence of the India Office. It now appears that the vacancy had actually occurred before the Report, and consequently Colonel Probyn's appointment will be made.

ARMY—HOUSEHOLD REGIMENTS.
QUESTION.

LORD GARLIES asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has yet received a reply from the Civil Service Commissioners in respect to the mode of conducting the examination of the Candidates for Commissions in the Household Regiments at the examination held on the 5th of June; and, whether it is admitted that the dictation was read with rapidity, and that the Candidates were given no time for correction, punctuation, or writing a fair copy before their papers were collected?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, I have received the reply, which is at the service of the noble Lord if he would like to see it. It contains the following passage:—

"1. That the exercise in dictation consisted of one passage only, of the length that is usual in ordinary examinations for clerkships in the Civil Service; 2, that this passage was read on the occasion in question with rather less rapidity than usual; 3, that the candidates had the usual opportunity of correcting and punctuating what they had written; 4, that it is not the practice of the Commissioners to allow time for making a fair copy."

LORD GARLIES said, he should take an early opportunity of calling the attention of the House to the subject.

UNITED STATES—TREATY OF WASHINGTON.—QUESTIONS.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If Her Majesty's Government is disposed to bring before the United States Government the claims for destruction of British property in acts of War subsequent to the 9th April, 1865, should the Commission be debarred from the consideration of such claims through that date having been fixed as the end of the War, notwithstanding that there were forces in the field, and much destruction of property after that? He should also be glad to know whether an opportunity would be given for the discussion of the Treaty of Washington in this House?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he apprehended it would be necessary to await the result of the Mixed Commission before entering upon the question as to the manner in which any claims not coming within its terms, though they might be generically alike, could be dealt with.

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply to the second Question of the hon. Member, said he had communicated with his right hon. Friend (Sir Stafford Northcote) with regard to a day for the discussion of the Washington Treaty, and in the course of a few days hoped to give an answer to the inquiry of his hon. Friend.

ELECTIONS (PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL) (re-committed) BILL—[BILL 103.]
(Mr. William Edward Forster, Mr. Secretary Bruce, The Marquess of Hartington).

COMMITTEE. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [22nd June], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair;" and which Amendment was, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Cross,)—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. G. BENTINCK said, he wished to make one or two remarks on what had already occurred during the progress of this discussion. In an earlier stage of these proceedings he had ventured to say that the inevitable consequence of passing a Ballot Bill would be an immediate dissolution of Parliament, because there was no instance to be found of a self-condemned House of Commons continuing to carry on the business of the country. But the Prime Minister took exception to that assertion, and did him the honour to attribute his remarks to a dread of meeting his constituents. Now, it would be an act of extreme presumption on his (Mr. Bentinck's) part if he were to assume the favourable result of any meeting which might take place between himself and his constituents; but he felt bound to say that, considering that the right hon. Gentleman himself had been rejected by every constituency he had ever represented, and that there had been strong objections manifested towards him by his present constituents, he (Mr. Bentinck) thought he might, without presumption, venture to hope that his political prospects were, at least, as good as those of the right hon. Gentleman. Another remark which surprised him fell from the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli). That right hon. Gentleman, in answering a statement made by the Prime Minister, said reform had recently been largely dealt with. The statement was perfectly true; but considering, to use the mildest term, the unfortunate part which the right hon. Member had played in this large dealing with reform, he was surprised that the stings of political conscience—if there were such a thing as political conscience—should not have prevented the right hon. Member from adverting to the subject. One other statement had also been surprising. It had been said by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. Cross) that in Australia there was neither Liberals nor Conservatives. When he heard that remark he confessed that for the first time in his life he felt a longing to be an inhabitant of that country, because he assumed that Australia must be under the good old rule of Whigs and Tories, and all those most flagrant violations of political propriety which had shocked the moralists of this country in recent years could not occur on that happy soil. One recent convert to the Ballot (Mr. Leatham) had used the happy expression that the question of the Ballot had invaded the Cabinet. That was one of the happiest modes of expressing a sudden conversion that he had ever heard. In old times, when Members of the Treasury bench voted that to be white which they formerly declared to be black, they were liable to have their proceedings called by various ugly names—such as political tergiversation, political profligacy, and even the uncomfortable word “ratting” was sometimes applied. All these phrases were now done away with, and when Members of the Government changed their opinions it would suffice to say that they had been “invaded” by another view of the question. The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) adduced amongst other arguments in favour of the Ballot the experiences of other countries in regard to that system. He (Mr. Bentinck) could see no cogency in such logic. Did the hon. Gentleman wish the proceedings of the House of Commons should become assimilated to those of the American Congress? Would the House be improved by that? If that was one of the things he had in view it appeared to him to be the strongest possible argument against the Ballot. But there was a difficulty which had not yet been dealt with. Secret voting was so distasteful to the majority of the people of the country that it would, in many constituencies, be scouted with contempt. How were they going to deal with that state of things? Was there any provision made in the Bill for the case in which a constituency—regarding it as the initiation of an unmanly practice—should unanimously, or almost unanimously, refuse to comply with secret voting? Were they about to enforce penalties against those who would not register their votes in secret? He had listened with great attention to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Stansfeld), and he (Mr. Bentinck) was bound to say that a more unwilling advocate he had never heard in his life; everything the right hon. Gentleman uttered being, in fact, opposed to secret voting. The right hon. Gentleman said the system was right except in cases where bribery occurred. But was any hon. Member prepared to suggest the possibility of a state of circumstances under which secret voting would not be accompanied with bribery? That disposed of the argument of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman also said that the system of secret voting produced tranquillity at elections; but he (Mr. Bentinck) must say that, from all accounts, it appeared that the scenes of turmoil and confusion occurring at contested elections in America were more discreditable than any that occurred elsewhere. The real remedy to prevent disturbance at elections had been suggested a hundred times, and it simply consisted in having resort to the system of voting papers. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board went on to refer to evidence in favour of the Ballot, and quoted Sir James Fergusson, who stated that the system of Ballot was susceptible of manipulation. That, no doubt, meant that the Ballot would lead to every possible kind of bribery. The right hon. Gentleman also quoted Governor Du Cane, who strongly recommended that provision should be made for a scrutiny. Now, he (Mr. Bentinck) apprehended that if a scrutiny were made possible, the system of secret voting came at once to an end.

Mr. G. Bentinck

Whether hon. and right hon. Gentlemen gave their own opinions in favour of the measure, or quoted those of others, the defects of the system were alike made manifest. There were three points to which he wished to refer. It was said, in the first place, that the Ballot would do away with intimidation. It might suppress intimidation, and if that would be its only result he would be one of its strongest supporters, believing as he did that the greatest amount of intimidation was practised in large towns by those who were classically termed "roughs," and in the sister country by those who were disaffected to the Government. The next question was that of personation, which would undoubtedly be greatly facilitated by secret voting. With open voting this was all but impossible; with secrecy it was easily perpetrated, constantly attempted, and generally a success. Then came the real gist of the matter—bribery, which, in his opinion, was the pivot of the entire subject. Was any man so guileless as to suppose that where one person had something which he wished to transfer, on which another set value, and for which he was ready to pay, the transfer would not take place? The only effect of the Ballot would be to increase hypocrisy and render impossible the detection of bribery. When Mr. Berkeley used to bring forward his Motion in favour of occult voting, hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury bench voted steadily against it. On the last occasion when Mr. Berkeley brought forward his Motion, a paper was put into his (Mr. Bentinck's) hands prepared under the impression produced by the large majorities who supported the then Member for Bristol, that he might at length succeed. In this paper the full details of a system were given by means of which, under the Ballot, bribery could simply and successfully be carried out. Some able and not over scrupulous person in a borough was to undertake for a certain sum to return a candidate. For this purpose he was to come to an understanding with, if possible, a majority of the constituents; but if not, with as large a number of voters as possible, that if so-and-so were returned they were to get a certain sum, and that if he was not returned they would get nothing. That system would be in operation if this Bill were passed. His regret was that he did not keep the paper, which he certainly would have done had he foreseen the conversions which had since taken place in high quarters. After the debate in which he had produced that paper, and when going into the Lobby with many right hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Ministerial bench, a noble Lord who was now a distinguished Member of the Liberal party in the other House, turned round and said to him—"You are quite right in what you stated. Arrangements have been made for carrying out this system, and I myself have had the same paper sent to me. Everything you have stated was perfectly true." He (Mr. Bentinck) asked hon. Members whether they were prepared to support a measure the only effect of which would be to give bribery a full swing and prevent the possibility of its detection? A good deal had been said in the course of this debate about party feeling; he could only say that his objections to the Ballot were not based on any party feelings. If it was a question of a vote for the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister he would give the measure his support. But if, on the other hand, it was a measure to bring the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire into office, he (Mr. Bentinck) would oppose it as he was doing now, and for this reason—bad as the present state of things was—he thought it would be still worse under the other circumstances, because the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire always advocated when in office the principles which he attacked when in Opposition, and were he now on the Treasury bench he would be introducing the very measure they were now opposing. So that in that case they would have two front benches to contend against. He could not do better than conclude by reading the words of a statesman whose opinion would be listened to on both sides with respect—he meant the lamented Lord Palmerston. In speaking on the last occasion when Mr. Berkeley brought forward his Motion for the Ballot, Lord Palmerston said this—

"I maintain that if the Bill were carried, and if the Ballot were enjoined by law, it would be degrading and demoralizing to the people of this country. You would turn your electors into law-breakers or hypocrites."—[3 Hansard, clvii. 955.]

He need not say, after that statement by Lord Palmerston, the right hon.

Gentleman at the head of the present Government voted against the Bill. He again asked those Members of the Liberal party who had always strongly opposed bribery and corruption whether they were prepared to support a measure the only results of which would be to perpetuate them without the possibility of detection.

MR. OSBORNE: Mr. Speaker—Sir, able, exhaustive, and I think I may add exhausting as have been many of the speeches addressed to us on this occasion, I own to a feeling of disappointment that this debate has been taken on one clause of the Bill alone. It has been restricted entirely to the mode of taking the poll. Now, I am not content to discuss so large a question as this on so small a matter. What is the title of this Bill? It is the "Elections (Parliamentary and Municipal) Bill, to amend the laws relating to procedure at Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, and for other purposes connected therewith." Now, I beg the House to recollect that this is the first instance, according to my experience, in which any Government has attempted to deal with the mode and manner of conducting municipal elections—a most important thing, as connected with Parliamentary elections. Sir, this is not a mere Ballot Bill. It is a Ballot Bill, and something more; and I must protest against discussing so large a measure merely with reference to one point—that of secret voting. Now, the speech, the sensible and able and fair speech of the hon. and learned Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. A. Cross) exhausted the subject so far as regarded the mode of taking the vote; but I regret to say he passed over nominations, the cost of elections, and the prevention of corrupt practices as mere minor points in this Bill. For my own part, I consider these points quite as important for our consideration as the mode of taking the poll; and with the leave of the House I shall introduce a novelty by discussing some of those points which hitherto have been entirely passed over. This is a Bill to re-construct the whole of our electoral system, Parliamentary and municipal, and I say it ought to be discussed and judged of as a whole, not merely as a question of detail. What is the question which was very well put by the hon. and learned Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. A. Cross)? He said the question they had to decide was how to secure the best representation of the people and the best composition of this House, so that the voter may vote securely. Well, I think in undertaking such a task it was a very wise step to include municipal elections. And why? Nobody can deny that the municipal election is the cradle of the Parliamentary procedure. In all cases where municipal contests are conducted by corrupt means, Parliamentary contests are conducted by the same means. I have had experience of municipal elections. I know the cost of being a town councillor. What is it? It is a low rate where the town councillor is elected by the application of 5s. in hand and a dinner to the electors. I have known a town councillor, for the pride of appending T.C. to his name, spend £1,500; and I know that there is, where this gentleman lives, an ascending scale for one desirous of being an M.P. He does not get in for that sum. The man who votes for 5s. for a candidate for being town councillor, puts 10 per cent on for one ambitious of being a Member of Parliament. The same corrupt means used for the election of the town council are organized for the return of the borough Members. The constituency is debauched at the core by the municipal elections, and I say it is a wise and a statesmanlike measure to deal with municipal elections in conjunction with Parliamentary elections. Now, Sir, so much for the title of the Bill. I think Clause 2 merits some consideration of this House. Clause 2 deals with the whole system of nomination days. Who that has ever stood a contested election where parties ran high, but must confess that the most exasperating formality is that of the nomination? What is it but a Saturnalia for all the roughs and rowdies of society, where freedom is only recognized by its shrieks—where, if there is equality, it is the equality of tumult and disorder? I maintain that nomination day is at the root of all the evil. What is it? Bribery commences at the very outset on the nomination day. I am speaking of those who have not got snug seats. How does bribery commence? Does not every hon. Gentleman know beforehand the pains taken to secure what is called "a hearing?" I have found among my legitimate expenses the hiring of an audience to listen to my oration, and I have suffered most severely from the efforts of my enthusiastic partizans, who, to keep silence, made such a commotion that neither side could be heard. That is what was called "securing a hearing." I paid £85 on the last occasion to secure a hearing in the town of Waterford, and was not allowed to speak a word. So much for securing "a hearing." Then there comes another thing on nomination days—it is thought necessary to have the show of hands. How is the show of hands secured? Very much in the same way that the hearing is secured. But one example is worth ten speeches. Let me give the House an example how the show of hands was secured at the Norwich election on January 6th, 1871. When a Committee sat on the Norwich Election Petition, Mr. J. Young was examined as to the proceedings of the Liberal Committee in the election of 1866. "Mr. Coaks inquired—'What about the show of hands on the nomination day?' Something was said about the cost. Sir William Russell asked—'Is it legal?' Witness recommended, if legal, the show of hands should be procured, as it would add to the prestige of the popular party. Mr. Coaks was examined. He said he felt strongly on this point, as the Liberals had always made a point to get it; in 1865 they spent £34 with this object." So much for the show of hands; and this was called freedom of election. Can there be anything more disgraceful than keeping nomination days for this purpose, and calling it freedom of election? There is in the Bill another excellent clause, to which no allusion has been made—I refer to that which prohibits the hiring of rooms in public-houses. We hear a great deal about the Ballot, but not about these useful provisions which the Government has introduced into this Bill, and which I hope they mean to carry. I hope they are not going to take them out and leave us with a Ballot Bill pure and simple. I can conceive of nothing more useful than a clause which will forbid the hiring of rooms in publichouses. Then there comes a very important point to all of us—that of expenses. What is the cost of a seat under the present system? Do hon. Members send in all their expenses? I have reason to suppose I did not. By your present system men of moderate fortunes and prudent habits are prevented coming forward for large constituencies. Why? Because the expense for a seat is so great. Take, for instance, the City of Manchester, so worthily represented by the hon. Baronet (Sir Thomas Bazley). If a candidate for that city wishes to send out circulars, what do you suppose the postage and printing comes to? Why, between £300 and £400. That is a pretty large item in what you call legitimate expenses. Again, take the matter of hustings; you may with advantage copy something from Ireland in that respect. We have no hustings there; there are none erected; there are no out-door nominations. But in Marylebone, which is said to be a pure borough, where there is no bribery, when a candidate comes forward he must give a guarantee to the returning officer that he will lodge £800 for the expenses of the hustings. The consequence is, that candidates for such places are restricted almost entirely to two classes; they are either very rich men, who pledge themselves to nothing, and are ready to pay anything, or they are poor men, who will spend nothing and will swallow anything. I ask hon. Members if they are content that nomination days and the expenses of elections shall remain what they have been, and whether this Bill will not effect a great improvement in them? If these expenses are to be put upon the county and the borough rates, it will make people look after the cost of elections, and we shall have no leviathan stepping in and endeavouring to swamp a constituency by the length of his purse. I now come to the subject of Clause 3, the mode of taking the vote, of which we have heard so much, which I shall endeavour to avoid repeating. I am not one of your recent converts to the Ballot, made by either miracle or pressure. I am not one of those who have exaggerated either its faults or its vices; I have always thought that both were overdrawn and much exaggerated. What was the origin of this Ballot? Even if it comes into play I cannot think human nature will be changed; but I believe human comfort and civil order will be promoted. I heard an hon. Friend of mine talking of a day of humiliation when the Ballot came into play. I think the humiliation to us is that this measure was not passed long ago. That is the humiliation I feel, and not that we are about to do tardy justice to the suffering voters of this country. There is no principle involved in the mode of taking the poll. I hold that the mode of taking the poll is merely an arrangement to be used or not as circumstances may require. We hear sometimes that the Ballot is an un-English plan; that is what men always say of things which are not according to their ideas. We may call the Revolution of 1688 un-English, because it was led by that enterprising and uninteresting person William III. The introduction of the Ballot into this country is not a thing of recent date. It is the fashion to say that it is recent, and that it is copied from America. America copied it from us. I find from the old City records that the Ballot was used in the election of aldermen as long ago as 1526; and in 1637 there was an Order in Council about the Ballot which is not generally known. The Ballot came from Holland. It was introduced into this country by a company of merchant adventurers, great traders, who had factories in Holland. It was owing to one Meissenden, who was a deputy of this association at Delf, and who was forced upon them by Laud and Charles I., that the Ballot was introduced into England. They wanted Meissenden to be elected for Rotterdam; the company were opposed to this, they voted against him, and he was defeated. Charles I. sent for the list of voters, and it was handed to him; but there were no names upon it, for the voting was by Ballot. Here, then, is a most extraordinary thing discovered by the researches of Mr. Hepworth Dixon, and only lately made public. It is an Order in Council of Charles I., which I cannot resist reading to show his idea of the Ballot, which was very much the idea of the hon. Gentleman who spoke last in this House, although that is the only similarity I see between them. The Order in Council is dated Hampton Court, September 17, 1637, and it reads thus—

"His Majesty, this day sitting in Council, taking into consideration the manifold inconveniences that may arise by the use of balloting-boxes, which has of late begun to be practised by some corporations and companies, did declare his utter dislike thereof, and with advice of their Lordships ordered that no corporation, &c., either in City of London or elsewhere in His Majesty's kingdom, shall use, or permit to be used, in any business whatsoever any balloting-box, as they tender His Majesty's displeasure, and will answer the contrary at their peril."

The King found the Ballot so inconvenient because he could not foist his spy deputy upon the merchant adventurers. Let the House recollect that vote by Ballot has been adopted by every European country, and in most of our colonies, and I have never heard that there has been any desire on the part of those countries to recur to open voting. A great deal has been said on the question whether the vote is a right or a trust; but I do not mean to go into that, for it strikes me that it is a mere disputation, fitter for a debating society than for the House of Commons. The hon. Member for South-west Lancashire says that the voter is a trustee for the nation at large; and I want to ask him this question. A trust is exercised solely for the benefit of another person; how is that to be enforced? Will he propose to enforce that trust by compulsion and intimidation? These are the very things we are doing all we can by our legislation to prevent. I say there cannot be a trust which cannot be enforced. I want to know what reason there is why the vote should be open? If publicity involves danger to the life or the limb of the trustee, it behoves this House to provide means by which that trust shall be exercised secretly and in security. I cannot understand how secret voting can be contrary to the Constitution. The only Acts I have been able to find on the subject are that of Edward II., which deals with Parliamentary voters, and says "that no man shall be brought to vote by force of arms or menace," and that of Henry IV., which says that "in presence of full county, the elector shall vote freely and indifferently." How is a man to vote freely and indifferently if there are men waiting to break his head? I say this House is bound to enable men to vote freely and indifferently by giving them the protection of secret voting. France has been referred to; and I say, so far as I have been able to understand anything, you would have had no Conservative minority at all in the late Chamber if there had not been vote by Ballot. We have heard a good deal about America; and what is the evidence as to the working of the Ballot in America? A Committee which sat upon this subject in 1835 examined M. de Tocqueville, than whom they could not have had a better witness: and this is part of the examination—

Mr. Osborne

"Do you think that secret voting in America is required to protect the electors against the state of popular feeling?—Answer. Yes, in America tyranny can only come from the majority, and their secret voting is an important security against the tyranny of the majority, which is the greatest evil that attends a purely democratical form of Government."

I say, as our Government is becoming every day more democratic, it is necessary to protect voters against trades unions, and, in short, against mob tyranny; and it is impossible you can do that unless you alter the mode of taking the poll, and introduce secret voting without scrutiny. Italy has also been referred to; but this evidence was given by a Minister of Italy, Signor Valerio, in 1857—

"Was the Government on one hand and clergy on the other prevented by use of secret voting from controlling the elections?—Answer. I believe that many agriculturists, artizans, and shopkeepers would not have dared to vote openly against candidates proposed by the priests and aristocracy, on whom they are dependent."

Can anything be more satisfactory than that? I cannot understand what alarms hon. Gentlemen. My own feeling is that the Bill will have a strictly Conservative tendency, and will do more to protect the Conservative party than any measure which has yet been brought forward by their own leader. The question has arisen whether bribery has decreased or not? Some hon. Gentlemen are of opinion that it has decreased; but my own experience does not lead me to that conclusion. I believe if bribery is less open, it is more subtle—

"For Satan now is wiser than of yore,
And tempts by making rich, not making poor."

The purchase system is not confined to the Army, nor is over-regulation price either. Had the men who during the last 50 years have been made Peers and Baronets through a species of bribery, performed any distinguished services, or had they been of any use to society? No. They had spent their money in elections; and that is the way in which Peers and Baronets are made. That is why there is such a rush to get into this House on the part of millionaires. They begin by promoting what is called the good of the party. And what does that result in? The promotion of an individual. And then we visit it upon the humble men who want the money with which the place has been flooded; and then we send the honourable flooders to what is called "another place." I find that the first record of bribery in this House is dated 1571. That bribery consisted of the giving of a great deal of money to Members of the House to influence their votes with reference to local and private Bills. To such an extent had that system risen in the time of Charles I. that Lord Clarendon mentions it in his History. He states that all public business was put aside in order that the Members might scramble for the money given to influence their votes with reference to local and private Bills. The question is this—What is likely to be the effect of the Ballot on bribers? I am ready to admit that I do not think the Ballot will eradicate bribery. But it will make bribery more dangerous; and I do not think any man, however bold or however profligate, will be induced to spend money for which he is not certain whether a return will be made. There is a very curious instance of this. Formerly a place in Suffolk sent a Member to this House. It is called Sudbury. There never was such a place as Sudbury for bribery. No man could be returned for Sudbury at a less cost than £8,000. I have found a curious bit of evidence as to what was the notion of the voters in Sudbury as to the effect of the Ballot on them. Dr. Mitchell, a Government Inspector, in reporting in 1840 on electioneering abuses, stated that the voters of Sudbury were by no means friends of the Ballot, and that when a candidate at the election of 1835 declared he was a determined supporter of vote by Ballot in order to put an end to bribery, there arose a tremendous commotion in the borough, and an immediate cry of "No Ballot, no Ballot!" I think the people of Sudbury were very good judges of what the Ballot would do. So much for the English side of the business. A very pertinent question was put by the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire to this effect—How will the Ballot improve the representation of Ireland? That is a very difficult question to answer; because there are two points of view as to what improvement may be, and it is very difficult to adjust the focus of one's glasses so as to get an impartial view of English ignorance and Irish prejudice. The case of Westmeath has been adduced. I know something of Westmeath. It is my firm conviction that if the voters of Westmeath at the last election could have recorded their votes by means of the Ballot, and had thus been able to go to the poll freely, that election would not have resulted in the triumph of the hon. Member who now sits for Westmeath. I know that if in the contest for the county of Waterford we had had the Ballot, instead of winning at the risk of my life by a miserable majority of 8, I should have won by 120. But my voters were afraid to go to the poll. When they did go to the poll they were so beaten and so ill-used that they declared to me they would never vote again. But we have had the experience of the Members for Trinity College, Dublin. Two more able or more respectable Members do not exist in this House. But I must demur to the electioneering experience they have derived from representing Trinity College, Dublin. They come from a happy land, where care is unknown. What do they know further than off collegians firing off squibs and crackers on their return? The junior Member for the University (Mr. Plunket) has praised Whig measures, but he has a strong aversion to Whig men. Now, I am not aware of any place in Ireland which returns Whigs but one, and that is the University of Dublin, and I will say of them—

“O fortunati nimium, sua si bona norint!”

Do not talk to me of experience derived from Trinity College, Dublin. Take any locality in Ireland where there has been a contest, and both sides will complain of coercion, one of the landlords and the other of the priests. Well, Sir, will this Bill have any influence in tranquillizing them? The misfortune of the Irish elector is this—that, with all his many virtues, he has little or no regard for individual freedom of opinion. Independence at elections is looked upon as a crime; it is, as independence has been said to be in this House, a thing which cannot be depended upon. No man in humble life dare be independent. He is a marked man; and I have known men persecuted to such an extent that they have been obliged to sell their farms and leave the country on account of their votes. Would secret voting do any good under such circumstances? There is a great difference between an election in England and an election in Ireland. In Ireland a man is put upon the voters' list compulsorily. He is compelled to have a vote, and very often to use it when he is utterly indifferent to it. In England you march out all the troops when there is an election; in Ireland you march in the troops, and every town is proclaimed to be in a state of siege. The unfortunate voters go up to the poll frightened out of their wits with a large escort of cavalry and police. They vote at the peril of life and limb. I have seen it myself. I remember finding a most extraordinary item in my last election bill—namely, “for two sets of teeth, £12 10s.” I was so alarmed that I asked my adviser whether it was legal, and he said it was, for the men had lost their teeth in my defence, and some were walking about quite prepared to lose another set in the same way. And these came under legitimate expenses. Mark you, we have nothing of that sort in England. This is called a light affair; but I have known men lose the use of their limbs; I have known two instances where men were killed and carried away and quietly buried, and nobody ever heard anything more about them. That is the history of an Irish election. Now, I say it is a positive cruelty to thrust a vote upon a tenant which entails upon him the miseries without the glory of martyrdom, unless you intend to give that man the protection of secret voting. The consequence of the present state of things is that our system of election is hated by the people. They wish voting to be done away. What occurred at the last election for the county of Tipperary? In that county there are 10,000 voters upon the register. How many of them do you suppose voted at the last election? 4,000. The rest of them stayed at home, and I do not blame them, for they would have met with a most warm reception if they had attempted to go to the poll. The junior Member for the University held it out as a deterrent effect, that if the Ballot were introduced in Ireland, the great majority of the Irish Members would be Nationalists. If that proves anything it is that the men returned now are not returned by the free choice of the people. But I deny that. I believe that, with secret voting, there would be a great chance, especially in the counties, of men connected with the counties and of moderate Irish opinions being returned. At any rate, we ought to see whether the Ballot would have that effect, because no man who has lived in Ireland can deny the strong feeling of nationality which exists in the Irish mind, and no man knows better than I do that that feeling is not to be smoothed down or got rid of by measures extorted by Parliamentary necessity. The Irish are looking for something more, whatever that may be. There are many interpretations of home rule. If home rule means local government for local purposes, and if for Imperial purposes the Crown is kept as it is, I see no great objection to home rule. But, unfortunately, that is not the idea of home rule entertained by ardent enthusiasts. Home rule with them means secession, and if it comes to secession I say this—great as is my desire to be in this Parliament, proud as I am of my connection with Ireland, and more particularly of the constituency that I represent, ready as I am to make some sacrifice, I am not ready to make a sacrifice of principle, and I say to them in the words of Sir Richard Lovelace—

Mr. Osborne

“I could not love thee, dear, so much, Loved I not honour more.”

Therefore, when you talk to me of home rule, I say “Define what home rule means.” Do not let us Irish Members go over in a body without knowing exactly what home rule means; do not let us give way to the screw that is put upon us. I go for home rule under proper circumstances and reservations; but I abhor secession, because I know the first thing would be the military subjugation of Ireland. I have been induced to make these remarks in consequence of what was said by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire), and I thank the House for having listened to me so long. I support this Bill as a whole because I believe it is for the interest of civilization and the country, and that it will bring orderly and quiet elections. I rejoice that secret voting is included in it, because I believe it will be a protection, not—as was said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University (Mr. G. Hardy)—for the mean, the cowardly, and the dishonest; but for the educated, independent, and law-abiding electors.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he desired to call attention to the manner in which this question had been treated by the Government during the last two Sessions. At the commencement of the Session of 1869 Her Majesty's Government were advised in the Speech at the opening of Parliament to recommend that Parliament should inquire into the present modes of conducting Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, and consider whether it would be advisable to provide any further guarantees for their tranquillity, purity, and freedom. A Committee of considerable weight and authority was accordingly appointed, on the Motion of the Prime Minister, who entered fully on the whole question, and it was not too much to say that Her Majesty's Government practically delegated the authority to inquire into the matter, and people had expected with him that the Bill now before the House would be in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee. The Committee recommended that the law relating to the obtaining of seats by corrupt practices should be placed on the same footing in Parliamentary and municipal elections. They recommended a considerable multiplication of polling places in counties, and that better provision for the recovery of damages in cases of destruction of property by riotous mobs during the time of election be introduced; and, finally, although they recommended the inviolability of the vote, they, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), introduced a proviso that there should be an exception in cases where bribery or personation had been proved. Now, he had to ask if the Bill before the House contained any one of these proposals. On the contrary, it contained proposals which were negatived by the Committee, so that it might be fairly asserted that the Bill did not represent the opinions of that important Committee, but was merely a Bill forced on the Government by the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) and the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett). He had said the Committee was an important one; but he did not know if the epithet was applicable, for he thought there was some force in the remark which was made out-of-doors that, the Committee was appointed in order to afford some reasonable excuse for the conversion of the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) and the right hon. Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) to the principle of the Ballot, to which they had been so long opposed. In discussing the question of the Ballot, which he thought was by far the most important proposal in the Bill, he could not disguise his satisfaction that they had passed the period of second readings of Bills which had only been introduced to be withdrawn, and had now before them a scheme for voting by Ballot. He could hardly call it a complete scheme when he looked at the 20 pages of Amendments with which the Notice Paper had been crowded by hon. Members on the Government side who supported the Ballot on principle. It had been generally admitted in this debate, and universally admitted by the Members of the Government, that open voting was in itself preferable to secret voting, and therefore he would not attempt to argue that question. It must be clear to everyone that if secret voting offered an opportunity for fraud by allowing the voter to deposit two papers in the Ballot-box, no elector could vote twice at the same time if he gave his vote virâ voce; therefore, primâ facie, open voting was better than secret voting. But Her Majesty's Government had recommended secret voting as a remedy for the evils of intimidation and bribery, which they declared prevailed to an extent never before witnessed, and which they declared also could be remedied in no other way. He would therefore show, first, that if the Ballot were secret it would not put a stop to intimidation and bribery; and, secondly, that the Ballot, though it would be legally secret, could not in this country be practically secret, and therefore it would not only not stop those evils, but, in addition, it would give rise to others, from which up to the present time we had been free. With regard to bribery, the Committee had reported that county elections were, in the main, free from bribery. In the case of small boroughs nothing could be more easy than for a candidate to make a bargain with the leader of a club that he should pay a certain sum of money to the voters for his return. The noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland said on Monday last that that could never go on, because the leader of a club of voters would take the promises of both candidates; but he seemed to forget that the money would be paid conditionally on success, and as regarded the man who failed he would know better next time, and offer a higher price. The hon. Member who had last spoken said that secret voting would eradicate bribery and make it more dangerous. He quite agreed with the hon. Gentleman that it would make bribery more dangerous, but in this sense—that the persons who had been bribed would never be found out. In the case of large borough constituencies, an arrangement with a club of voters such as he had described would be impossible owing to the number of voters; but even if that were so, bribery would still exist in such large constituencies. Why, had hon. Members so soon forgotten the result of the Election Petition for Bristol? On that occasion a test Ballot was conducted with perfect secrecy; voting was confined to members of the Liberal party, and what was the result? Mr. Baron Bramwell's statement of the case was that on the occasion of that test Ballot, and after the receipt of the writ for the election, two agents of Mr. Robinson gave trifling sums to voters to vote for him in the test Ballot, and one agent gave drink to voters for the same purpose; some of the voters so dealt with voted in the test Ballot for Mr. Robinson; others voted for the other candidates. But did the uncertainty of the vote stop the giving? The giving of both money and drink was solely for the purpose of bribery and of inducing the men to vote in the test Ballot. Surely after that they would not hear much more of the abolition of bribery in large boroughs by secret voting. Hon. Members opposite were disposed to admit that secret Ballot would not put a stop to bribery, and he would notice the words which were addressed to the Committee by one of its members (Mr. John Bright), who had always been a consistent advocate of the Ballot, and which were afterwards inserted in the Report. These were to the effect that the Ballot would secure a greater degree of freedom and purity than was secured under the present system. And if he rightly understood the Vice President of the Council in his speech on the introduction of the Bill, he only considered that the Ballot would prevent bribery where the voter was bribed to vote against his opinions. He entirely agreed with what the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) had stated, that where one man was willing to give money for a vote, and another man was ready to give a vote for money, no legislation on the part of that House would be sufficient to prevent bribery. One of the witnesses from Australia (Mr. Guerdon) stated before the Elections Committee that in one of the Australian colonies a candidate had paid a sum of money for the conveyance of voters to the poll, although he could not possibly find out how they were to vote. And Mr. Wilson, of Tasmania, admitted, in a paper recently laid before the House, that a wealthy candidate or committee-man might sometimes offer a poor elector substantial inducements to vote in a particular way under the secret Ballot which prevailed in that colony. Turning to the question of intimidation, he did not think there was any point on which so much exaggeration had been used as on that. The hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Mr. James) the other day told the House that he would not have supported the measure were it not for the immense increase of intimidation. But if intimidation prevailed to the extent which some hon. Members appeared to suppose, he should be inclined to conclude that the spirit of liberty was so nearly extinct in this country that no change in our system of voting could possibly revive it. However, he believed it could be distinctly shown that intimidation was powerful only when there was no potent feeling on the other side, and that the slightest breath of popular excitement would be sufficient to sweep it away like a straw before the wind. Now, what was the case in Ireland? The Committee reported in very strong terms upon the prevalence of intimidation in that part of the country, and the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in his speech on Monday, stated that the present system of Irish elections was a disgrace to a civilized community. But what were the real facts which had lately happened there? They had always heard that intimidation in Ireland was the intimidation of the landlords on the one side, and the priests on the other. The hon. and learned Member for Dublin University (Mr. Plunket) the other night had very well told the House that the provisions of the Land Bill had effectually taken away the power of intimidation from the landlords. And with regard to spiritual intimidation, was there a constituency in the whole of Ireland supposed to be more under the dominion of the priests than Meath, and what happened there under the system of open voting? Why, the popular candidate was returned in spite of the priests. ["No, no!"] Well, if hon. Members said no, he could reply that that was stated in all the papers. Again, what happened in Westmeath? When the two candidates started, one of them was certainly supposed to be more the favourite of the priests than the other; but the priests found that the only way they could maintain their cause was by going in favour of the Nationalist candidate. It hardly seemed that the Ballot was necessary to put down either the landlord or priestly intimidation in Ireland. But even if it were, did any hon. Member think that spiritual intimidation could be stopped by secret voting? That was a point that scarcely needed argument. If a man believed that in a future state he would be punished unless he voted as his priest told him, he would vote in that way, Ballot or no Ballot. As to the English counties, it was said in former times that landlord influence prevailed there to a dreadful extent. They had not heard very much of that during recent debates, and the reason was because everyone was convinced that the feeling of the county constituencies was essentially Conservative. If they wanted an old Tory, they must look for him among the men who hated change, were jealous of the towns, and averse from centralization. Landlords and tenants voted together because they were bound by the same sympathies and interests, and where those interests differed on any important question the tenant would be found, as in Scotland, ready to take an independent course. What landlord in his senses would turn out a tenant for voting against him? If the tenant was a good one, the landlord would lose just as much as an employer by dismissing a good workman. And not only would the landlord lose in pocket, but his party would also lose in political influence. The Ballot would never prevent an intimidator from saying to a voter—"You shall work for my party, you shall canvass for my candidate, and support him at public meetings;" and if the elector voted for the other party at the poll, did hon. Members think he would be able to keep his secret? After the election, what would be easier than for a landlord or employer who had a great many tenants or workmen, voters in a particular district, going around and asking each how he had voted, and comparing the results with the published results of the poll, which would infallibly tell in cases where they formed a large proportion of the voters how they had voted. All the Ballot would do in that way was to afford excuse for suspicion where at present no suspicion arose. The honest voter, who wished to vote with his landlord or employer from personal attachment, which might be stronger with him than political opinion, would be subjected to suspicion, and in that way infinitely more trouble and discomfort would be caused than could be saved by doing away with intimidation. They had been told—and it was a curious instance of the argument from a less to a greater—that the secret Ballot had succeeded in Australia, and therefore must succeed here. He wished to attach every possible weight to the evidence which emanated from men who had sat in that House, and whose conduct there freed them from any suspicion of being prejudiced in favour of the Ballot. They had testified to the success of the Ballot in Australia; but they had other evidence on the point. Some years ago a gentleman, who then, as now, was a Member of Her Majesty's Government, said—

“For several years he had given but one vote upon this subject, and that was for the Ballot. Since that time, however, he had thought much on the Ballot, and the more he thought of it the less he liked it. These objections had not been lessened, but increased by his Australian experience at the Colonial Office. . . . The circumstances of Australia were so different from the state of things in the old country that no safe conclusion from the one was applicable to the other.”

The right hon. Gentleman who used those words was then Under Secretary for the Colonies, and now held the office of President of the Board of Trade. The right hon. Gentleman had changed his opinions on this subject twice already, and it was to be hoped he would change them again. He did not want to taunt the right hon. Gentleman. He would merely point out that the right hon. Gentleman was either right in the opinions he had quoted, or he was wrong. If the right hon. Gentleman was wrong, then colonial experience was not always so very valuable. If he were right, no word could express the matter better than he had put it. In almost every point the state of the Australian colonies offered scarcely any analogy to the state of this country. He would take one point—the anxiety of the rich to enter into Parliament. That was the case in this country, but not in Australia; and, indeed, all the evidence was to the contrary effect. He had himself heard that a rule in a leading Australian firm was that no partner should demean himself by entering any of the Colonial Assemblies; and, as a rule, the rich in America took very little part in politics, either as candidates or electors. There being payment there for Members, the majority of them were elected from among those who had failed in other pursuits. Some years ago Lord Lytton delivered a speech in that House in favour of the Ballot, though he had changed his opinions since, and in Rome he said that the Ballot was not effective against bribery. All barriers were in vain against the enormous fortunes and gigantic ambition of the patricians who came to the elections laden with the spoils of exhausted nations and devoted the plunder of other countries to the corruption of their own. And if we turned to the present state of our own country that description would not be so very inapplicable. So long as that House was the most powerful Assembly of its kind in the world—so long as men of the highest position and the greatest intellect desired to serve their country there—and so long as seats within those walls afforded passports into society, so long would wealthy men spend large sums to get into Parliament. They had in this country what they had not in Australia, persons ready to bribe, and others ready to be bribed; and, beyond that, we had in this country long traditions of bribery. In Australia the working classes were so independent, and were in the receipt of such good wages, that bribery would be no inducement whatever to them to give their votes. Look at the comparative position of England and Australia in reference to area and population. New South Wales had a population of 500,000, and as many square miles of territory; Victoria, 715,000 population, and 87,000 square miles; Tasmania, 100,000 population, and 26,000 square miles; South Australia 163,000 population, and 383,000 square miles; whilst England and Wales had more than 22,000,000 of population, and only 58,000 square miles of territory. In support of his second position, that a so-called secret Ballot could not be kept practically secret, the hon. Baronet quoted statements to the effect that in South Australia from 300 to 500 voters signed a requisition to a candidate, and so showed where their sympathies lay; that in Victoria the electoral agent of a candidate for a new constituency foretold within three votes the result of an election; and the statement of Lord Canterbury that in Victoria very few persons availed themselves of the secrecy of the Ballot. The great body of our race, both in England and in Australia, were much too independent to be anxious for secrecy; and they would not conceal their votes. At the election of the School Board last autumn in London the election was open in the City of London, and secret throughout the rest of the Metropolis. It was conducted with a very considerable amount of order, except in Lambeth, where there was considerable rioting during the evening, and the Ballot-boxes had to be protected by the police. But wherever you went that day you heard men openly saying for whom they voted, and showing their papers to one another, and to the agents of the candidates at the polling-places. They really could not bring about secret voting, and if there was not secrecy, then the Ballot would be of no use at all. From our own country he would turn to one whose electoral system could fairly be compared to that of England—he meant the United States. He ventured to say that in the United States they had never been able to arrive at a secret Ballot, and the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) expressed that opinion before the Parliamentary Committee. This failure had not been because they had not tried to obtain secrecy. In Massachusetts, according to the original constitution of the State, the polling was secret; but it was found that fraud arose, and then the alteration was made that the paper should be placed in the box unfolded, so that practically the vote was given openly. It happened, however, that the heads of some large manufacturing firms were accused of intimidation, and a proposal was carried for a secret vote, the voting paper to be placed in an envelope and then placed in the Ballot-box. It was feared, however, that this would so encourage fraud that they did not agree to the proposal, and the system of voting at that time in Massachusetts, though legally secret, was practically open. In Rhode Island there was secret voting from 1851 to 1854; but the inhabitants seemed to have become satisfied that such a course of proceeding was ineffectual or inexpedient, and now it was open to the voter to vote secretly or not. The Government supplied the envelopes that contained the secret voting papers; but comparatively few such envelopes were now applied for, and the number was decreasing year by year. In New York State the voting was practically so open that a skilful election agent could tell immediately on the closing of the poll, within 5 per cent, how the voting had gone; and yet in that State there was a provision that the voter should put his paper into the Ballot-box in such a way as to conceal it from the returning officer and from the bystanders. This proved that they could not have secrecy under the Ballot. Now, what was the result of the Ballot as to bribery and intimidation? In America it was impossible for landlords to intimidate tenants, because there were no tenants to be intimidated; or for employers to intimidate workmen, because the demand for labour was so much in excess of the supply that the workmen had it all their own way, and the employer, unless in exceptional cases, had no practical control over workmen. But there was a kind of intimidation that was extremely prevalent, and that was the intimidation of the mob. Respectable voters were driven from the poll by roughs, the opinions of the voters being sometimes known, but more frequently suspected. In Rhode Island also it was said that the number of those who could be bought was enormous, and many more could be influenced in various other ways, so that the State could be carried by any party who could furnish the necessary funds and the necessary influence. Professor Morse had been quoted to show that corruption was almost unknown in the United States. But this must be a play upon words. In the sense in which we used the word, corruption might be almost unknown, because in those large constituencies it did not pay to bribe individual voters with sums of money. Candidates could spend their money better in providing drink, or in inducing persons to commit frauds. There was also another mode of corruption in America, of which we happily had no experience. It was not always the candidates or the party who provided corrupt means. Corruption was carried on at the expense of the public and of the State. A system under which every person holding office, from the President to a policeman, was subject to the result of an election, afforded the strongest inducement to persons of all ranks to work for their party in the hope that either they or their friends might be elected to office; and when put into office they took care to reward themselves for their work. Every thinking man in America was of opinion that this was one of the most infamous systems ever introduced into the Government of a country. Intimidation and corruption of certain kinds being thus shown to exist in America, were there no electoral evils from which we were free? A gentleman of Philadelphia, who had been a voter for 30 years, declared that he should prefer a trial of open voting, as the frauds under the present system there were such that the result of the election seldom reflected the popular will. He was aware that the system of registration in America was open to the greatest abuses; but many frauds were also to be traced to the absence of any kind of scrutiny—the very system which the Government recommended in this Bill. The Ballot did not prevent Election Petitions in America; there were as many in proportion to the number of representatives as in England. The Report of the Committee of the House of Representatives stated that, as under the Ballot the vote could properly be known only to the voter himself, the fact must be determined by circumstantial evidence. This statement referred to a contested election in Ohio, where, therefore, members were actually unseated upon evidence which must often be of the vaguest description—so vague that in this country hon. Members admitted it would not be sufficient to induce a landlord to turn out a tenant, or for an employer to dismiss a workman. This state of things in America had led several States to adopt a system under which a scrutiny was possible. He had the honour of meeting Mr. Carr, a Member of the House of Representatives of Indiana, and for many years Member of the Committee of Elections, and he said that it had been found that in contested Election Petitions there was every reason to suppose that persons who swore they voted for A had in fact voted for B; but the Committee had to take the oath of the voter as outweighing the circumstances. In Illinois the power of having a scrutiny had long existed, and the evidence showed that it was absolutely necessary that there should be such a power if fraud was to be kept down. As to personation, it existed both in New South Wales and Queensland, and in the former it was largely increasing. In neither State was there a power of scrutiny. In Victoria there was such a power, and the evidence of its working was that it had not tended to diminish the security to the voter, nor was there any reason to suppose that the power of identification was ever used for purposes not contemplated by the law. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) admitted that safeguards were required against personation; but said it was not more dangerous under secret than under open voting. But in the one case you had means of detection which were impossible in the other. Where a well-known Conservative elector was personated by a man who voted for the Radical candidate, a case of suspicion at once arose which would not exist under the Ballot. There was one clause of that Bill which he looked upon with great suspicion, and that was the one which imposed a penalty upon those who improperly accused others of personation. But such penalties would make men very cautious how they made accusations of this kind, and the result would be that offenders would seldom be proceeded against. Charges of personation were made in the interest of the candidate who had suffered from them; but under a system of secret voting neither candidate would have any inducement to prosecute, because neither candidate would have any means of knowing with certainty how any man voted. The right hon. Gentleman also alluded to the use of forged papers, and said he had guarded against that fraud by the provision that the voting papers should be stamped. That arrangement might prove some protection; but still there would be no means of proving that the paper which any voter put into the Ballot-box was the same as the presiding officer had given him. In the case of the School Board elections he knew that it was perfectly possible for the voter to walk out of the booth undetected; but, whatever effect the provision might have in other respects, it would be no guard against any returning officer who might be tempted to commit fraud himself. He failed to perceive any provision in the Bill to prevent the tampering with the voting papers. It was all very well to say that after the election the Ballot-box would be taken away and sealed up with the seals of the candidates; but there was nothing more easy than to take an impression of a seal, open the Ballot-box, and re-seal it. There were hundreds of ways in which a fraudulent or unscrupulous returning officer might evade all the provisions put into the Bill to protect a voter against fraud. The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. R. Torrens) stated before the Committee which sat on this subject that the candidates in South Australia had complete confidence in the returning officer appointed by the Crown. In that happy country such confidence might prevail, though it did not exist in France under the Imperial régime, nor was it likely the Nationalist candidates in Ireland would have confidence in the returning officers nominated at Dublin Castle. The returning officers for boroughs in England were the mayors, and the election of mayors and town councillors depended more and more on political grounds and less on their fitness for the office. Was it to be supposed that Radical voters would on all occasions have implicit confidence in the conduct of a Conservative mayor, who appointed his assistant returning officer and the poll clerks. What happened across the Atlantic? In New York the poll clerks were appointed by non-political bodies, yet they were admitted to be open to fraud, the agents of one party bribing the agents of the other. New York was peopled by much the same race as a large portion of our constituent body; and what was to prevent the same practices being resorted to here? It had been said that the wealthiest and most educated class in the country were so debased in political principle that they only cared to intimidate all those whom they had under their influence; that the mass of the population were so ignorant and incapable of exercising the franchise properly that they wanted protection against the temptation of bribery; and that they were so steeped in hypocrisy as to pretend to support one political party and on the polling-day to vote for another. It was also said that honour had left the earth, and had taken up her abode in one class, and that class was the class of returning officers; and yet it was remarkable that a scrutiny should be objected to because they might reveal the names of half-a-dozen voters who required protection. A great deal had been said about freedom of election; but was it freedom of election if a voter could not prove to his own satisfaction that he had voted for the candidate whom he wished to support? The House might now, or at some future day, pass the Bill; but if there was any reality in the danger he apprehended it would not be long before the electors would find that secrecy had been converted into an engine of fraud, and that secrecy had been purchased at far too dear a price. This system of secrecy was foreign to the habits of England, and, repeating words used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer a short time back, he said—Non sic fortis Etruria crevit. Our ancestors won their liberty in the light of day. We enjoyed an electoral system which was free, because it was essentially public, and we might in future be left to the mercy of the decision of a tribe of officials, who were but men, and who would be subjected to every variety and amount of temptation of which human ingenuity was capable—temptation which would be irresistible because it would be impossible if they yielded to it to find them out. He admitted to the full the evils of bribery and intimidation—he regretted their prevalence; but he would trust for their suppression to the spread of education amongst the people and the growing influence of public opinion, largely increased as it had been by the extended suffrage which had been recently bestowed upon the people. He was anxious that the franchise freely given should be freely exercised; but he feared that there would be evils in the future even greater than bribery and intimidation—far more dangerous to electoral freedom—and that was an organized system of fraud; and it was because there was that danger, because in the Bill he found everything to favour such a system and nothing to check it, that he most cordially gave his vote against the Bill.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Mr. Speaker—the hon. Baronet, Sir, who has just sat down (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) has blown both hot and cold with regard to American examples. He began by admitting that America had not a secret Ballot; but he then went on to quote the perversions of the American system as specimens of the state of things which would here be created by the Ballot. America has, like France, a form of voting which is secret only if the voter wishes that it should be secret, and therefore American example is worthless, for it has no bearing on our case. The American Ballot is not necessarily secret, and if it is worth adopting the Ballot here it is worth going further than this, for permissive secrecy gives no sufficient protection against intimidation. I might, Sir, say the same of the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University (Mr. G. Hardy) in reference to Rome. I speak with all deference; but I was always taught to believe that at Rome the voters came to the poll in batches, and when actually in the booth consulted one with the other as to how they should vote, and then cast their votes together. So much for Roman and American examples. Then, Sir, the hon. Gentleman attacked the Government for introducing an inviolably secret Ballot, and for going beyond the Report of the Committee. The Committee did certainly recommend that scrutinies should continue to be possible, but they so tied up and limited the scrutiny as to make it necessary either to adopt the cheque-book plan of the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland, or the bakehouse plan of my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham), or some other intricate contrivance, before a scrutiny could be held at all. But the Government have had a year to reflect, and have naturally asked themselves whether a scrutiny is necessary, and now they offer us an inviolably secret Ballot. As, Sir, in conjunction with my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. R. Torrens) and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. James), I had the honour last year to propose to move in this direction, I, for one, am prepared to defend their step. If any hon. Member should rise in his place and should say that which no one as yet has said in this debate—namely, that he is for the Ballot, but against abolishing the scrutiny, then I would ask him, what plan he would propose. The gist of the matter is not the chance that the discovery of votes may take place under such a provision, but the danger that the beneficial results expected from the Ballot may not arise from it if the voters think—however foolishly—that a discovery of votes may take place. When, for instance, you make a man vote with cheques out of a cheque-book, numbered on their backs, and having counterfoils numbered on their faces; when the voter has to show the number on the back; when he is told that afterwards the deputy returning officer will have to place the papers on their faces and look only at their backs; but that, on the other hand, the returning officer, when the papers come to him, will have to place them on their backs and look only at their faces; I doubt whether the voter will feel persuaded that there is no danger of secrecy being invaded under such a plan. Besides, even if the voter were inclined to believe in the Ballot at first, he would not be allowed to believe in it long. Those whose interest it might be that he should not believe would soon begin to go about and say, with a wink and a shrug of the shoulders—“Oh yes, of course it’s ‘secret,’ but everybody knows how everybody else votes, all the same.” When the poor voter asked how that could be, the answer—a Quaker’s answer—would of course be the question—“Why did they number your tickets, then?” I doubt whether an intimidated voter would make much of a reply. When we inquire if a scrutiny is really needed, we find at once that the fight is over personation. Hon. Members opposite get up one after another and say that personation would be increased by the Ballot, and the hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucester (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) says so, too. Let anyone who thinks so go and talk to an old election agent. They all will tell you the same thing. They will say—“Personation is an imaginary danger.” They say—“It is a House of Commons danger”—not a danger which exists in the constituencies; a danger conjured up for the purpose of debate. Now, the hon. Gentleman opposite—who has conjured it up for the purpose of this particular debate—has quoted American example. I have already said that America has not a secret Ballot. Each State has its own system, and the systems agree only in this—that not one is absolutely secret. Still, he has referred to American example, and has followed the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. B. Hope) in quoting Mr. Hankel. Now, I do not wish to say anything hard of Mr. Hankel; but those who heard him will bear me out when I say this much—that Mr. Hankel was called to damage the Ballot and succeeded only in damaging himself. He ascribed to the Ballot all the corruption of South Carolina before the War—which is to throw a heavy weight upon its shoulders—and he traced to it in particular the personation that prevailed. He admitted, however, a little later, that the State had no registration system. So much for Mr. Hankel. Now, where can personation largely exist? In small wards or small boroughs the voters are too well known for personation to be attempted; but in big boroughs—to have any effect that is worth plotting for, and worth paying for, and worth running serious risks for—it must be done on a very large scale. It never has been so done. You cannot instance an election in England where the cases of personation were proved to have been more than a very few. Just now I asked, where are you to personate? But I will go on to ask, who you are to personate? Look at the danger of personating a man with several qualifications. Such a man, being rich, is well known, and his class is a very small one, which makes it useless to personate them. Personating a man who is going to vote on the same day in the same ward is very dangerous work indeed. Even if the man is not known to the rate-collector—not known to persons specially selected on account of their knowledge of the ward as agents for the purpose of detecting personation—still there is the risk of the other man being present at the same time. The two risks jointly are enormous. The agents for the detection of personation need not be named till the day of polling, so that for aught that the personator can tell he may find his next-door neighbour there to watch him. It is generally well known in the ward who is absent and who is bed-ridden, and the dead men will be few if you pass our much-needed Registration Bills. In all these cases, too, the risk will be no greater under the Ballot than it is now. The only difference is that you will not be quite so certain that on petition you will be able correctly to amend the “tally” or return. Of how little moment is this fact, I would ask? For years past there have only been two cases—that of Taunton, and that of Bewdley—where the return was altered, and in those cases the same result would have been brought about under this Bill. Remember that you have one most valuable new power given by this Bill—namely, that of striking off as many votes from the “tally” of a candidate as personated votes are found to have been procured for him. You might go even a step further:—you might say that when personated votes—procured or not procured—are proved to have been given—numerous enough to turn the election if all given one way—that in such cases there should be a fresh election. I have one thing more to say upon this score. Those who are opposed to the abolition of scrutinies, on the ground that you would have an increase of personation, must take care lest we be forced soon to go further than they would like, and prohibit the most fruitful of all causes of personation—namely, the voting of non-resident electors. I dare say that my own case is no unusual one; but everyone knows his own case best. I vote in nine constituencies, returning 20 Members to this House. Many of the elections take place on the same day. See what an opening for personation is thus afforded. I can offer no defence for such a state of things; but it is one which, if we throw out this Bill, we shall very soon be called on to defend. Now, Sir, those who attack the Government for making scrutinies impossible are bound either to produce a plan for combining scrutiny with Ballot, or else to declare against the Ballot altogether. Well, Sir, they have made choice of this last alternative. They have—through the voice of the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. G. Bentinck)—attacked the Ballot upon moral grounds, and attacked it also on the widely different ground that it will not have the good effect that is looked for from its adoption. With the leave of the House, Sir, I would wish for a very few moments to examine both these points, and, in the first place, that of the results of the Ballot. The hon. Member for South-west Lancashire, Sir, has done me the honour to quote my evidence as to the insufficiency of the Ballot to cope with bribery. Well, Sir, it is true that on this one point of bribery I do hold an opinion at variance with that of many of my Friends. If hon. Members ask in what manner, under the Ballot, bribery can take place, I will beg leave to tell a story. In the days of George II., a great Court lady—whom I will not name, but who had much influence with the King—betted a certain clergyman £5,000 that he would be made a Bishop. He lost, and paid his money—yet did not seem altogether displeased at this transaction. Well, Sir, will not voters bet with “Men in the Moon” about a particular candidate’s return, and will it not then be their interest to vote for the return of that candidate—who will not be sorry to lose his bet, if only he contrives to win his seat? Promises of payment conditional on a candidate’s return amount to the same thing. The common-place answer that people are too shrewd to pay money when they do not know how the bribed man will vote, is worthless as applied to this form of bribery, because by a conditional promise you make it the interest of every voter to whom such a promise is made to vote himself for his briber, and even to procure by similar bribery other voters to vote too. There is but one real answer that can be made—namely, that the facility of detection will be considerable, because conditional bribery must be worked through a man whom the voters can trust. Such a man, no doubt, is hard to find; but I fear that he can be found, and the voters will trust anybody rather than trust nobody at all. I repeat that there is reason to fear that the Ballot will not put down bribery in those small boroughs which already are corrupt; but I shall not have the cheers of hon. Gentlemen opposite when I say that the natural remedy is to do away with the small boroughs themselves. Now, Sir, the question is, whether there are not ample grounds for thinking the Ballot necessary even if it would not put down bribery? There is something that it would suppress—it would suppress intimidation. It has been said that, compared with intimidation, bribery is a small and a decreasing evil. The evidence taken by the Committee shows that this is true. I need not go into the cases. Blackburn alone would be enough; Cheshire is enough; Wales is enough; Ireland is enough. The great danger of intimidation of the Blackburn type is that it does not admit of absolute proof. Work is slack; it is impossible to prove that the men discharged have been picked for political purposes. Besides, there is intimidation that is no intimidation. You will find, for instance, in the building trade, that in boroughs where there are sharp contests, nine foremen out of ten will vote the same way as the master, though, probably, not a word has passed between them. You may say that it is the duty of voters to make sacrifices. But they do make sacrifices. If they did not, a good many of my hon. Friends in this part of the House would not be here, and several hon. Gentlemen on that side would not be there, for I do not pretend to say that the intimidation is all on one side. They do make sacrifices; but you have no right to call upon them to make those sacrifices unless stern necessity compels you so to do, and that necessity is wanting here. I think, Sir, that the Ballot will put an end to intimidation, and many hon. Gentlemen opposite, by quoting Mr. Mill, and by taking the moral objection to the Ballot, seem to think so too. Mr. Mill never denied that the Ballot would have this effect, and if hon. Gentlemen think that the Ballot would do no good, why should they resort to the moral argument at all? But, Sir, I cannot help thinking that, on the one hand, the moral argument has not been sufficiently answered in this debate; and that, on the other, it is capable of refutation. The moral objection, Sir, rests upon the notion that the voter is directly responsible to certain other persons, and that this responsibility is a dead letter unless those other persons can test him by his recorded vote. What other persons? There is a good deal in this objection when used by those who are in favour of a restricted franchise. They say, fairly enough, that if there are persons capable of exercising a sound political judgment and a wise political control, who are excluded from the franchise, the voter should be made by publicity responsible to that opinion and judgment and control. But, why exclude these persons from the franchise? On the other hand, the objection is a weak one when made use of against those of us who are in favour of a widely extended franchise. There are many who think that the franchise should be extended to all who are personally capable of forming a political opinion. Towards whom, then, from this point of view, is the voter's responsibility to exist? There is, however, Sir, a further argument of Mr. Mill's against the Ballot to which I must refer. At the time that Mr. Mill—from having been a friend—became an opponent of the Ballot, he was for a limited franchise; and when he became an advocate for an extended franchise, he ought perhaps, logically, to have returned to his former view. But he was unfortunately tempted to go beyond the argument that I just now stated, and to lay down a general proposition, that even under universal suffrage publicity would still be desirable. He said that, in his opinion, men would not cast their votes as honestly in secret as in public. He put the case of a repudiating State. Almost every voter might see his private interest in repudiation; and whereas in public his vote might be an honest one, in private he might go wrong. There are many answers that may be made. One is, that few scoundrels would be deterred by publicity in a country where the majority of voters were as great scoundrels as themselves. Another is that free institutions could not be maintained at all in a State in which the majority of the voters at the polls were scoundrels such as these. Another is that against a few cases of dishonest secret votes—which if given publicly would be honest—you have to set off many dishonest votes given under publicity, which if given secretly would be honest. This is clearly true when intimidation prevails; but even putting intimidation out of sight, there are dishonest public votes which might be honest private ones. Take, for instance, that of the man who, because his father was a Tory, or who, because his grandfather was a Whig, voted with his family party, well knowing that his honest vote would be given the other way. There is, however, a far more complete answer than any of these to the moral argument against the Ballot. Mr. Mill, when he stated it, admitted that at some times and places the Ballot might be a lesser evil than coercion. I do not know, indeed, how the contrary opinion could be maintained. On any other supposition you might have an Elective Chamber, which would represent the opinion of a small minority of the people. You might have laws passed by that Chamber in defiance of the wishes of the great majority. But, if you make this supposition—if you admit that at some times and places the Ballot might be the lesser evil, then, I would ask, is not this country one of those places, and one of those times the present? To what, after all, amounts the moral objection? The Committee expressed it thus. They said that those who hold it believe “that the act of voting is a public duty, and should involve a public responsibility.” We accept that definition; we admit that it is a public duty; and we admit that it should involve a public responsibility. But, it is because we admit this responsibility, that we argue that you should above all take care that the public receives the true opinion of each voter, and not a repetition by that voter of the opinion of some one else. There are many of us who, although we sit upon these benches, hardly look upon the Ballot as a measure to protect the poor and dependent voter in the exercise of a right. We look rather at it as a measure to secure the proper fulfilment by the voter of a duty towards the State. It is admitted that at present intimidation often prevents the voter from performing the duty that is thrown upon him by the State. If so, you are bound to see that he is put in a position which will enable him to perform that duty by giving his suffrage for the man who, in his honest opinion, is the most fit to compass the good of the whole land.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

MR. HERMON said, he was not in the House when the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Mr. James) spoke the other evening in the course of this debate, and he had been somewhat astonished since at hearing one of the statements made by that hon. and learned Gentleman. The hon. and learned Gentleman referred to the Conservative Members for Staleybridge, Ashton-under-Lyne, Stockport, and Preston, as all having changed their opinions and become converts to the Ballot. The hon. Members for Staleybridge, Ashton-under-Lyne, and Stockport were not converts, for they all came into Parliament in favour of the Ballot, and, therefore, there was no change of opinion, and as for himself (Mr. Hermon) the representative of Preston referred to by the hon. and learned Gentleman, he had never been in favour of the Ballot, and he still remained opposed to it. He was astonished to read the following passage in the report of the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton—

“No hon. Member could be unseated unless either he himself or his agents had been guilty of undue influence. But the offence was never committed by a Member or his agent, but by employers of labour interested in the candidate's success or defeat.”

On the part of the employers of labour, he indignantly denied the correctness of that assertion. If the hon. and learned Member were practically acquainted with the character of the Lancashire operatives, he would never have put such a stigma upon them. Members did not come to the House exactly in the character of delegates, bound by every expression which might have fallen from them at the hustings; but for himself he could say that if he should change his mind on any vital point, he would at once resign his seat, and ask his constituents to elect some one who would represent their opinions more correctly. In his case there had been no change of opinion; but perhaps the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) had misinterpreted what he said last year when the hon. Member proposed to take a division on a Motion for Adjournment as a division upon the Main Question, and he protested against that, stating that he should vote simply on the Adjournment, without committing himself on the Main Question. As to the general question of the Ballot, he believed that the people generally were not in favour of this measure. He found that out of a population of over 30,000,000 people there had been presented in favour of this Bill only 40 Petitions, to which were attached 7,500 signatures, and he maintained that there would have been fifty times that number if the country had been in earnest about the matter. It was singular that while the competition for admission to the Strangers' Gallery of the House often necessitated the use of the Ballot, there was no necessity to resort to it on the night this Bill was introduced. He objected to certain details of the Bill. For instance he objected to ten voters nominating a candidate, which was equivalent to singling out ten men as the only men who should declare their votes. He objected to secret voting because it was at variance with open speaking and public discussion; it would interfere greatly with the social advantages which were derivable from both Liberal and Conservative clubs as scattered up and down the country; and it would in time become a crime for one man to declare that he read The Standard, or for another to avow his preference for The Telegraph. The voters would never feel sure under the Ballot that their votes were duly recorded, and the unsuccessful candidates would never feel quite certain that they had received fair play. These were some of the serious evils in the Ballot which induced him to oppose it.

MR. BOWRING said, that on behalf of the important constituency which he had the honour to represent, he begged to offer to Her Majesty's Government his best thanks for the excellent and comprehensive Bill now under consideration. Since its introduction he, in conjunction with his hon. and learned Friend and Colleague the Solicitor General, had been taking what an hon. Friend of his below the gangway so poetically called a “bath of liberty” with his constituents, and he could assure the House that it afforded them much satisfaction that their Members had so good a towel as this Ballot Bill to dry themselves with, after performing their ablutions. He had subsequently passed his Easter holidays amongst them, and almost the universal question asked him by those whom he met was whether the Government were really in earnest in their intention to carry the Bill this year. In fact, so great was the interest which the City of Exeter had always taken in the question, so great was its anxiety to be insulted, as the hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Liddell) informed the House that it was by this Bill, that he believed that if Parliament in its wisdom should determine that before the Ballot was adopted universally it should be tried experimentally in certain districts, or even in one single place, it would only be too happy to offer itself for the purpose of having performed upon it the experimentum in corpore—he would not say vili in the case of so ancient and distinguished a city, but nobili. On the occasion of the introduction of this Bill, the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. G. Bentinck) stated his opinion that if the decision of the House upon the subject of the Ballot were taken by Ballot, a large majority would be recorded against the measure. Although he denied altogether the accuracy of this opinion, he must say that if it was accurate it offered the strongest argument which he had yet heard in favour of the Bill; for what was it but saying in other words that they, the Members of the Liberal majority, and those hon. Gentlemen opposite who, though not in very large, yet in increasing numbers, were prepared to support the Ballot, did so, not because they were in their hearts and consciences convinced that it was a just and proper measure, but because they were compelled so to vote by the pressure of the constituencies behind their backs. Now, if ever there was a question which was a constituencies' question as distinguished from a representatives' question, a question in respect of which the constituencies had a right, he would not say to dictate to, but to enforce and enjoin upon their representatives in the strongest possible manner their own opinions, it was this very question of the Ballot, for it was not a question as to how they, Members of Parliament, should record their votes in that House—for they were one and all agreed that it would be on all grounds highly improper and impolitic for them so to vote—but it was a question as to the manner in which, and the machinery by which, the electors of the country should take advantage of that great privilege which the Constitution had conferred upon them. And one reason why he especially supported at any rate the experiment of the Ballot, was that it was essentially a question of machinery, and one not involving any vital constitutional principle whatsoever. He also supported it because it was an experiment from which we could at any time retrace our steps if it were proved to be unsuccessful, and return to the present system of open voting. It was not like those great political measures from which, when once taken, there was no possibility of retreat. It was not, for instance, like that famous and fatal "leap in the dark" which hon. Gentlemen opposite took four years ago on the subject of Reform, at the bidding of their Leaders, which was avowedly intended to "dish the Whigs," and had only succeeded in "dishing" themselves, and which had landed them maimed, mutilated, and bleeding upon the opposite benches, from whence he saw but little chance of their being able to leap back again to the enjoyment of the fleshpots of Egypt, or the comfortable repose and luxurious ease of the front bench below him, upon which the Member for West Norfolk some time ago descanted so pathetically, with trembling voice and streaming eyes. They had been often told in this debate that the Ballot was a failure in America, and that therefore it ought not to be adopted in this country. His answer to that was that there were Ballots and Ballots, and that it by no means followed that because the Ballot was a failure in the United States—if, indeed, it were so—the entirely different system of secret voting proposed in the present Bill would be a failure in the United Kingdom. At any rate, he could point to the entire success which attended it in the Australian colonies, as shown by the remarkable paper which he held in his hand, where the five Governors of those colonies (three of whom—Lord Canterbury, Sir James Fergusson, and Governor Du Cane—had been distinguished Conservative Members of that House) had given such conclusive testimony on the subject, and he was not surprised that hon. Gentlemen opposite had dealt so "gingerly" with that document. He would also point to the successful working of the Ballot in almost every civilized country. Why in France, even in the darkest days of Imperialism and Ministerial control, no Government ever succeeded in ascertaining how any individual elector voted. Evidence on this point would be found in Mr. Berkeley's speech on the Ballot in 1866. But not to go out of this country for examples, he would point to the success which had attended the test Ballots in Manchester and Bristol in 1869, and the still more recent case of the Metropolitan School Board elections; and he must say that, considering the highly Conservative result of those elections, he was astonished that hon. Gentlemen opposite did not pluck up their courage and make up their minds to swallow not only without repugnance, but with real avidity, the delicious potion which was offered to them in the shape of the present Bill. As to the effect of the Ballot in checking intimidation, it seemed to him that the question scarcely admitted even of argument, and in fact all the hon. Gentlemen opposite who had spoken gave up the point, and the reports from the Australian colonies confirmed the fact. It was true that the election Judges had informed the late Committee that hardly any cases of intimidation had been proved before them. He should, indeed, have been surprised if it had been otherwise. Intimidation was precisely one of those offences of which it was almost impossible to obtain legal proof, owing to the subtle form which it usually assumed. He would mention a case within his own knowledge, in which a Member of that House was concerned, whose authority he had for mentioning it. There was a town in this country where there was a large railway locomotive establishment. Most of the men in that establishment were Liberals, and had promised their votes to the Liberal candidate at the last election. The head of the railway staff, who resided 150 miles from the place, was a strong Conservative. A few days before the election he sent down an emissary, who told the men that the Tory candidate was a great friend of his, and that he was very anxious for his success. A few minutes afterwards the emissary said incidentally to the men, when going round the yard, that the directors had resolved on a reduction in the staff, though he did not know the exact extent—a statement, bye-the-bye, without foundation. The men put these two remarks together, formed their own conclusions, and many of them, for fear of losing their places, broke their promises and voted for the Tory, happily without procuring his return. Now, this was just one of those cases of subtle and undefined intimidation which the Ballot would effectually cure, but which no law could possibly reach, although it was quite as effectual—if not more effectual—for its purpose, as the grossest and most direct intimidation. With regard to bribery, assuming that the Ballot would not entirely cure it, it would at any rate make it more difficult and more uncertain. The briber would have to bribe for the “double event” of the elector voting for his candidate, and for that candidate being successful, and the price of votes would accordingly rise in the market. And it would be found in many cases that the bribable voter, who had often a political conscience and real political opinions, would vote for the candidate whom he approved, and trust to the chapter of accidents that the candidate on the other side, on whose behalf he was to be bribed, would be elected, and he himself consequently receive the bribe offered conditionally on that event. The Governors of South Australia, Tasmania, and Queensland, had all reported that the Ballot had greatly checked bribery, and it was obvious that it would at any rate put an entire end to the description of bribery known as “afternoon” or “3 o’clock bribery.” He (Mr. Bowring) quoted the case of Sir George Jenkinson, the defeated Conservative candidate for Nottingham in 1866, who, in his farewell address, said—

Mr. Hermon

“That if the Ballot would prevent” (as it obviously would) “such wholesale purchase of votes as took place between 2 and 4 o’clock, he for one would vote for that measure, for no evil could equal the one of wholesale and open venality.”

That hon. Baronet had now been promoted to the rank of a Tory County Member, but he felt justified, after reading that extract, in challenging him to accompany him into the lobby on that occasion. He would admit that he had no abstract predilection for the Ballot, but he supported it because of the far greater evils which, even if it were itself an evil, it would cure. This was a case in which one ounce of practical experience was worth whole tons of theoretical argument, and on that ground he did not attach the weight which he otherwise should do to the well-known opinions of Mr. John Stuart Mill and the Rev. Sydney Smith, nor would he quote against them the equally great authority of Mr. Grote—whose death at the moment when the principle for which he contended was about to triumph, the country had such reason to deplore—or even seek to invoke the ghost of the late Mr. Henry Berkeley. As to Mr. Mill, he was not aware whether the result of the last Westminster election had had any effect in altering his opinion against the Ballot; but if not, all he could say was that it ought to have had that effect. With respect to the witty Canon of St. Paul’s, no one admired more than he did the humour of his treatise on the Ballot, and yet at the very moment when he wrote it he found him addressing one of his fair correspondents in the following words—“I have written a pamphlet against the Ballot, very clever of course; but the Ballot will come, write I never so wisely.” In this, as in so many other matters, the

Mr. Bowring

Rev. Sydney Smith showed himself a true prophet. He might now, perhaps, be allowed to contribute his own ounce of practical experience in the matter. When he was invited to contest the representation of Exeter, he knew that he had what President Lincoln called a "big job" before him; he had to endeavour to win for his party a seat which had been in the undisturbed possession of the opposite side for generations, and he had to oppose a leading and popular Member of the then Government in the person of its Attorney General. He therefore determined to institute an exhaustive personal canvass of the whole constituency of 5,000. He did not employ a single paid agent, and even his own professional agent refused to accept any remuneration for his services. He held his own canvassing books, and entered no elector as intending to vote for him, unless he gave him a positive promise to that effect, confirmed by shaking hands, not only with the voter, but with the voter's wife. He might mention, however, that he did not feel it necessary to kiss all the babies. Those electors who refused to pledge themselves, or who gave doubtful or hesitating answers, were entered by him as intending to vote against him. The result of his canvass was that he found a majority of nearly 700 pledged in his favour. When the day of polling arrived, however, that majority was broken down to 29, while 91 per cent of the whole constituency voted. The number of broken promises amounted to between 300 and 400. The subsequent publication of the poll-book had enabled him to ascertain who the voters were who had thus broken their pledges, and he was able to state positively that nearly the whole of them consisted of those poorer classes who were unable to resist the influences brought to bear upon them, and to which the Ballot would apply an effectual remedy. He had since conversed with many of those voters, who bitterly expressed their regret at the cruel necessity which had compelled them thus not only to break their promises, but to vote against their real convictions, constituting two distinct offences against morality. If the Ballot were adopted, a man might indeed still break his promise, but he need no longer vote against his conscience, and even from this low point of view there would in future in his case be only one offence against morality instead of two. And he had always contended that it was far better in the interests of the public at large that a voter should break his promise and vote according to his conscience than that he should keep his promise and vote against his conscience—lamentable as are both alternatives. It was true that if the Bill passed, we should no longer know how individuals voted, unless they chose to make their votes public; but we should know accurately what was much more important—namely, the real verdict of every constituency as a whole, and what was more important still, the verdict of the country at large. It seemed to him that the time was extremely opportune for passing the Bill, because there was no immediate prospect of a General Election. But municipal elections took place every year, as well as 20 or 30 bye-Parliamentary elections, and it was very desirable to try the Ballot in these cases, so as to get the machinery in good working order, and amend it, if necessary, before the next General Election. He would not contend that the case of balloting at the clubs offered any real analogy to the Ballot now proposed; but the club Ballots showed that when the upper classes desired secrecy for their own purposes they did not scruple to employ it, and certainly the secrecy of the Ballot at the clubs was impenetrable. He had never been even asked how he had voted at the elections at the clubs to which he himself belonged. He considered the present Bill to be an improvement over that of last year, because it included the case of municipal elections; it relieved candidates from the legal and hustings expenses, and, most of all, it provided for absolute secrecy. On the other hand, it seemed to him to require amending in various particulars, and he had placed certain Amendments on the Paper to carry out his views; but so great was his anxiety to see the measure passed, that if his Amendments were likely to cause delay or to lead to any discussion, he should at once withdraw them; and he strongly appealed to those friends of his who had also prepared Amendments to adopt a similar course. After pointing out that under this Bill the election Judges appointed in 1868, with salaries of £15,000 a-year, would find their occupation, like Othello's, gone, and urging the Government to utilize their services in some other manner, the hon. Gentleman said that he did not care to inquire what might be the political results of the adoption of vote by Ballot. It was possible—many persons thought it more than probable—that they would be very different from those anticipated by the particular political party which had hitherto furnished the main body of the supporters of secret voting. All he desired was that the electors of this country might henceforward be enabled to record their votes without fear or favour, and without the slightest admixture of any improper influence whatever. Speaking for himself personally, he could with truth assert that if the result of the adoption of secret voting should be to prove that he was mistaken in the strong opinion which he at present entertained that the political principles which he was proud to profess were in entire accordance with those of the vast majority, not only of the population—for of that he had no doubt—but of the electors, of the ancient city which he had the honour to represent, most cheerfully should he submit to any decision adverse to himself thus arrived at, as he should be aware that for the first time for many a long year—aye, for generations—that decision would have been arrived at without bias, fairly, freely, honestly. In his own name, and in that of his constituents, he begged to give his hearty support to the Motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.

SIR FREDERICK W. HEYGATE said, he wished, having been one of the Members of the Committee appointed to inquire into the Ballot, to make some observations, though he felt the question had been so fully argued on that side of the House that he should be content to have remained silent were it not for the remarks of the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland in regard to the Irish elections. He wished at once to state that notwithstanding that he held clearly defined opinions, he entered on the Committee determined to vote according to the evidence, a remark which it was the more important to make, because one or two of the strongest contested clauses of the Report of the Committee were carried only by a majority of 1, he himself being prevented from being present by indisposition. It seemed to him and to many other members of that Committee that nearly all the faults which were alleged against the present mode of conducting elections were susceptible of being cured by simple remedies other than the Ballot. The first remedy that had been proposed was that of the votes being given by voting papers. To an extent, however, it might be admitted that this proposal was objectionable. The second remedy was that of closing publichouses during the poll; the third, the abolition of nominations; the fourth, the non-publication of the numbers during the poll; and the fifth—the most important of all—an increase in the number of polling-places. All or any of these remedies might be adopted independently of the Ballot. The non-publication of the poll would prevent what was called “3 o’clock” bribery. With regard to the fifth mode, he knew counties in England where, when there were only three or four polling-places, much confusion existed, but where since the magistrates added largely to their numbers everything went on quietly. Sir George Lewis, in pronouncing his condemnation of the Ballot, had stated his belief that it would by no means secure secrecy of voting, because the political views of most persons were well known by those around them, and it was scarcely to be conceived that a man would pretend to hold opinions other than his own for the mere purpose of preventing his neighbours from knowing which way he voted under the Ballot. In the case of Ireland, the political opinions of a man were almost a part of his faith, and it was perfectly well known which way a man would vote before he went to the poll. A great deal of evidence had been given before the Committee with reference to the conduct of Irish elections, and no person felt more deeply than he did the scandal resulting from large bodies of troops and police being present during the elections. But the Ballot would not put a stop to that, for it was proved before the Committee that the troops were necessary to enable the people to come to the polling-place, and they would still be necessary if the Ballot was brought into existence. Lord Strathnairn stated that the people would not have been allowed to come to the poll in the Sligo election, as the supporters of the Liberal candidates would prevent them, unless the troops were there. This the Ballot would not prevent. The only way of doing it was to increase the number of polling-places. He must remind the House that when Lord Mayo proposed to increase the number of polling-places in Ireland two years ago, hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite had objected to the adoption of such a course. He hoped that, whether the Ballot were adopted or not, Her Majesty's Government, would, at all events, take care that the number of polling-places should be increased. In reference to the manner in which the observations of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) with regard to the Irish Church Act had been misrepresented, he wished to explain that all the hon. and learned Member had said was that it would be as well to make the best of that measure now it had become law. The noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland appeared to think very lightly of the possible entrance of 80 or 90 Irish Nationalists into that House; but if such a body were once to be admitted, he must ask the question put by the Duke of Wellington—"How can the Queen's Government be carried on?" And he thought it would be a very difficult one for the Government to answer. He should be the last to wish that the Irish voters should be influenced in an unfair manner; but if the legitimate influence of the landlord and of the clergy, which represented education and property, was to be altogether withdrawn, the ignorant electors would be guided solely by an unscrupulous Press, such as existed in some parts of that country, and such as the noble Lord had found it necessary to place restrictions upon. He believed the fear of such a large number of Nationalists entering that House was premature. He did not think there would be anything like that number. It was more probable that there would be 50 or 60 Irish Members on one side and 40 or 50 on the other, and then the Representatives of Ireland would be so equally divided that they would practically have little or no influence at all on the Government of the Empire. What, he asked, was a Nationalist? It seemed to him that he was a man who had not thought over what was likely to be the result of his views and opinions, because if he had done so he would see how impracticable and impossible they were. The people of Ulster, he believed, would not go in for Nationalist principles, because one of the objects of the Nationalists was to have denominational education. He did not think the Ballot ought to be looked upon as a political question; but he could not see that it was at all necessary for curing the evils which undoubtedly existed to some extent in connection with elections, and which he believed could all be cured without it. After being condemned as it had been by Lord Palmerston, Lord Russell, Sir George Lewis, and other high authorities, it was astonishing that the Ballot should now be taken up as a Cabinet question. He could only account for the conviction now entertained by many on that subject in three ways. In the first place, many persons on reading the accounts of the bribery, intimidation, and other evils attending elections were so impatient that, although those evils were now gradually decreasing, they flew to the Ballot as a means of extirpating them. In the next place, some men accepted the Ballot because they thought it would help, or at least would not hurt, their party; and lastly, some advocated it because it would settle the question. Now, he maintained that that was not a question which pressed or was one of any very great interest, and the idea of adopting a thing that was wrong because they thought they would settle the question by it was most absurd. In conclusion, he hoped the House and the country would pause long before assenting to that measure, which would be very difficult to work, and was utterly at variance with the whole spirit of our free institutions.

SIR HEDWORTH WILLIAMSON admitted that he was a comparatively recent convert to the Ballot; but experience had convinced him that it was necessary if the present enormous election expenses were to be reduced, and for that reason he should vote for the Bill. In his own case his election expenses were £700 in 1864, when there was no contest. In 1865 his and his Colleague's expenses were £6,000; and his opponents' were £6,000, besides £2,500 that was disallowed. Three years afterwards he had another contested election, and his and his Colleague's expenses were £12,000, and his opponents' were £15,300. In all the above cases he had quoted only the published expenses, and he need not say that the actual cost was never less than the published returns; and he unhesitatingly declared, in answer to the challenge of the hon. and learned Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. A. Cross), that he believed the money was fairly spent. The major part of the money went in canvassing, and as long as that practice was allowed large expenditure would be common, and the doors of the House would be shut to comparatively poor people. Even in the recent short contest for Durham the expenses of the successful candidate were published at £1,200, and of the unsuccessful one at £600. He believed that the Ballot would considerably reduce those expenses, and he should therefore support the Bill.

MR. DIMSDALE said, that it would no doubt be found, as had been anticipated, that on the division on this question many hon. Gentlemen on both sides would be found in the same lobby with those from whom they ordinarily differed. He protested against any attempt being made to bribe Members on that side of the House by the statement that the Ballot would not be dangerous to Conservative interests, because the Conservatives had never based their opposition to it on the narrow ground that it might turn to the advantage or disadvantage of a political party. They opposed it because they objected to its essential principle, because it removed the voter from those influences of publicity to which he ought to be subject, because it shrouded in mystery the most solemn act which as a citizen he could be called upon to discharge. The argument that the suffrage was a trust was rather an artificial one, something like the social compact; it did not seem to come home to us. But he agreed entirely with Mr. Mill that the duty of voting should be performed under the eye and criticism of the public, not because the suffrage was a trust which the voter held on behalf of the non-elect, but because, being a public act, he was bound to perform it for the good of the community, and in the full view of the community. It was said that the arguments used in support of the Ballot outside the House did not justify its adoption in the House. But if the object of the Ballot was to free the voter from the pressure of external influences, would not the Home Secretary have been very glad to submit his Licensing Bill to Members who were free from the influences brought to bear upon them by the temperance societies on the one hand and by licensed victuallers on the other? Some persons might say that if votes had been given by Ballot in the House of Commons, the decision on the Reform Bill of 1867 and upon the Irish Church Bill might have been different. At all events, taking one of the points which had arisen incidentally out of the Irish Church question, he thought it could not be doubted that if the vote of hon. Members had been taken according to their real convictions, concurrent endowment would have been passed by large majorities. Three evils beset our electoral system—treating, bribery, and intimidation. Now, the Ballot could not possibly prevent treating, which was expected to exert nothing more than a general influence in favour of candidates. It could only prevent a corrupt bargain directly made between the candidate and the voter. Clause 27 of the Bill, forbidding committee meetings in public-houses, would do something to put down treating. As to bribery, he might remind the House that Lord Macaulay did not agree with Mr. Grote on the effect of the Ballot, which he considered rather as a remedy for intimidation. The effect of the Ballot would be to change the character of bribery rather than to diminish it; the constituency would be gained over in the mass instead of in detail. That was very much the tendency of the evidence given by the hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Dilke), and it was borne out by the testimony of the late Mr. Coppock, who had large experience of elections, and who said that as candidates were now found willing to give £3,000 or £4,000 upon the chance of their return, they would be willing to give £5,000, £6,000, or £7,000 when it could be made a certainty, the money not being paid till the seat was secured. In his opinion the real source of bribery was political apathy. People who did not care on which side they voted, would vote either for the candidate who paid them best, or in accordance with the wishes of their masters or landlords. On the contrary, if they had strong political convictions they would vote accordingly. The Rev. Mr. Jones, a Dissenting minister in Monmouthshire, gave evidence that in 1858-9 there had been a great majority for the Tory candidate; but at the last election the Tory candidate never even went to the poll. This showed that in mere questions between the "ins" and the "outs" the people took very little interest; but when a question such as that relating to the Irish Church was raised, the strong anti-endowment feeling of the people was stirred, and they acted upon their convictions. Many Members were disposed to take a very loose view of this question of the Ballot, and to say that if it were carried things would go on very much as they did at present. But Gentlemen who believed that they could evade responsibility by such a line of conduct were very much mistaken, for measures once passed by the House were attended with results which could never have been anticipated. When the Reform Bill was under consideration in 1867, very much the same kind of language was used as that now employed in speaking of the Ballot; but since that time the Church Establishment in Ireland had been destroyed, and principles had been laid down which, if pushed to their legitimate results, would destroy every religious Establishment in this country; and the principles of land-tenure in Ireland had, moreover, been revolutionized in a manner which might one day re-act upon this country. Lastly, a measure of education had been passed which—he said it to the credit of the householders' Parliament—would not have been passed, he believed, by any previous Parliament. Anyone comparing the present Parliament with that of 1869 must see how wide the difference was; yet the change which had occurred would be as nothing compared to that which must occur if the Ballot were to be adopted. The experiment had never yet been tried of conducting an election in which, as Lord Macaulay put it, there would be no influence, legitimate or illegitimate. In quiet times, political tendencies under the Ballot would drive hither and thither; but in times of passion decisions would certainly be arrived at which nobody could look forward to with pleasure. Having quoted a passage from the writings of Mr. Mill to the effect that 30 years ago the Ballot might have guarded the voter against evils then threatening him, while the greatest evil now to be guarded against was the selfishness of the voter himself, the hon. Member invited the House to forecast to some extent the future, and see what would be the probable result of the Ballot. Under it, in the first place, no adequate security was provided against the evils of personation. Twelve months ago both the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) proposed measures having for their object to guard against personation; but for some reason, which had not been sufficiently explained, those securities had dropped out of sight. The correspondence relative to the Australian colonies showed that under the Ballot system personation was a thing of frequent occurrence, and in proof of this assertion the hon. Member read passages from the communications of Lord Belmore and Governor Du Cane. He admitted the force of the argument made use of by the Vice President of the Council, that the time to detect personation was before the voter gave his vote. But if this were so, it became clearly indispensable that by the multiplication of polling-places facilities should be granted for detecting fraudulent voters. Having represented a small borough for some years he knew the practical impossibility in such places of polling fictitious votes; and there was this additional consideration in favour of establishing numerous and localized polling-booths, that these would render unnecessary the payments for conveyance of voters to the poll, always a fertile source of corruption. It was plain, upon the evidence, that the Ballot in Ireland, while it would diminish legitimate influence, would not diminish illegitimate influence. Mr. Norwood, one of the witnesses, declared that, from the unbounded influence which Roman Catholic clergymen exercised over their flocks, if they were to ask a man how he had voted he would immediately declare what he had done. The Ballot, therefore, while it would secure freedom against the landlord, as against the priest, would not be secret voting. Having accordingly swept away the influence of the Protestant clergyman and the landlord in Ireland by this Bill, the people would now be handed over to the dominance of a religious caste. Ten thousand times greater evils were to be expected from the establishment of such a system than from any evils which bribery or intimidation could produce. The Ballot, again, would enormously increase the influence of the various small but active political sections of the community, which our great party organizations had hitherto controlled and kept in check. It would be found impossible in practice to return from one constituency two, three, or four representatives possessing similar views; for the elections would be at haphazard, and each political section would concentrate all its strength upon the particular candidate favoured by it. The late Mr. Cobden had been of the same opinion, and plainly declared that the adoption of the Ballot would lead to the splitting up of constituencies into wards, each returning but a single Member. The Bill contained valuable provisions, not connected with the Ballot, that would tend to diminish bribery and corruption, and he thought it but fair to express plainly his approval of those parts of the measure. For instance, the abolition of public nomination would be a great boon. Everyone knew the candidates a long time before the nomination. Nomination, as now carried on, was a useless form, and productive of great expence. The nomination day was an idle day, and after the nomination the electors did not know what to do with themselves. They were brought to the hustings at the expense of the candidates to swell the majority, and he thanked the Government for having introduced the abolition of the nominations in public into their Bill. When the proper time arrived he should state his objections to the system of paid canvassers, and he believed that if the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) persevered in his Amendment he would receive support from many independent Members who sat on the Opposition side of the House. In his opinion, the Ballot was a superstition of Liberalism. In 1848, when the middle classes rallied round the Monarchical institutions of the country, Mr. Hume introduced what he called the Lesser Charter, two articles of which had been already enrolled in the Statute Book—namely, the abolition of the property qualification and household suffrage. Mr. Cobden said the Ballot and triennial Parliaments would be immediately carried. But who wanted triennial Parliaments? Who was there who would not regard triennial Parliaments as an intolerable evil? He regarded the Ballot in the same light. If this Bill were so extended as to include in its operation the proceedings within the House itself, hon. Gentlemen opposite who now intended to vote in its favour would decline to do so—a fact which exhibited, in marked contrast, their Parliamentary opinions and their real convictions. He sincerely trusted that the House would consign to oblivion this superstition of Liberalism.

MR. O'CONOR, as an Irish Member, wished to treat the subject from an Irish point of view. The Committee on Parliamentary Elections reported that under the present system there existed in many Irish boroughs and counties no such thing as freedom of election. In that opinion he entirely concurred, and therefore he should cordially support the measure now under discussion. He had no wish to curtail the legitimate influence of the landlord; but this would continue after the operation of the Ballot, which would only operate to destroy for ever the influence that was illegitimate. In the case of the Sligo election he had stumbled on a tenant who had produced to him a letter by his landlord which was produced in Committee, to the effect—"I shall carefully watch how every tenant votes, and it will greatly influence me in all future transactions with him." After that would any gentleman tell him that that was not landlord intimidation? The very character of landlord intimidation was such that it was impossible to prove it in a court of law. The hon. and learned Member for Dublin University (Mr. Plunket) said there could not be intimidation now since the Land Bill was passed. But notwithstanding the Land Bill there was still one form of intimidation which it did not touch. The Land Bill did not cover cases of eviction for non-payment of rent. Now, as the custom in Ireland was for half-a-year's rent, or hanging gale, to be always in arrear, when a tenant who had not voted with his landlord went up with his half-year's rent, never expecting to be called on for the remaining half-year's, he could be met by the landlord turning round and demanding payment for the whole year, and the tenant must either pay or the landlord would evict him. They had, therefore, to pause before coming to the conclusion that the Land Bill was a perfect remedy for landlord intimidation. As to mob intimidation, a great deal of that had sprung up with the consent of the tenants themselves, and it was not uncommon for people to go about the country at night, and take tenants out of their beds and give them a friendly shaking that they might be able to go to their landlords next day and say they had been threatened. At the last Sligo election, at the request of a person in the county, 20 companies of military and 1,120 constabulary were employed, not in escorting voters who wished to be escorted, but in carrying off voters about a week previous to the polling, in order that they might be locked up in houses where no one without the permission of the landlord could see them. On the day of polling they were brought up to the poll, with the landlord on one side and the agent on the other. That was nothing new in Ireland. That was done in the name of the freedom of election—because we were so manly that we could not tolerate secret voting. The present system caused disaffection to the Government. The people believed they were bound to go with the Army. It had been objected that the Ballot would leave spiritual intimidation untouched; but no system of voting, whether secret or open, could affect in the slightest degree the influence which the opinion of the priests exercised on the minds of the voters who asked them to advise how they should vote. The hon. and learned Member for Dublin University had said that if this Bill passed there would be 60, 70, or even 90 Nationalists returned from Ireland to that House. Now, if those who wanted “home rule” formed a majority of the electors of Ireland, no doubt a large number of Nationalists would come to that House, whether there was secret voting or not. The only difference would be that with secret voting they would be returned in a peaceable and orderly manner; with open voting, amid scenes of disorder, confusion, and riot. On the other hand, if those in favour of “home rule” were but a minority of the electors of Ireland, then the best protection against the secret societies would be the Ballot, for wherever secret societies existed, though the members were few in number, they were able to influence the bulk of the electors, who were afraid to go openly against them. If Parliament wanted to compete with the secret societies in Ireland, the only way to do it was by the secret vote.

MR. GRAVES said, that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had painted a very sad picture of political life in Ireland. He had told the House that what with the landlord on the one side and the mob on the other, the voter was totally unable to exercise his right of voting freely. It was to be regretted, however, that the hon. Member had not continued his argument, and shown in what way secret voting was to alter this state of things. Considering that they were now drawing to the close of a Session not very conspicuous for practical legislation—in point of fact, a Session notorious for barren results—it was to be regretted that the short time left at the disposal of the House should be taken up by the discussion of a measure which could not be considered pressing, and which, if it had its proper title, should be called “A Bill for enabling the people of this free country to conceal their political opinions.” He had generally understood that a Government, in bringing forward important measures, and in the preference which it gave to those measures, would consult, to some extent, the requirements of the country, and allow some pressure from without to be brought to bear before proceeding to make a fundamental change in one of the great institutions of the country. If there had been any pressure it certainly had not come from without. It might have been within the Cabinet; but no one could say that the public Press had goaded on the Government, nor had Members any intimation through the usual channels that the country demanded this measure. The Petitions presented in its favour had been very few, and he was not at all satisfied that the Government were justified by any public demand for this Bill in casting aside or throwing overboard measures of the greatest importance to the social welfare and the commercial interests of the country. He referred to two measures, the one connected with the sale of intoxicating drinks, which, without even testing the opinion of the House, the Government had deliberately thrown aside, and that in the face of pressure from without such as we have rarely known; and the other a measure dealing with the shipping interest, for which the country had been pleading for years. Three Bills in succession had been introduced on that subject, but only to be subject to the announcement from the Government that they must pass over to another Session. These were measures which might fairly have taken precedence of this question. ["No, no!"] He could not expect that all hon. Members should assent; but some at least agreed with him that the selection of this measure at the close of the Session was ill-timed, and as such was not satisfactory to the country, though it might be to the majority of the Members of that House. In taking exception to the Bill on the ground that there was no pressure from without, and that the country viewed it with indifference and apathy, he would be met by the argument that for 30 years this question had been before the House, and had been discussed year after year. But hon. Members who had more experience of the House than himself would remember that for a long time its discussion was regarded as a source of amusement; and that it was not until Her Majesty's Government took it up, bare and worn-out as the question was, that it acquired anything like solidity, and that the country really felt that Parliament was called upon to make a great and fundamental change in our institutions. If there was one thing more than another which was admitted in the course of the debate, and which a large amount of confirmatory evidence had established, it was that there had been a great improvement in the manner of exercising the franchise, and that year by year, owing to the growth of public opinion, to a better tone in regard to our moral and political obligations, and possibly also to recent legislation, elections in this country had become more and more pure. He would admit that there were, unfortunately, exceptions. We had 2,000,000 of voters, and probably 1 per cent of the number was corrupt. He felt, therefore, he was justified in saying that exceptions of that kind were not of sufficiently grave a character to hang a strong argument upon in favour of an entire and complete subversion of our elective system. The exceptions were confined very much to our smaller constituencies; but he would appeal to hon. Members to say whether those constituencies were not gradually improving and following the example of the larger towns, which were comparatively free from impurity? He would ask the Government to place a little more faith in our recent legislation and the improved tone of those whom he must call the corruptors of public morality; above all, to place more faith in the people, and to give more time for the spread of the improvement to which he alluded. To quote his own experience, he might mention that the town with which he was connected numbered some 500,000 inhabitants; that the number of voters was some 40,000; and that at the last election some 33,000 or 34,000 of that number exercised the right of voting between the hours of 8 in the morning and 4 in the afternoon. The contest on the occasion was an unusually severe one, because, unhappily, sectarian prejudice was mixed up with political feeling; but it was remarkable that, nevertheless, scarcely an angry word was heard to have been uttered during the day, that the most perfect order and freedom prevailed at the polling-booths, and, stranger than all, that scarcely an intoxicated man had been seen in the streets that evening. Lest he should be accused of exaggeration, he had taken the precaution to ascertain whether his impressions were correct, and he had obtained a return from the head constable of Liverpool, which showed that the number of persons who had been booked as drunk in the week before the election was 207, the week of the election 223, and the week after 301. Now, in that constituency he felt bound to tell the House there was no need of the Ballot. He did not think that under any system of voting which could be devised by human ingenuity a result more satisfactory than that which he had just described could be produced, and he hoped that before the debate closed hon. Members opposite who represented large constituencies would favour the House with the results of their experience and free their constituencies from the suspicion that impurity and intimidation existed there. One of the questions which had been put to him by his constituents was whether he was of opinion that the franchise should be exercised viva voce or by Ballot, and he adhered to the opinion which he had always maintained that the Ballot afforded no remedy for the evils complained of. The defeated candidate, however, on the occasion to which he was referring, was an advocate of the Ballot, and yet he was defeated by something like 1,700 votes. In Manchester, too, the gentleman who was at the head of the poll was not an advocate of the Ballot; he was, on the contrary, opposed to it. Thus in Liverpool and Manchester, constituencies numbering not far from 1,000,000, or one-twentieth of the population of the entire country, Members were returned pledged to oppose a Bill such as that before the House. However well the machinery of the Ballot might have answered some years ago, when great intimidation prevailed, and there was not that liberty of action and freedom of thought which now existed, it was not, in his opinion, at all suited to the present day. We had happily, he believed, arrived at a time when anybody who attempted to intimidate would be simply punishing himself; and as to having recourse to corrupt practices, the exposure which inevitably followed would to a great extent, if not entirely, put an end to them. The real remedy for the evils complained of, so far as they existed, was a higher development of our moral and political tone, improved education, and a loftier standard of public duty. To seek to stop corrupt influences by means of the Ballot was like attempting to stop the mountain torrent where it trickled into the lake. The evil must be grappled with at the source, not at the termination. He wished, in the next place, to say a few words with respect to the Committee which had sat upstairs, and of which he was a Member. The evidence given before that Committee was probably slightly in favour of the Ballot, yet there was a great deal of evidence against the adoption of the system. It should also be borne in mind that the evidence produced in favour of the Ballot was mainly due to the efforts of an organized society, while on the other side there were merely volunteers, or such witnesses as individual Members of the Committee might have happened to know as likely to come before it. The year previous to that on which the Committee closed its labours it occurred to him that the inquiry had been of a very superficial character; and he had, accordingly, moved a Resolution to the effect it should, before concluding the inquiry, seek in other countries in which the Ballot was in use some fuller evidence. That Resolution was, however, negatived, as was also a similar Resolution which referred to the fact that evidence had been received from only two or three of our colonies in the following year. Now, the Report of the Committee was based very much on evidence which had been received from Australia, where, as was well known, there was no such public interest taken in politics as in this country. The Governor of South Australia, indeed, had alluded to that in particular, and had stated that not more than 60 per cent of those who were entitled to take out a right of voting ever took sufficient interest in the matter to ask to have their names placed on the register. Reports had been obtained from the Governors of our Australian colonies generally, as to the working there of the Ballot. Why, then, he should like to know, was no attempt made to ascertain the state of feeling on the subject which prevailed in the great Dominion of Canada, which lay side by side with a country in which the system had been thoroughly tested, and which was inhabited by a large number of French Canadians, who entertained sympathies favourable to French institutions? If the Government had called for the views of the Canadians on the question, they would have been informed that no later than last Session a Bill had been introduced into the Legislative Assembly for the purpose of changing the mode of voting from virâ voce to the Ballot, and that it had been rejected by a large majority. He would now turn to the United States. America always used to be put forward as their great guide on this question; but now it suited the advocates of this change to ignore altogether the operation of the Ballot in the United States, and to say that Australia should be their guide in bringing about this great change. Now, he held in his hand the Report of the Committee which inquired into the New York election frauds in 1869. The Committee declared that these frauds were so varied in character that they comprehended every known crime against the elective franchise; that they corrupted the administration of justice, degraded the judiciary, defeated the execution of the laws, subverted for the time being in New York State the essential principles of popular government, robbed the people of that great State of their rightful advantages in the election of President, Vice President, Governor, and other officers, disgraced the most popular State in the Union, and encouraged the enemies of Republican government to decry its institutions as a failure. More recently still the Governor of New York, in his Message to his House of Assembly, said that all laws and measures to aid in establishing purity of election would fail if they did not reach this great evil, that no power would guard the Ballot-box if the voters were influenced by the corruption of money. It was money, not measures, that secured the result of an election. This influence pervaded all society, and it was practised with impunity because the offenders could not be convicted and punished. From the impression that he derived from a personal visit to that country very recently, however, he was bound to say that in this country individual corruption was more frequently practised than in America; but in America it was the corruption of party platforms, and through the operation of the Ballot the independence of the voter was lost, because it passed into the hands of committees and party wire-pullers. These influences managed elections and they corrupted the constituencies. He noticed with regret that there was not in America the same ambition among the leading men to enter public life that existed here. On the contrary, there they rather shunned taking part in Parliamentary representation, and he hardly met an enlightened citizen who did not join in the regret caused by this circumstance. He feared that in our own country the Ballot would cause a worse state of things than existed at present. He was bound to say, however, that when he went into the West and got among the farmer class he found an entirely different state of things to what he had seen elsewhere; and it was, in his opinion, of great value to that country that it had so steady an influence in the farmer class. He passed some time in Kentucky, where he was astonished to find that the institution of free voting was practised as in this country, and the feeling there was that there was less corruption, quite as much freedom, and quite as much quietness in the elections as in those States where there was secret voting. The people said they should be sorry to change their system of open voting for secret voting, and his impression was that in Virginia the same system prevailed. Whilst condemning secret voting he must, however, say that it conduced to great quietness in time of elections, and he had no doubt that it would prevent intimidation if there should be any attempt to practice it. In Cincinnati where an election was going on he should scarcely have known it, and therefore he admitted that the Ballot produced quietness and order in elections. He could not, however, see how the Ballot would in any possible degree prevent bribery and corruption, on the contrary, he was firmly convinced that it would increase bribery and corrupt influence. It could not be otherwise, because bribery and corruption were now practised when the voter gave his vote in the face of day, and it was clear to his mind that these influences would be increased and aggravated if the vote were given in secret, without the possibility of the bribery being detected. The Committee upstairs recommended that the result of the poll should not be publicly announced, and that publichouses should not be used for committee-rooms. If these and other suggestions were carried out elections might be made more orderly than they now were, without the necessity for the Ballot. What reasons were there for bringing in this Bill at this moment? They had been told it was no party question, and in one sense this was probably right, for it was difficult to say what might be the result. A working man in his town informed him the other day that the effect of the Ballot on his constituency would be bad for him, because the voters would not take the interest in elections that they had hitherto done, for, said he, so long as they could have their fights and their contests—[Cheers]*—*he did not mean physically, but morally—so long as they could have their struggles in support of their convictions, and showed to their fellow electors how they recorded their votes, they had an interest in the election; but now that they were to have secret voting, nothing, said his informant, would induce him to give up his time and his pay to record his vote. It was important for the future of this country that they should induce every man who was capable of giving a conscientious and deliberate opinion upon the public questions of the day to do so, rather than that he should take no interest in them. There were no doubt reasons of party exigency which had induced the Cabinet to bring forward this measure. There were some, indeed, who said that, while the Irish Church Bill had been introduced to cement a party and the Irish Land Bill to ingratiate a party, the Ballot Bill had been brought forward for the purpose of satisfying, he would not say a disorganized, but a dissatisfied party. He thought it unfortunate that there were indications of any influence being at work except that resulting from the real requirements of the country. They all ought, in their representative and individual characters, to endeavour to throw over those private and individual feelings, and take their stand upon the broad question of what does the country want, and he could not help thinking that in the long run any Government would find that to be their best policy, rather than narrow it to one of party interests. The introduction of the measure had been ill-timed, and it would have been wiser, after the political revolution that took place two or three years ago, if they had given the country a little rest. There existed symptoms of disquiet, and the proposal of this measure would only pander to the desire for change. In the highest interests of the country it would have been wise, at any rate, to postpone the measure to a later period. He was satisfied in his own mind that the measure of the Government would not remedy, but would rather aggravate, the evils complained of; and he was convinced, too, that it would not tend to elevate the habits or character of the people of this country, either morally or politically. He had, therefore, made up his mind to record his vote in favour of the Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, although the question of the Ballot was one in which he felt deep interest, yet but for the accident that he had charge of the Bill, he should not have thought it necessary to address the House, especially as the debate, which had been carried on with great ability on both sides, was not one which the friends of the Ballot could look upon with regret. His hon. Friend who had just spoken must excuse him for not going into the grounds on which the Government had given up certain measures, as that was a matter apart from anything now before the House. Against the evils said to be attached to the system of voting in America security was taken by the mode of Ballot proposed in the Government Bill, and he would remind his hon. Friend that the two States to which he alluded as having maintained open voting were the two States where slavery had been long upheld. He agreed with his hon. Friend that the machinations of the wire-pullers formed one of the greatest dangers of America; but he believed that the Ballot which it was proposed to establish would tend to defeat such machinations if attempted in this country. His hon. Friend asked why was the Ballot before the House at that moment? and to that question he answered that the Bill was introduced almost immediately after the meeting of Parliament; and from the time of the delivery of Her Majesty's Speech until then it had been well known that the Government thought it their duty to press with all power and earnestness for a settlement that Session. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. G. Hardy) expressed surprise that the Liberal party in that House were combined on that question as they had never been combined before. The explanation was perfectly easy. Hon. Members opposite said that that question was viewed by the country with apathy and indifference. He was convinced that there was no question on which the country at that moment felt more or as much interest. ["No, no!"] When hon. Gentlemen said "No," they, no doubt, spoke from their experience of their constituents; but they (the Ministerialists) must be allowed to appeal to their experience, and after all they were at the present moment, as had been often acknowledged, a majority in that House. It was no wonder that the majority of the House were strongly in favour of the immediate settlement of the question, because they knew that the majority of their constituents were in favour of its immediate settlement. He did not believe any hon. Member on either side of the House doubted that if from any accident whatever connected with that question, or any other, they were to go back to their constituents, that House would be replaced by one in which there would be a different feeling on that question, or that the new Members would not come there determined to settle it. The right hon. Member for Oxford University might have had no difficulty in discovering that the Reform Bill which the Conservative Government brought forward, and which the Liberal party had helped them to pass, had made the majority of the constituencies of the country, who before were not in favour of the Ballot, the friends of the Ballot at the present time. The Government felt that the question must now be settled, because it had been acknowledged on both sides of that House, and in both Houses of Parliament, that if there was a question which pre-eminently concerned the constituencies, and upon which their views and wishes ought to be considered, it was the mode of conducting elections. He was not surprised that the new voters, and especially the poorer portion of them, were in favour of the Ballot. The reason might be wrapped up almost in a sentence; it was that they wished to be let alone, and to vote just as they might think fit. Let hon. Members opposite try and put themselves in the position of one of the poor new voters. The voter found a new right given to him, or acknowledged, and found a new duty imposed upon him; he had to exercise this right to perform this duty—he (Mr. Forster) was not going to enter into the disputed question of the trust—but he found that this vote was an object of desire to other men; that men wanted to get that vote for their own purposes, and that they were stronger and more powerful than himself; and he claimed to be allowed to vote in secret because he wanted to exercise his right and to do his duty in accordance with the dictates of his conscience and without being tempted by rewards, bullied by threats, or teased by solicitations. This was the real secret of the desire for the Ballot among an immense majority of the new constituents, and it seemed to him perfectly natural that they should seek to obtain it. With such persons the Ballot was not a mere Shibboleth of party, or a kind of superstition; they wanted it simply as a protection, and many of the arguments which had been used on the opposite side would be almost unintelligible to them. It was well known that there was nothing so likely to stop trade as a feeling of uncertainty about the delivery of goods. A man would not like to put down his money in a publichouse for a pot of beer if he thought that it might be drunk by somebody else—and to his mind it had always appeared that the Ballot would be the greatest blow at bribery, as well as the greatest protection against intimidation. There had been an air of unreality about the debates on that question. He thought he would not be convinced—in fact he was not quite sure that his moral sense would not be shocked to see the anxiety which appeared to be felt by hon. Members to hold up public opinion as a tribunal of appeal on which he might rely. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University said the other night that any public opinion was good. He was not sure the right hon. Gentleman would hold to the words, but he noted them down at the time, and he found, on referring to the usual mode of correcting them next morning, that he was quite correct; but he was sure the right hon. Gentleman did not mean to draw the same inference from it that a working man would draw. It showed, however, how dangerous this kind of argument was of holding up public opinion as a tribunal by which he should be guided; in other words, that public opinion must bring him to vote according to his conscience. What would be his reply? That he wanted to be left to his conscience, without any power to coerce or persuade him. They must have power to coerce, to bribe him, because he would not have public opinion to act on him. What was public opinion to him? It was the opinion of the landlord, who might raise his rent—of his employer, who might turn him off—of a trade's unionist or a member of some secret society, who might denounce him. That was the way in which public opinion bore on him, and no argument as to the necessity of bringing him before it would in the slightest degree diminish his desire to obtain the protection of the Ballot. He might be told that this was unreasonable. Now, he was not going to read extracts; but it did surprise him that those who took part in the Committee should come forward and speak of the evils they had to guard against as if they were not great evils. In the Report made by the Committee there was a complete, candid, outspoken acknowledgment that in both municipal and Parliamentary elections there were these evils to contend against—at municipal elections bribery to a great extent, intimidation perhaps not to so great an extent; and at Parliamentary elections, intimidation to a greater extent and bribery to a less extent. He could read extracts from the earlier clauses of the Report unanimously agreed to by the Committee, which completely acknowledged these great evils; but the Members of the Committee, who spoke from the other side, told them that these evils were ceasing and need not be guarded against by the Ballot. It was remarkable there was not the slightest allusion in the Report to this hopeful result. He did not find that one of those Members had ever made such a proposition during the deliberations of the Committee, or had ever expressed such hopeful views as the result of their careful investigations that they believed the evils of bribery and undue influence were diminishing and would soon disappear. He was surprised that his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. A. Cross) who made the Motion they were now discussing with such moderation and ability had not brought forward the opinion he now expressed so strongly at the time the Report was being drawn up. His hon. and learned Friend said they were advancing steadily towards purity and freedom of election—and the words were impressed on his (Mr. Forster's) memory by the cheer of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), for this was the first time he had ever heard that hon. Gentleman acknowledge that progress had been made in anything—but they did not find anything of that kind in the Report of the Committee. Were the evils against which they had to contend really diminishing? He saw influences in favour of purity and freedom of election. There was the Bill they passed last year. He was hopeful of the result of that Bill; but he certainly could not put off the reform of the electoral system till they saw such a result. In addition to that there was, no doubt, much progress in prosperity, in political knowledge, and political accountability; he trusted also there was an increasing independence among the great body of voters. But there were other influences which must not be forgotten. Side by side with the increased prosperity of the working classes there were great accumulations of wealth. Every wealthy man would be more and more powerful and more anxious to realize that power. [Cheers.] He was delighted to hear hon. Members opposite concur in that opinion. In addition to that there was the danger alluded to by the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves), the consciousness of which danger he viewed in a different light from the hon. Member. He would not now discuss the question arising between the employer and the employed. He would only say that he looked forward to the Ballot as a means of enabling them to enter upon the consideration of these questions in the hope of a beneficial result. He would take a single illustration. Large employers of labour, who were attaining great wealth, were anxious to obtain power in that House. Now, was it to be supposed that they would be able to use it without some counteraction on the part of those whom they employed? What would be the result? There would be wealth on one part—organization on the other. He trusted, after the settlement of this question, that on all class questions there would be as little of those opposing class forces brought to bear upon them as possible. The belief was generally entertained that the protection of the Ballot would prevent these opposing forces being brought into contact, because both the possessor of wealth and those who hoped to effect organizations would find that the power to use these forces had been considerably diminished by the existence of the Ballot. So far from agreeing with the hon. Member for Liverpool that the time was ill-chosen for legislating on this subject, he thought that it was peculiarly opportune, and that the passing of the Reform Act made it the more expedient that the first Household Parliament should adopt the Ballot for the householders who had returned them before the next election. There might be some increase of danger, and possibly of disease, in the extension of the suffrage; but he did not regret it for a moment; he did not share the opinion of the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. G. Bentinck) in his rebuke of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire for deserting Conservative principles. He cared not whether the effect was to help Conservatives or Liberals; it was necessary, and true Conservative policy, to preserve the institutions of the country, and the Conservatives might thank their leader for not putting the party in hopeless opposition to the progress of the nation and to that extension of the suffrage for which the time had come. It was impossible to have that measure—as it was impossible to have others, in this world—without its dangers, and one of these was the increase of the number of persons liable to be bribed or unduly influenced; and it was this that made the remedy now proposed more urgently necessary. There was one special reason why the passing of the Reform Bill should be followed by the passing of the Ballot. The principle of the Reform Bill was, that every householder in England ought to have a right to self-government. Surely it would be most dangerous to mock them with the gift, and to take back with one hand what they gave with the other. They had no wish to make it a mockery; but they had undertaken a duty which they could not perform without making some sacrifice. He believed that the extension of the suffrage was the fulfilment of one of the most deeply-rooted sentiments of free Englishmen—that in this free country every man should have his right to a share in the government, and exercise his vote in perfect freedom. He expressed his deep regret that just at the time they were considering the immediate settlement of this question, in which the lamented Mr. Grote took so deep an interest, he should have been struck down; and he could not resume his seat without quoting the words used by that Gentleman when he spoke in bringing forward his last Motion on the subject, and which were the exact expression of his own sentiments. What Mr. Grote said was this—

“I am persuaded that the right of the country to the free and conscientious expression of opinion from every qualified elector, poor as well as rich, and the right of the elector himself to express such opinion at the poll without hindrance or injury, is among the most deeply-rooted of all our national convictions; and to convert this right from a cherished fiction into a useful reality is the claim and virtue of the Ballot. If you refuse the Ballot you virtually discountenance free and public-minded voting.”

He could hardly expect hon. Members opposite to acknowledge that. [“No, no!”]

“For vast numbers of the community you decree the continued reign of corruption and intimidation. [“No, no!”] You keep alive a poisonous state, which infects the life-blood of our representative system; against this poison the Ballot is the only antidote, and as such I commend it to your favourable decision. I know not whether you will reject it now; but I am sure you will not reject it long.”

With these words Mr. Grote ended his speech before he left the House in 1839. [A laugh.] That was a statement of truth which, to his mind, was not to be denied—he expected a smile when he gave the date—a prophecy as yet unfulfilled. Would that it had been fulfilled. Had the Ballot been passed when Mr. Grote asked the House to pass it, much animosity between classes, much bitterness of feeling, much injury to individuals, would have been prevented. Why had that prophecy not been fulfilled? Why was the Ballot not passed when Mr. Grote made that speech? Because at that time, and almost until now, the power of electing Members of this House rested mainly with those who preferred the old system of open voting, and preferred the possession of the power to bribe and to coerce. The vote they should take that night would insure the immediate, though long-deferred fulfilment of that prophecy, because the power of election now rested with those who, since the passing of the Reform Bill of 1867, were able to say to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, and those on the Liberal side who had helped him to pass that measure—“You have given us the right to vote; you have acknowledged our right to vote; we desire and demand that this vote shall be free.”

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I shall make no apology for detaining the House for a few minutes before it proceeds to a division upon this question. Without for a moment denying the importance of arriving at a timely settlement of it, I venture to submit one consideration, which outweighs in my mind the pressure for any hasty decision of the matter—and that is the consideration that we are engaged in the discussion of a question which lies deep at the root of our electoral system. Whatever the decision of the House may be—whether it be for good or ill—it is, at all events, a decision which will deeply affect the constitution of this country for years to come. It is one of the first duties of this House, not only to respect as far as possible the public opinion that hon. Members may gather from their constituents, but also to perform a part of, at least, as much importance—namely, to assist by our discussions in forming and guiding the opinions of those who have sent us here. I confess I was disappointed when the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President spoke of the motives which led to the introduction of this Bill. As the first and principal reason for proceeding with it the right hon. Gentleman said the feeling of the constituencies and of the people was in favour of it. I am not prepared to question the accuracy of the right hon. Gentleman's information as to the opinions of the constituency of Bradford, nor do I undervalue the statement which he makes with so much confidence as to the opinions of the constituencies at large. It may be that that statement will entirely outweigh the evidence upon which the House is rather accustomed to rely—namely, the expression of opinion in the Petitions which are presented. I am not disposed to undervalue the 45 Petitions which I am told bear 7,500 signatures in favour of the measure, and I will accept the statement that is tendered to the House by so high an authority as the right hon. Gentleman against the negative evidence derived from the paucity of Petitions. But though I was sorry to find that the right hon. Gentleman, who is so well qualified to argue this question upon its merits, should take, as his principal ground, what he said was the opinion of the constituencies of the country; yet I was relieved when within a few sentences the right hon. Gentleman gave an antidote to his doctrine. He rebuked my right hon. Friend (Mr. G. Hardy) for saying that any public opinion was good. Having placed the case of the Government in connection with this Bill on the alleged fact of its being approved of by the great mass of the Liberal electors, the right hon. Gentleman told us at the same time not to take mere public opinion as sufficient ground for our proceedings. I hope, then, that we are free to set aside for the moment, as the governing consideration for the passing this measure, the mere expression of public opinion which he fancies he has discovered in the constituencies of this country. Because I am far from admitting that the mere fact that the right hon. Gentleman, and those Members with whom he is associated, form a large majority of this House, and that the Ballot is one of the articles of their political creed, is sufficient to prove that the majority of the electors are in favour of the Ballot. The last General Election, Sir, is not so far back as to make us forget the circumstances connected with it. That election turned on a great number of considerations. We were told that the one great question before the country was the Irish Church Establishment. There were supplementary questions in regard to the condition of Ireland, the tenure of Irish land, and the system of Irish education, before the country, and something, I remember, was also said upon the question of administrative economy. The Ballot, however, was by no means one of the popular questions which were then submitted to the electors. So much for the opinion of the public. But we are bound to discuss this question upon its merits. If that be so, there is a special obligation upon us sitting upon these benches to examine the second ground which the right hon. Gentleman put forward as a reason for proceeding with this Bill, when he said the pressure for the Ballot at this moment originated in the passing of the Reform Bill introduced by the Government of Lord Derby—a measure which gave a new colour to the constituencies of this country, and rendered the adoption of the Ballot on many accounts absolutely necessary. Now, I venture to remind the House that in the measure passed by that Government, of which I had the honour to form a part, we had not neglected to consider that on which so much stress has been placed—namely, that by the introduction of a large number of new electors into our system it was possible that fresh cause might be given to fear the effects of those evils that already prevailed. We were aware that it would be said, with much plausibility and even with much ground, that the large increase of the electoral body might give a stimulus to bribery and intimidation. We therefore did not neglect those matters, but endeavoured to provide against them. Coupled with that measure of Reform was another, designed for the express purpose of detecting and preventing corruption and intimidation at elections, for we did not throw a large body of new electors into the old system without endeavouring to accommodate that system to the new conditions, but while we largely increased the constituencies we provided more stringent measures for the prevention of electoral corruption. We did not stop there, for although the House was not pleased to accept the proposals that were made to it, that Government introduced into their Bill for largely extending the franchise clauses that were framed with a view to prevent these special evils which the House has been told with much confidence the Ballot would certainly prevent. We proposed that votes should be taken by voting papers. Now, those clauses indicated our sense of some of those mischiefs upon which great stress has been laid by the right hon. Gentleman opposite and his Friends. We sought thus to provide against disturbances at the polling-places and to check bribery, especially at the last hours of election, whilst endeavouring at the same time to bring to the poll the largest number of electors possible. It was not the opinion of this House, or of the one that preceded it, that that measure should be adopted; but we stand here to say that we did not overlook the difficulty. We still believe that the remedy we proposed was a more apposite and more perfect remedy than this, and that it would to a very great extent have diminished and, perhaps, have gone far to cure the evils which are now complained of so far as they are curable, without involving the objections and difficulties which we say lie in the way of secret voting. Now, I venture to say—and I will draw my argument from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman himself—that that to which we really look for the preservation of a healthy state of opinion, and for the exercise of the franchise in a honourable, fair, and beneficial manner by the people of this country, is to these two causes which he himself has adverted to as likely to be the most productive of benefit to this country—I mean the increasing independence and intelligence of the voters, and the free interchange of thought. So far from this measure which is now before us tending to facilitate and advance the independence of the voters and the interchange of thought, it will have a directly opposite result. I believe it will fail altogether in the object at which it professes to aim—the securing of that independence; and I believe it will most materially operate to prevent the free interchange of thought. I hear it said by hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, who advocate this measure, that we who oppose it confess that it will afford protection against intimidation. I, for one, confess nothing of the sort—I entirely deny it, and maintain that the power of intimidation, though it may change its character and its form, will be as great under this Bill as it ever was before, and it will be even greater, because it will be freed from that which is a counter check to intimidation—I mean the interchange of thought. Now let us look at this question of intimidation. What is it that you mean by that phrase? Let us look at the precise way in which you use it. Here is an employer who intimidates his workmen—exercising such a pressure on them that they will not venture to give a vote contrary to his wishes for fear of losing their employment. But how could the Ballot act in such a case? The Ballot, to be effective, must protect the voter throughout his whole connection with his employer—not only at election times, but at all other times. The voter must be careful to abstain from any expression or interchange of opinion with his fellow-workmen, or with anyone, or else his political views and bias are known, and if he happen to entertain Conservative opinions while his employer, let us suppose, is a Liberal, the employer himself, or his foreman, or the agent of the party will say—“That man must not vote, or else he will be sure to give his vote against us. We know his opinions, and we must exert a pressure to keep him from the poll.” How are you to get rid of that sort of intimidation under the Ballot? You do not get rid of it, but you bring the pressure to bear exactly on the wrong men—on the intelligent men who have formed opinions, and who are able to express and defend them. You destroy the weight which those men have among their fellow-workmen by the free interchange of thought—those are the very men who, if intimidation is to prevail at all, will be exactly the men whom you will keep from the poll. But there are other forms of intimidation. We hear of mob intimidation; but have not the mob a pretty good idea of the people who will be likely to vote against them—respectable people who may have taken part in discussing the various questions of the day, and who may have adopted particular views on points which interest the masses—for instance, on the question of capital and labour, or on some matter like the licensing system? You do not, I say, get rid of intimidation by this measure, you do not get rid of its 50,000 different forms—even if you get rid of that intimidation which you say the employer may exercise on individual workmen. But what do you lose by it on the other hand? All the free interchange of thought which is the real education of the political men of this country. When we extended the franchise we looked forward to the influence of education—of a free education—in the future which would enable men to understand and take an interest in the questions of the day, and to give their votes not for personal and private but for public interests—not for private affection, but with regard to the public opinion of those whom they respect. I have heard some hon. Gentlemen on the other side ask—“What do you mean by this public opinion which is to do all this good?” Why, Sir, I mean that public opinion which keeps a man from voting through mere spite or ignorant motives, and which induces him, whether he is right or wrong on particular questions, to give his vote for some public reason. That is the sort of thing we want to encourage in this country, so that all men shall take an interest in the political work they have to do. Then what else do you do by this measure? You lose the example given by courageous votes openly recorded. The workman who has to leave his place because he has voted against his employer may be a sufferer—and I admit that it is our duty to prevent that form of suffering as far as possible—but after all he is also a martyr, and does great good by testifying to a principle. [“Oh, oh!”] Hon. Gentlemen opposite may laugh; but let me ask them whether they themselves do not bring forward cases of this sort, and appeal to these men as martyrs in the cause of the Ballot. Remember the position of my argument. I do not say that you are not necessarily, after full consideration, to adopt this measure; but I say you are not entitled to adopt it for the reasons which have been given. I am now asking you not to be so very tender with regard to these cases as to say that because a man might possibly suffer he, therefore, ought not to be called upon to exercise a political duty—when you admit men to the franchise you call upon them to exercise a duty. We are all called upon to exercise duties in our various ways, and in the exercise of them we sometimes have occasion to imperil, and even to sacrifice, our own interests. I do not undervalue the sacrifice of the poor man who injures himself by giving a vote which is distasteful to his employer; but I say that, in the condition of this country, the quality which you should cultivate among your people is that of political courage. A measure which is founded upon a denial of political courage is not only un-English, but it is un-patriotic, because it deprives us of that which I believe to be the mainstay of the country. When we look round and see the example of other countries, and the misfortunes that have happened to them, I say boldly that those misfortunes are attributable, above all things, to a want of political courage, and it is a most serious matter that we should give countenance to a measure to discourage that quality which I say it is above all things desirable to cultivate. Now, we are told that the Ballot is needed to put down the evils which attend our electoral system. I am far from denying that these evils still prevail, and are of a serious character. I am far from discrediting any attempt to put them down; but I ask you, instead of “flying from evils you know, to those you know not of,” to adopt another maxim well known in America, and “fight this battle out on your own line”—the honourable, and I hope successful line of appealing against selfish and degrading influences to the healthy influence of public opinion, by endeavouring as far as possible, to detect and prevent electoral corruption and intimidation, and by bringing the power of public opinion, through the Press and every other organ of opinion, to bear on those who try to misuse the advantages they possess. I should be the last man in the world to stand up for intimidation, which, in my opinion, is a most disgraceful feature in any society; but you may put it down partly by rigorous measures of detection, repression, and punishment, and still more by making those who practise it ashamed of themselves. Have we made no progress in this matter within the last 30 or 40 years? Do you believe that intimidation, bribery, and undue influence of all sorts are looked upon as coolly now as at the time when Mr. Grote made that prophecy? I greatly doubt it. I should be very sorry, indeed, if I believed that undue influence were as rife in this country now as they were 30 or 40 years ago; and I say, with reasonable measures of precaution, with a due system of repression by law and discouragement by society, and with a constant appeal to public opinion to condemn those men who abuse their natural advantages for the purposes of bribery and intimidation, the evils pointed at—especially those evils which occur on the day of election—may be reduced to a minimum. You will not do this by the Bill, because you will not get rid of the causes of the evil; you do not go to its root. You cannot test whether bribery has been committed or not, and as long as there are candidates who are willing to pay for a seat in Parliament they will find means of paying for votes. While there are persons inclined to resort to intimidation, they will find out a way by which to accomplish their ends. As we say in the West—"a man is a difficult animal to fence against," and unless you go to the root of the evil you will discover the force of this proverb. I want you to go to the fount and source of what you want to abolish, and make intimidation disgraceful as you are making bribery disgraceful. I believe that the steps you have been taking will, if you persevere, make bribery come to be held in detestation, and ultimately annihilate it. But should you adopt the course which you are now asked to follow you will shut yourself out from being able to discover it, and while you cut it down in one direction fresh shoots will be thrown out in another. We have had reference made in this debate to what takes place in America. But the right hon. Gentleman gets up and says—"Our Bill will defeat those American evils." I do not believe a word of that. I had an opportunity of being present in the City of Washington at an election which took place in that city. I saw the process there, and the way in which a certain kind of Ballot is defeated by the ingenuity of those indefatigable persons who are called election agents here, but who pass under another name on the other side of the Atlantic. In that election everyone voted by open tickets—that is to say, every man had a ticket put into his hand at a window, with the names printed on it. He took it from whichever candidate he wished, and handed it to the poll-clerk. The ticket of one candidate was white, and that of the other chequered. You say that is open voting. ["Hear, hear!"] Not quite; because the agents on one side placed the name of the Republican candidate on the Democratic ticket, and those on the other the name of the Democratic candidate on the Republican ticket—that is to say, committed a fraud; and sometimes they contrived to get a man to put a wrong ticket into the box, and once there it was beyond being objected to; and the votes were given sometimes against the knowledge of the voter. What I wish to point out is, that where a man made his vote secret he did so by a fraud, a thing which, I think, we should not like to encourage. Again, the numbers were announced throughout the election at every hour of the day. But I do not speak alone of the Washington election. What struck me more was an election which took place in another State, and which created a great deal of interest. I mean the election of the State officers in Connecticut. This is one of the New England States, and is, therefore, not open to the charge which the right hon. Gentleman brings against Kentucky of having supported slavery. A large number of persons who were not connected with Connecticut, went into that State from the Association known by the name of Tammany in New York. They exercised every sort of bribery and intimidation; and it was alleged that a large sum of money was expended in order to carry the election on a particular side. I cannot say whether those charges were true. But they were believed. Now what did take place was this. When the Ballot-boxes were opened it was announced, in the first instance, that the election had fallen on one candidate. After a time it was announced that it had fallen on another. Then an allegation was made that the Ballot-boxes had been tampered with, and on the matter being inquired into by a committee it reduced itself to this particular form. It was said that in one district 594 votes were found in favour of a particular candidate, and it was alleged by his friends that the real number was 694, and that 100 votes had been abstracted from the urn. This gave rise to a good deal of speculation and to much commentary, and a great many bets were made on the subject in New York. Well, a peculiar course was taken to decide the question—a course which the right hon. Gentleman has not provided for in his Bill, but which it may be necessary to provide for should the Bill be proceeded with. They called up the voters from the particular district, and swore them as to whom they voted for. The result was that they satisfied themselves that the Ballot-box had been tampered with, and they came to the conclusion that the candidate who appeared to have only 594 votes was in reality entitled to more, and he was returned. I merely mention this fact to illustrate the ingenious methods by which elections are effected under the Ballot in America. I have been told of numerous other practices. For instance, private firms sometimes require that voters under their control shall place particular marks upon the tickets, ascertaining when the Ballot-box is opened whether the votes have been given according to their wishes. I do not maintain that provision may not be made against these specific frauds; but you cannot tell the thousand and one other frauds which the ingenuity of men who are determined to beat your system will suggest. I would earnestly impress upon the Government this consideration—which was put forward by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. A. Cross) in his speech—that if it is of great importance to secure the honesty of those who vote, it is above and beyond all things important to secure confidence in those who manage the machinery of elections; and that if it is possible that imputations can be made against the officials, that Ballot-boxes have been tampered with, and that frauds have been committed in taking the votes, you shake confidence to a degree the mischief of which far exceeds that arising out of any instances of intimidation or bribery which can be brought forward. Sir, I do not suppose that there would be any such misconduct on the part of those who would be the public officers in this country. But I say it would be always impossible to prevent people imputing such misconduct, and, therefore, it would be impossible to give that confidence which arises from being able to prove how every vote has been given. I earnestly entreat the House to be careful how they introduce and pass a system of this kind without providing in some manner or other for the subsequent identification of the votes. I really am ashamed to trouble the House at such length. I have ventured to speak upon this subject because I really feel that it is one which goes deep into our national character, and affects deeply the national institutions. I listened with pleasure to such observations as those which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Stansfeld), and others who have addressed the House, wherein they have spoken of this as a measure the passing of which they would regard as a humiliation, and which they looked upon as a choice of two evils. Now, I do not say that it may not be proved ultimately that some such measure as this is needed. And if such should be proved to be the case after full evidence, of course it would be our duty to adopt the best course open to us. But what I say is, that at present no such evidence has been adduced. At present what is certain is, the evil which would follow. The good that you think you are about to do is problematical. I say you have not proved your case, and you are about to disturb an experiment which we are now making to put down the evils of our electoral system in a legitimate way, by bringing public opinion to bear on them—by endeavouring to educate the voters and render them more independent, and by seeking to punish any transactions of a questionable character. It is perfectly possible, if you think it desirable, to introduce measures which will meet the main and more obvious blots in the management of elections. It is easy by some system of voting papers to secure all you desire. [Dissent.] I prefer myself to try the system as it stands. But I say if I find that the system as it stands is open to those charges it may be our duty to give the protection which voting papers would give. But this I maintain, that under no system is it probable that you can introduce any arrangements which can compensate by any advantages they may bring for the great disadvantages you will introduce if you pass the Ballot without a power of scrutiny. If the House decides on going into Committee the question of a scrutiny is the main point to which our attention must be directed. But I earnestly press the House to pause before going into Committee. Though the question has been so long before the country, it is not yet ripe for decision. The right hon. Gentleman appeals to public opinion. Public opinion how formed? Formed upon the discussions which he has referred to, which took place some 30 or 40 years ago, kept up only by Motions in this House, for the question has never been treated seriously, and never been made the subject of an earnest debate. ["Oh, oh!"] I do not deny that able speeches have been made and frequent divisions taken; but I say the matter has never been treated with the earnestness and the seriousness with which we treat subjects brought before us when a measure is introduced by a responsible Government, and which is the only way that I believe a subject so important should be dealt with. Those debates, at least, had none of the importance and seriousness of this one. This is the first discussion, I believe, even on the principles of the Bill; certainly it is the first of any length upon the details of it. Under these circumstances, I think our constituents have the right to demand not only that we should give expression to their fully formed opinions, but also that we should enlighten and instruct them upon the difficulties of the question, which they do not thoroughly understand, and that we should not divide upon a subject of such importance until after full and serious debate, and until it has been subjected to the enlightened opinion of the country.

Sir Stafford Northcote

Sir Stafford Northcote

MR. GLADSTONE: I think that those who have just listened to the speech of my right hon. Friend will not only admit that it has been characterized by the fairness and the absence of passion which—with perhaps one exception—have distinguished the opposition to this measure, but likewise—which cannot but be satisfactory to the supporters of the Bill and to the Government—that that speech in no small degree assumed the character of a plea for time. My right hon. Friend says the matter has not been sufficiently discussed; he will not bind himself to the proposition that it may not be ultimately necessary to have recourse to secret voting; and in the latter part of his speech he pointed to

